Jung: There is dissension in the air. Why this hesitation and indecision?

Soul: ["]Why do you not claim your rights? You should act as you like.["]

Jung: I don’t want to commit a wrong.

Soul: "All the same, whether right or wrong. Whatever will be, will be."

Soul: But I always never know what I want.

Jung: "Then investigate."

Soul: That's why I'm here. I would like to listen to you, to find from you the explanation that I lack above. What's happening with you?

Jung: "A lot is happening. Difficult things need to be put together."

Soul: "I see the stones of walls which still must be piled up- blocks- hewn. But no one is building. Who left the stones lying? Where are you, Atmaviktu, ancient one, and you, Philemon, wise one? What did you do?

Philemon: We united ourselves. Atmaviktu, that is I. I was an old magician, when I lacked Atmaviktu. I have grown young from the drink of wisdom. My head shines in golden fire. The flame blossoms from me, since I have released myself from this man. I was in him when Atmaviktu was still an animal, when he was a serpent, I rose up and moved into my castle and had a meal with the white serpent and I ate it myself and she gave me eternal youth and as fire she kindles her light over my head. I have outgrown this man. For me, he was a gate of splendor. He belongs to the earth. I am fire, begotten from man, not as man, but flame. I have passed through this man, I have surpassed him. I am the lover. This man was my vessel. I am the servant of the luminous one this man belongs to the earth- may he be well! He was my vessel. He is earth. I bore his action further. I accepted what he lived, I took it to the luminous one.

Soul: "But what will happen to this man and to me, if you have released yourself from him?"

Phil. He is earth, he will live. He has fulfilled everything. He has seen everything, he has come close to the eternal fire. He is fulfilled. Peace will be granted him. He is released, since I have released myself from him. He remains in himself and covers his world. It is not wanting in nourishment. He received his life from the God, it turns back there. I carry it further. Hail to him who can sink into himself; he is fulfilled. The uplifting force has released itself from him. The golden bird spread out its wings. It draws this man neither toward the below nor toward the above. He is earth-he floats in the middle. He sees the sun, I see the God. His shadow became fire. He is content and kisses the earth. His star shines from afar. His star is my brother, a distant God, whom I don't serve. This man was my vessel, a my gate of entrance and ascent.

I am not his soul and am not his God. His interior is foreign to me, a foreign star seed, which fell into this world. Through him I grew. I was born when I was old and reach my youth in old age, and finally dissolve myself in the maternal body of God, when this man dies. This man is a star seed-where did he come from? He fell from the indeterminate. He is earth but yet does not belong to the earth. He is foreign. Therefore man will never incline to the law of the earth. He changes Abraxas, but his star never mixes itself with it. He is no child of the sun, but its brother. He put on a sun dress and covered his distant blue light in solar colors. I was hidden in his mantle and I am released from his mantle.

His distant star illuminates him. To him I am a flame. The Black Books, Vol. VI, Page 294-295

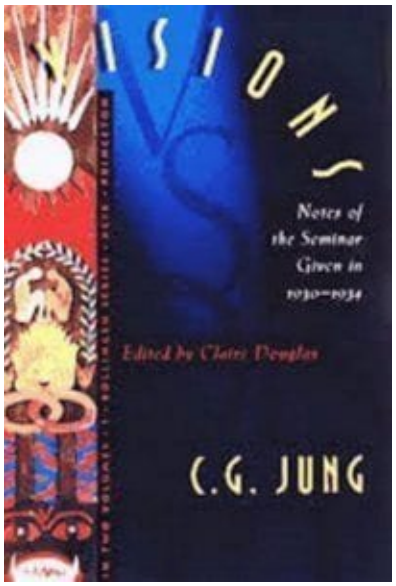
14 June 1933 LECTURE 7 Visions Seminar (2021-12-01 05:03)

[paypal _donation _button border="5"]



14 June 1933 Visions Seminar LECTURE VII

Here is a question by Miss Hannah: "You said last time that it was very questionable if there was any movement for the better in the world.

What did you mean by better?

I had thought that every platonic year the consciousness gained might be a little beyond the point reached by the era before.

A spiral seems to make more sense than an endlessly repeated circle.

Or does time lose its significance altogether in higher consciousness, so making the circle idea bearable?"

The first question is difficult to answer definitely as you can appreciate.

That was a more or less temperamental remark-that it was rather questionable whether things would be better and better in every way.

For what does one mean by "better"?

If one calls it better when consciousness widens out and civilization increases, then I say we are moving towards an improved state of things, for it is very probable that civilization does increase, with certain relapses from time to time.

There have been cycles when things fell back into relative chaos, but then they picked up again.

As a whole, if one compares the year 10,000 B.C. with the year 2000 A.D. one must say that there is a difference; things seem to be less primitive than they were then.

And if one could compare, say, the year 5000 with the year 150,000 B.C. in central Europe, one would again mark a quite noticeable difference.

So in that sense one could say things have become better.

But in another sense that is most questionable.

I don’t know whether our life is happier than the life of the primitive man, or whether life today is better than life in the Middle Ages.

In looking back into the Middle Ages there is always a sort of foreshortening; war follows war, kings and feudal lords fighting each other, one form of destruction after another, epidemics, revolutions, so it looks as if the whole of the Middle Ages had been a very chaotic hell.

But one entirely forgets that those wars were very small affairs; perhaps five thousand men were beating up five thousand other men, and then they went home again.

They made war only in summer, in winter people stayed at home; also, it was only in certain parts, in other parts there was an idyllic peace, and people had no idea that there was a war anywhere.

You remember that famous verse in Faust about how nice it is on Sundays to see the ships on the river, and to hear the talk about war in faraway Turkey, as a sort of thrill.

They had in those days what they called a gazette, a very small news-sheet.

In the German sense it was the Zeitung, which means literally timing, or the news of the time, what time brings; the English "Times" is an equivalent.

In the eighteenth century, both the London Gazette and the Westminster Gazette were such very small sheets.

In that way people heard about a war that had taken place somewhere, the number killed and so on, and it was nice to hear about when it was so remote and did not concern them in the least; it added a certain finish to a good story on a Sunday.

It is quite different now, however; when one hears of shooting somewhere, one knows the next minute it may be right at one's door because the world has been thrown into a general conflagration.

With our newspapers, the world is by no means as agreeable as before.

Of course when one was right in the center of the fray in those days, it was rather hellish, but I don't know whether a bomb from the air is less so, or if a cloud of poison gas is particularly pleasant.

With all our civilization, we are generally in a less peaceful atmosphere.

It is as if our sensitivity had increased by several hundred degrees, as if our whole nervous system were attached to the system of telegraph and telephone wires in the world, so that we jump when something happens in South Africa.

Formerly we jumped when something fell down in our room, but now we jump when a pistol goes off five thousand miles away.

So in those respects it is quite doubtful whether things have become better.

But if one takes the increase of civilization, the widening out of consciousness, for the real goal of mankind, if one says it is bad when things are unconscious and better when they become conscious, then things have become better, and it is a spiral, as far as we can judge of humanity.

But don't forget that we have very limited knowledge, we don't know whether these three months of the platonic year are not a mere episode.

Taurus, Aries, and the Fishes are the three spring months, and we don't know what will happen in two signs from now, in about 2300 years, when we reach the equivalent of the winter solstice, the turning point.

Whether that whole episode of the widening out of consciousness will not be something quite different, whether it will not then be an involution of consciousness, we simply do not know.

This problem is linked up with our attitude to human things in general, namely, the question whether we have to think of the earthly life that we know empirically as the only life possible, or whether there is another form of existence, whether the goal of all things living is fulfilled by their existence here, or whether this is merely a means to an end.

All the great religions are convinced that life cannot be explained by itself, and many philosophers have had the same idea.

Even rather primitive religions contain the belief that life as we know it is not the real thing, but only a means of reaching a blissful condition in the eternal hunting ground, a sort of preparation for the life of duration.

There are also primitive beliefs, however, which hold that the only decent and interesting and happy life is on this earth and that Hades is a very gloomy place, not enjoyable at all.

But it is a fact that every great religion considers life as something which cannot be explained by itself; it is always looked at from an extra-mundane point of view and understood to be a means to an end.

You see, it makes all the difference in the world from which standpoint we judge.

Naturally, our rationalistic modern point of view is to take life for what it seems to be, and therefore we all dream of improving social conditions, educating people, making things better as we understand them, with the result that more and more dangerous weapons are given to people who cannot use them.

For instance, a great deal of absolutely sound naivete is destroyed by education, the means of the intellect are given to people who are not mature enough to use those dangerous instruments.

A chemist may invent most dangerous chemical bodies which are quite safe in the hands of a responsible man, but destructive if they get into the hands of irresponsible politicians.

They will begin to play with them and to dream how many people they can kill with them, and then an infernal catastrophe is created with things that are not dangerous at all if they remain in the proper hands.

So with the belief that this is the world where everything comes to its own fulfillment and that it should therefore be a paradise, a hell is created.

It would be very much better not to have such strong convictions.

Then you will acknowledge that the great religions-say Christianity, Buddhism, and Mohammedanism-all have their very great value because they teach that it does not matter so much what happens here, conditions don’t need to be improved, but man needs a great deal of improvement, because he lives this life as a sort of preparation for another kind of life, a state of duration which is not to be found here.

Of course one cannot prove that, but it should remain at least an open question, as all things ought to remain open questions of which we are not sure.

And we are honestly not sure of anything, nothing is absolutely certain.

We are not certain whether these great religions tell us the truth, as we are not certain whether our scientific Weltanschauung is the truth.

We only know that "nothing is quite true and even that is not quite true," as a Dutch philosopher said.

It is very healthy to think like that, it keeps all doors open for other experiences.

We began a new series of visions last time about the pit of onyx, which penetrated into the earth in the form of a cone, and at the bottom our patient beheld an old Indian woman with a Mexican image in her arms that seemed alive.

The Mexican image appeared before as an unknown Indian god, the reason for that being the patient's background; she belongs to the American soil, so it is quite natural that her unconscious produces an American deity.

The Christian deity is a matter for her consciousness and would be carried over from that peninsula of Asia which is called Europe; mentally we are a peninsula of Asia, and therefore the main body of our religious ideas come from Asia.

But America is decidedly not Asia, and since our patient lives there, her unconscious production will not come out of the Asiatic earth, but out of the earth of America.

Therefore the image, the idol, is always made of earth, metal, wood-of some material taken from the earth one lives upon.

What does the pit of onyx mean?

Dr. Gordon: Onyx is a very hard substance which would preserve whatever was in it.

Dr. Jung: Yes, a vessel of onyx, for instance, is extremely hard and durable, it will remain the same for thousands of years, and whatever is inside will be well preserved there.

Now how do you explain this sudden apparition after the last vision?

You remember she stepped upon the old man, and so got upon the sole of her foot the mark of the cross, with the dragon twined around it, and the lion's head above.

Mrs. Baumann: You spoke of the amphora last time in connection with those other symbols, so you might perhaps expect the vessel to appear in the next vision. The lion was trying to get into the vessel.

Dr. Jung: Exactly. The movement and the causation, or the logic of sequence in such visions, is exactly the same as in the I Ching.

For instance, after an accumulation, the tendency to dispersion increases; it is an enantiodromia.

The logic of the I Ching and the logic of events is the logic of such visions.

So if a picture suggesting duration appears, it means that a chaotic condition has prevailed before.

You see, if by intention, or even by mistake, you slip into that pit, you are caught and well protected; also it is practically indestructible so you are well preserved at the same time.

Now if you get into such a place by intention, you are obviously avoiding a danger, a situation in which you would have been torn to pieces perhaps.

Miss Rogers: It suggests the crater of a volcano.

Dr. Jung: But nothing is said of a fire here, so it seems to be something artificial, a thing one would not encounter in nature, it is a vessel quite simply.

The interesting point here is the contrast with the situation that went before, the chaotic condition against which it would be well to have safe walls around one.

She was in danger of being dismembered because that situation was under the sign of the lion, a devourer; the lion is the domicilium solis, the sign of the greatest heat of the year.

And under that devouring sign the best protection would be to hide underground in a pit of onyx, where she would be absolutely safe.

But also caught. What does that mean?

You see onyx is a semiprecious stone, it is not merely a place in the ground.

Mrs. Schlegel: It is a form.

Dr. Jung: Yes, therefore I spoke of a vessel.

The antique amphoras have that conical shape because they were made to be put into the sand as a support, as you can still see in Pompeii; and onyx has a beautiful polish which is not mentioned here.

So it is the idea of form in contrast to the idea of chaos.

Against the wild lion, a sort of absolutely heedless emanation, a form is needed in which she can be held and protected.

Then at the bottom of that form she discovers the old Indian woman with the Mexican image, which has the value of an ancestral figure.

An old Indian squaw means here the essence of the American character, the thing most adapted to the peculiarity of the American soil.

And that figure holds the idol which seems to be alive. What about that?

An idol is usually dead.

Mr. Allemann: It is a form of an old religion which is still alive in her, to which she has to come back in order to be protected against chaos.

Dr. Jung: Exactly.

An exceedingly earthly being, an old Indian squaw, holds the germ of the spiritual life which is peculiar to that soil.

This whole thing is a symbol that shows her a certain attitude which is now needed.

She continues: "Every now and then she would hold it in a fire"

(the old woman holds the idol in the fire, that is) "and take it out unharmed."

How do you explain this?

Question: Has it something to do with witchcraft?

Dr. Jung: Yes, you remember we have had this symbolism before.

Question: Is it to harden it?

Mrs. Sigg: To purify it?

Mr. Allemann: To give it energy?

Dr. Jung: It is to impart the nature or the magic quality of the fire.

The image is thus slowly imbued with fire, it is made strong.

As primitives make their fetish strong by sprinkling it with blood, or they fill it with energy by dancing round it.

Or they charge it up like an accumulator from another fetish.

If they use the fetish very often it grows weak, so when they hear of a particularly strong fetish somewhere else-necessarily a long way off because things at a distance are always better-they travel to it and put the weak fetish in the custody of the strong one for several weeks, side by side with it, and when they come to fetch it, it is strong again.

That is like the churinga cult in Australia.

The churinga is a flat disk of wood or stone, a soul stone, as it is sometimes called.

This is hidden in a hollow tree or in the cleft of a rock, say, where it stays for a long time, and then, if the owner of the churinga feels rotten, if his libido has left him or his attitude is wrong, he goes to that place in the wilderness where he has hidden it, and takes his churinga upon his knees and rubs it.

By this rubbing he imparts his bad health, his libido gone wrong, to the stone, and the good medicine power that has been breathing freely into it out in nature somewhere is taken into his body; so he exchanges libido, and then he goes home and is all right.

And the rotten libido that remains in the churinga is cured again during a prolonged rest cure in the country, its natural powers are restored, so when the good medicine power taken from the stone goes bad after a while, the owner has only to go back and rub the churinga again, and the process is repeated. So he is quite safe.

Therefore I always say such primitive conditions are by no means bad.

And now that Indian woman is making the Mexican fetish strong by imparting to it the nature of fire.

Miss Hannah: Is not that Mexican image the horrible thing she refuses?

I mean, it was first the woman inside the image.

Dr. Jung: But that woman is in no connection with the Mexican image, the earth mother is not identical with this idol; the earth mother is changed here and appears as the Indian woman.

The Mexican image is something quite apart from the earth mother.

Mrs. Baynes: When we first met it, it was up in the sky and you said it belonged to the Logos principle and was in direct contrast to the earth mother.

Dr. Jung: Yes, and the image here is in contrast to that Indian woman; those are two entirely different principles.

The Indian squaw is the female principle, and ,being chthonic, she is obviously a personification of the earth mother.

And inasmuch as the Mexican image is made of earth or gold or whatever it is, its stuff derives from the earth mother; but its meaning, its spirit, is the spiritual or Logos principle, the opposite of the woman’s principle, Eros.

But those particular terms are really not appropriate · in this case; here one would say, rather, that the Mexican image is a spiritual principle in contrast to the chthonic principle of the earth mother.

The special point, however, is that the image or idol which is naturally supposed to be something dead, seems to be alive; that is, the spiritual principle which was supposed to be a dead set of concepts, say, is shown as alive.

That is already a great progress because usually the mental principle, the Logos, or the spirit itself, seems dead in comparison with life.

The life of the ordinary biological woman, for example, is little troubled by the Logos or by spirit; anything that matters is surely not spirit, it is anything else, it is earth all over.

So when this woman discovers that the spirit is alive, it means considerable progress, and that realization must be supported.

Therefore the old witch strengthens the image, she fills it with living fire, which gives it radiation, sun quality, energy.

This is exceedingly important.

The condition has been chaotic, and to protect her against that she needs concentration, form, which is almost identical with Logos, for Logos is form, idea.

The word idea comes from the Greek word eidos which means image, and at the same time it means a formed spiritual content.

Mr. Baumann: Does she not put it into the fire to make it last forever, to ensure its never being lost again?

Dr. Jung: Yes, whatever can stand the test of fire is stronger than fire, which is the worst form of destruction.

That is the process by which Heracles became immortal; he built his own funeral pyre, and in that fire he became immortal.

The same motif is in Rider Haggard's She in the pillar of fire in which She attains an enormously long life.

So there is also the idea that the idol could attain to immortal life within that onyx vessel; it is a sort of alchemistic procedure.

The aspiration of the alchemists was to produce the medicine of immortality, the tinctura magna that changes everything into gold-an imperishable metal because it is not subject to oxidization-or the philosopher's stone of perfect wisdom, or immortality in the form of the elixir of life.

We get here into very difficult ideas, difficult because it is almost impossible to show how such a thing happens psychologically.

Or have you any idea how to demonstrate what happens when a person is undergoing such a process?

When a person is undergoing the process of creating unconscious contents, for instance, it can be demonstrated, there are many outward signs of it, the symptomatology of such a condition is manifold.

Mrs. Sigg: It might be that one has no libido in the conscious at one's disposition.

Dr. Jung: That does not prove that there is libido in the unconscious, that is a postulate; but how could you prove that something was working in the unconscious?

Mrs. Crowley: It comes out in the form of fantasies.

Dr. Jung: That would be afterwards, but when the process is going on?

Question: In dreams?

Dr. Jung: Dreams can give a hint of it, though one can always say they are merely interpretative. But there are other things which show that things are underway.

Mr. Baumann: Sometimes people do things that they are not conscious of.

Dr. Jung: Yes, or they develop local symptoms.

For instance, they may develop all the signs of a pregnancy; in women that is quite frequent.

Men develop all sorts of disturbances of digestion, constipation perhaps, or the function of the bladder or the intestinal organs may be upset; the strangest things can happen, and then one knows something is the matter with their sympathetic system.

Just lately I had such a case: a man dreamed that his anima was pregnant in the ninth month with a child which did not belong there at all; it was not her own child, which showed very clearly that those were strange contents which did not belong to the anima, they belonged in consciousness.

After a while the unconscious will begin to work and bring them out.

You see, those are all signs by which you can demonstrate that something is going on in the way of unconscious contents.

But this process here, this onyx pit, this alchemistic kitchen in which an idol is hardened in the fire, is different; through heat working upon the idol, it attains to immortality, an imperishable radiant condition, because it now contains the quality of fire.

Now could you demonstrate this?

In other words would you be able to define such a condition from contents of consciousness or symbols in dreams?

Well, it is exceedingly difficult, I would not trust myself in that case, I only know of certain conditions under which I could make a diagnosis of the process.

As you know, fire always symbolizes emotion, but of course emotions can have all sorts of meanings and all sorts of causes.

Therefore it must be a particular condition, which would show in this way: a patient in such a condition precipitates herself into emotions, she seeks them repeatedly, she may be afraid of them yet she needs them.

You see, nearly everybody likes to avoid emotion, but certain people seek it even when consciously they don’t want to at all, they make use of the slightest provocation in order to have an emotion.

Sometimes they even admit that, and then one knows that they need the fire as one needs it in the kitchen stove, and for a certain purpose.

The purpose may be absolutely invisible, but sometimes it becomes visible in an unreasonable conviction that the emotion has to be.

If the patient says to you: "I know it looks foolish, but I have the feeling that these emotions serve a certain purpose," then you know it is this process; it means that something should be produced in the fire.

Now in the fire two things are produced: destruction-everything that can burn will burn out-and then, if there should be in all that stuff something that can stand the fire, it will be precipitated.

Perhaps a heap of rubbish is burned up, and in the ashes a molten drop of gold will appear.

One may even feel it necessary to burn up all the rubbish, and that is not possible without fire.

Therefore emotions are needed for the precipitation of the precious substance in the end.

And not only the transient emotions, the fire of passion is necessary.

People are afraid of the fire of passion and then passion seizes them.

They think it is a mistake, but they need and are really looking for it; and the more they know, the less they will deny passion.

They will accept it because they know it is the purifying fire that is needed for the production of the pure gold.

So to get into a purified condition one must pass through the zone of fire in which every desire is burned out, the result being worthless ashes blown away by the wind, and the pure gold that stands the fire forever.

There is a beautiful expression of that symbolism in Dante’s Divine Comedy.

In the last circle of purgatory, when approaching the celestial sphere, Virgil leads Dante to the flame of purification; he himself steps back-because he is a heathen, he cannot pass through that flame-but Dante, baptized a Christian, can enter the fire of pure love where everything earthly is burned out of him, and then ascend to heaven.

You see, this symbol is a psychological experience, and it shows itself in the form of a continuous machine-gun fire of emotions which in the end die down, and one would say the fire had burnt out, that it was a burnt-out crater; and externally, or if one looks at it superficially, one might see it as complete destruction, with nothing left.

But if one goes down into the crater, at the bottom one finds the gold, the valuable substance which is no longer touched by fire, and this is the meaning of all the non-sense that went before.

Mrs. Baynes: Did you mean to say that in this last vision of the onyx crater, she brings to a sort of climax all the preceding visions?

Dr. Jung: In what way?

Mrs. Baynes: In the finding of the gold.

Dr. Jung: There is no mention in the vision of the gold.

I simply used that simile in order to explain the symbolism here as a sort of alchemistic procedure, but nothing is said about the possible outcome of it.

The only hint we get is that the idol remains unharmed, but from that we can conclude practically nothing.

The symbolism is expressed in such a telegraphic style, so short and thin, that we have to fill in a lot of gaps in order to make it digestible at all.

These visions are in that respect like dreams that need a great deal of elaboration before their meaning becomes clear; you get nothing by just reading them, it is a mere outline of things caught in a flash.

You might have a hypnagogic vision, for example, just one, and you would not know where to put it, what it possibly could mean, but I might be able by my experience to place it in such and such a connection; then you look back into your dreams or you have subsequent dreams and can understand it.

But you would not be able to make it out from one vision.

Mrs. Crowley: It seems to be the antithesis of the magic circle.

Dr. Jung: It is not the antithesis, for it takes place within the circle; therefore the gold can be produced.

If you undergo emotions outside the circle, you may be destroyed, devoured in the flames; you need the magic circle.

The alchemistic procedure is always understood to be happening within the circle, and you often see in pictures of sorcerers that they are within a· magic circle while practicing their magic or witchcraft.

Mrs. Crowley: But this onyx cone is so different, it doesn't suggest anything protective, it is so hard and cold.

Dr. Jung: The quality of the magic circle is that one cannot just walk through it, it is hard like stone on the outside; one is arrested by it and will be destroyed if one steps over it, also it is made to keep out ghosts.

So it is like a thick wall, nothing can come out of it and nothing can go in.

Mr. Baumann: If a patient is seeking emotions, are you always sure that there will be some gold left?

Dr. Jung: You should not conclude from my remark that a series of emotions necessarily mean gold, it may be the burning up of mere rubbish; and that may burn for a whole lifetime, with nothing coming out of it because it is not done within the magic circle.

You see, the magic circle is really a circle of consciousness.

It means: I know what I am doing.

But there are emotions where people do not know what they are doing, and those are perfectly useless, simply waste; sure enough, there are any number of emotions that never produce a grain of gold.

Mrs. Crowley: But in the vision she does not know she is in a magic circle.

Dr. Jung: Ah well, this is only a vision, this is not actual life, we should not mix it up.

In her actual life this woman probably underwent a series of emotions and it is by no means sure that they were within the magic circle.

This vision has the purpose of teaching her that it is a sort of magic procedure, as you might have a dream telling you that what you were experiencing was not that you were losing your mind, but that you were undergoing an initiation.

Such dreams are frequent, and when you know that it is not mere madness but an initiation, you know you are within the circle, and then it has value.

As soon as an insane person has enough consciousness to learn what these things mean, he is saved, then he gets at the pure gold; for he then has an indestructible center which cannot be touched, he is aloof from the destructive scenes which happen round him.

I have treated such cases, people who had already been in the lunatic asylum and who were threatened with utter destruction, and I just happened to save them by making them conscious of what they had gone through and were still going through.

In that way I made a sort of magic circle of consciousness round them which held them together, they could then look at the things they experienced as objects.

That expressed itself in the fact that they could make drawings of certain hallucinations or moods.

And then they could say: "Ah, that is the thing which is against me, but I am different from it, I am not dissolved in it; I have that thing here on this paper and I myself have done it."

To put it on paper helps them to grasp it, to form a sort of protective circle round themselves, and then they are no longer identical with it.

This is the saving process which makes them able to rescue the indestructible substance from the waste of mere conflagration.

They hold themselves as if in a magic circle against the destructive influences of emotional fire.

You see, the danger of emotions is that they tear you limb from limb, and then they are just waste, but if you can hold yourself steady during the storm, if you know what is happening, even if you only know you are not in your sound senses, you have already won because you have a standpoint over against the senseless destruction.

Mrs. Sigg: Are people who seek emotions trying thus to overcome inertia?

Dr. Jung: It might have that purpose also, but that alone is not a sufficient reason, because if one is inert, one just indulges in it and is inert; one does not seek an emotion just to get rid of the inertia.

Miss Rogers: When a patient feels very emotional and cannot find the cause in outside circumstances, does that have anything to do with this refining process?

Dr. Jung: Whether the emotion is connected with things outside makes no difference.

There are emotions which start entirely from within, and others which start apparently from outside causes; sometimes the cause seems to be projected and sometimes it is clearly within, and in the unconscious it makes no difference at all.

Miss de Witt: Is the real sense of all burnt offerings that the impure things should be destroyed and the pure things go up to the gods?

Dr: Jung: Yes, that is the same idea, the burning up of the flesh, or of the vegetable, so that the living spirit shall escape-that which is supposed to be the living substance that causes the flesh to be.

The custom of burning the corpse is for that purpose; the man's soul ascends in the smoke to the city of the gods.

And is it not a custom with the Bataks to destroy the vessels and implements of the dead, in order that they may ascend with them?

Miss de Witt: I am not quite sure.

Dr: Jung: In certain African tribes, they break up the implements of a dead man for that purpose.

Miss de Witt: They put them on his grave?

Dr: Jung: No, they put them in the open market place, because the corpses are carried into the Bush for the hyenas to take care of.

And I think it is in Java, or Sumatra, that they break up the vessels to send after the ghosts.

There was the same idea in Egypt; they put those little clay figures of workmen into the grave of the pharaoh in order that their ghosts should continue to work for him in the fields of the next world; and they broke up the tools and implements, so that the ghosts of the tools could be used there.

Miss Hannah: Do you suppose that everybody has this indestructible quality if they could only see it?

Dr: Jung: Oh, I don't know, I am convinced that nature is accustomed to the greatest waste.

It is quite possible that certain lives are just nothing, no good, and they have to be tried out again. You must ask God.

But as long as we have to deal with human beings, we must assume that everybody has that flame within for which it is worthwhile to live.

We are in no way competent to judge about such a matter.

Dr: Schlegel: That is the Christian belief.

Dr: Jung: Yes, but it is not a Buddhist belief, they are much more hesitant, they believe in that long series of incarnations.

Buddha himself had about five hundred and seventy incarnations before he became the Buddha.

He went through all sorts of existences, because each time the existence was not quite valid.

He had to go through the animal state, the state of the grasshopper, and the monkey, for instance, in order to try all varieties of life, until he reached Buddhahood, which is the only form worth living. In the East the idea prevails that life is only relatively valuable, and if destroyed not much has been lost; so they lose their lives more easily than we do.

Now during that sort of alchemistic process, or witchcraft, our patient sees that beside the Indian woman stood a buffalo.

It is very curious that a buffalo should attend this alchemistic procedure.

Mr. Baumann: That is also an animal from the American soil.

Dr.Jung: Yes, it is a typically American animal, so it would represent the instinctual form oflibido, a totem animal, as it were.

It is as if the idea of the American soil were not sufficiently expressed by the human being, but needed also the typical American instinct as a sort of complement as if it ought to be there for the sake of completeness.

Do you remember any real magical procedure where the animal is present?

Mrs. Fierz: The birth of Christ.

Dr. Jung: That was not supposed to be exactly a magical procedure.

Mrs. Fierz: But without the father!

Dr. Jung: I wouldn’t call that just magical.

Mr. Henley: Nearly all the primitive tribes use animals, or skins of animals, in their magical rites. The Indians use snakes.

Dr. Jung: Yes, in many magic rites animals appear, often a black hen or a black dog, black animals denoting the chthonic character of the procedure; and animals are burned in order to feed the gods.

So there should be an animal and particularly a totem animal, the representative of the instincts really should be present.

You see, in practical psychology, there is always the great and important question for the analyst whether a series of emotions is really correct, whether it is in accordance with the instincts, that is.

If it is against the instincts it is all morbid waste, but if the instincts are with it, you know it is all right.

Whatever it is, it is along the line, those emotions belong, they are the right food, the correct magic procedure.

And instinct is usually represented by an animal-a dog, a horse, an elephant, for instance. In this case a buffalo is there as a sort of exponent indicating that it is correct, the emotion is backed up by the instinct.

A very peculiar symbol follows now.

She says: "Above them was a wall of snakes."

Above that scene where the witchcraft takes place in the presence of the buffalo, that is.

Unfortunately, I don't know how that looked exactly, we must just take the words.

Dr. Reichstein: The snake is a great contrast to the lion's head in the vision before. The symbols are now turned round, the snake is above and the fire is below; the fire, which is the energy of the lion's head, is now getting into the idol, everything is reversed.

Dr. Jung: That is right.

The snake is always supposed to be underneath; symbolic serpents are representatives of the night, or of the interior of the earth, or the darkness of the deep waters, so they are always down below.

And above is the fire, the sun, the radiant substance symbolized by the lion. Now through fire the sun is brought down to earth.

The original fire was the prerogative of the gods.

Then Prometheus stole that radiance, the sun fire, and gave it to human beings, therefore they could cheat the gods and make light in the darkness.

It must have been a marvellous discovery for them.

But they paid for it with the fear of the gods.

Now a snake is always a symbol of fear as well as of darkness, and if the lion's head is brought down, the fear is above; that is, when the wall of snakes is above them, the fire or sun must be underneath.

So a new sun is made, a radiant idol, and above it are the snakes.

But looked at from the outside one sees only a heap of snakes and not the thing that is happening underneath.

One encounters this idea in that typical myth, the night sea journey, where the sun hero is swallowed by the whale dragon, or the great sea serpent, and becomes invisible.

And there is the Egyptian myth of the ship of Ra that is encoiled by the serpent Apophisthe ship is caught in the coils of darkness.

It begins in the seventh hour of the night and the priests get up and sing hymns to support the hero in his struggle with the dark powers.

Finally at sunrise, the hero breaks through the darkness and appears again.

You see that is this situation with the snake above and the light below.

The same symbolism might be expressed in a different way.

You know, to work down in the pit with that chthonic primitive woman, inducing the fire of emotions, looking for emotions, is a sin against ideals.

You think you should not get emotional, for you are then unjust, immoral in a way, particularly when you know that you sought the emotion, made it yourself.

You hardly admit it, but you know in the corner of your heart that you brought it about, and then you have a bad conscience and the whole magic procedure seems immoral, as witchcraft is immoral, and you feel rotten.

you have fear above you, you are afraid that the revenge of the gods may strike you, as the sorcerer is always afraid that God can peep in somewhere and disturb his work or kill him.

Therefore the many legends like the story of Faust, who eventually is caught in his own magic-his treaty with the devil finally costs him his soul; in the original version-not the one by Goethe-his soul is seized by the devil when the treaty has expired.

So even if the philosopher’s stone, or the elixir vitae, or the gold, is the result of the magic procedure, you feel that it has been gained by an illegal procedure, by immorality; and so that whole process is always under the fear of God, the snake is always above.

It is nocturnal, it is the immorality of the night in opposition to the morality of the day. Therefore people are usually afraid of the unconscious because it brings up emotions, and they don’t want emotions; it is immoral, one should not have them.

Sure enough it is immoral if you consider other people, and you ought to consider other people.

Yet if you repress· your emotions, you can never get at them to purify them.

But the flame is eternal and emotions are hellfire, so that going through a long period of bad conscience is unavoidable.

If you can cope with it, you can cope with yourself; if you cannot cope with it, you avoid yourself, and the gold can never be produced.

So much for the snakes.

Now she continues: I heard a distant sound of thunder and saw a great herd of buffalo.

As they approached, the onyx pit closed over and the buffalo rushed over the ground where the pit had been and disappeared. I felt afraid and sat down to rest.

What is happening here? That is the end of the vision.

Mr. Baumann: I think it is just a proof that she needs to be in the pit because the instincts come rushing like a herd of buffalo.

Dr. Jung: Yes, it is all to the good that she is in the pit, otherwise she would be trampled to death; here the pit shows its protective quality.

And what does the rushing herd of buffalo mean?

One buffalo was there before, proving that the whole situation was all right as regards the instincts, but now instinct is rushing over her.

Mr. Baumann: I think instinct came from the outside as a sort of inflation.

Dr. Jung: Well, the point here is that instinct is never individual, it is always legion; whenever you are living according to the instincts you get into the collective, you cannot help it because instinct is collective.

Yet if you don't live that instinct, your life is wasted; so when you live with instinct you are all right, yet you are collective.

That she is taking a stand against instinct is, in a way, the reason why the buffalo are rushing over her.

One can say it is a sin against instinct when you assume a position that is conscious and cultural, and therefore she is attacked; the attempt at individuation brings about the onslaught of instinct.

That magic rite provokes the buffalo, and where there was one buffalo there is now a herd of them.

If you live with instinct you have instinct all over you; it is characteristic that it has the quality of spontaneous reaction, that it either works and goes the whole hog, or it does not work at all.

So if you touch upon instinct you are in the devil's claws; it easily runs away with you, and then you are just a piece of the collective and are under the collective law.

And woe unto you, because you are then dismembered by Titanic forces and your attempt at individuation means nothing.

But if you succeed in hiding in that magic pit, the onrush of the collective can pass you by, you are protected.

The symbolism is very clear, but the question is, how do you bring it down to practical psychology?

Mrs. Fierz: Does not the difference lie in being inside or outside the magic circle? One buffalo is inside the magic circle. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 1047-1062

21 June 1933 Visions Seminar LECTURE VIII

Here is a question by Mrs. Rey: "From the viewpoint of the student, it frequently feels as if one's instincts were divided for and against a given experience; won't you please explain this?"

I am afraid I cannot explain it; it just is so.

It is as if you asked me to explain why there were elephants. I don't know.

It is a fact that instincts are divided against each other.

You see, our basic nature is not a oneness; it is, you could almost say, a multitude of the most contradictory instincts or impulses.

The very basis of our nature is the pairs of opposites, and pairs of opposites are instinctive, they are just spontaneous facts.

Of course, we can explain why they must be: there would be no energy, no libido, without the pairs of opposites.

It is indisputable that there must be a potential and that can only be where there are opposites, without high and low it is perfectly obvious that no water can run.

So the idea of the pairs of opposites is simply a philosophic formulation of the fact that the instincts are divided against each other; there is absolutely no biological situation where those opposing instincts are not operating.

One sees it even in the case of the [contraction] of the muscles-it is the basic fact of the so-called antagonistic enervation.

For instance, to extend your arm seems like a simple motion characterized by oneness of purpose, but that is by no means true, because in the same movement by which you extend your arm, you also enervate your flexor muscles.

Or if you bend your arm, you feel at the same time your biceps getting contracted on account of that antagonistic principle.

This principle of antagonistic enervation is valid throughout the whole of our nature; the structure of the body is built upon it, and the idea of the pairs of opposites is simply another formulation of this fact.

The instincts are also built upon the fact of opposites; there are always the counter instincts, at the moment of supreme joy one wants to die, and so on.

Therefore the French have that proverb: Les extremes se touchent, for the counter instinct is always right there.

And therefore the law of enantiodromia: when a thing comes to a certain culmination, it won't stay there; the culmination turns over into its own opposite, like the course of the sun, like day and night.

Now Mrs. Rey asks: "In such a case could it be that automatic oppose instinctive processes?" They are exactly the same, automatic processes are instinctive processes. A certain automatic functioning is characteristic of instinct.

The next question is by Mrs. Crowley: "Do instincts themselves go through a transforming process in relation to the individual? Or was the situation where the lady of our visions sought shelter from the buffalo in the pit characteristic of the relationship between instincts and the emotions, which you emphasized last week? Would you say that the Eastern attitude was an attempt to make consciousness the guide of instincts, and the Western way to use instincts as a sort of fuel for consciousness?"

To the first question I would say that instincts in themselves do not undergo a transformation, they remain what they always were, their basis will be always the same.

People who think that they can sublimate themselves until they become volatile substance commit a great error.

You will remain what you are in that respect, there is simply no ghost of a chance that your body and its forces will ever become different, except through age.

Age is the only factor that really can change the functioning of your instincts or the condition of your body.

Of course you can drug yourself, or poison yourself, but if the body functions normally, it will remain practically the same and its instincts too; there is no such thing as sublimation.

Yet there seems to be a transformation, and all the symbols we have dealt with in this series of visions point to such a transforming process.

But this is something like the transformation of rock that contains gold in very fine distribution.

You don’t see the gold in the rock, you see only the stone, but if you treat the rock with different chemicals, if you destroy it as it is completely, change its form altogether, you are able to extract gold from it, and you call this procedure chemical transformation, the original stuff having now become gold.

Well, you get several grains of gold out of a big lump of rock, but they are by no means the whole rock, that still exists, though it is now only a heap of ashes or oxide. It has changed its condition, yes, but the matter which once contained the gold is still all there, only you have now separated the gold from the original substance; naturally something has happened yet nothing has really disappeared.

So the original unconscious primitive condition of man is a sort of rock that contains gold, and if you put that body through a chemical-or in this case psychological-treatment, the rock will yield the gold; that is an analogy for the so-called transformation of instincts.

You simply separate certain instincts that were contained in the original unconscious, you lift them up into consciousness, and so you naturally change the original condition of the primitive man-he becomes conscious; consciousness is the gold that has been contained in the unconscious, but so distributed that it was invisible.

There is a lot of gold in the unconscious of primitive man; his unconscious is different from ours, and it shows far more signs of vitality.

Our unconscious still occasionally behaves in the same way, but only when we are as unconscious as primitive man remains continuously.

Through the process of civilization you slowly bring out all the gold and other precious metals that were contained in the original unconsciousness; the philosopher’s stone, the diamond, the gold, the elixir vitae, the fluid that makes you immortal, etc., all these are symbols for the various substances extracted from that rock of original unconsciousness.

Through that process things surely change, but if you make a solution of the gold and pour it into the heap of ashes, in time it will again form a rock as before.

So if you allow your conscious to be dissolved, you will create again the original unconsciousness, because everything is there.

In this respect we have not transformed the instincts, we have only taken out of them something which they contained.

For instinct is the unconscious mental functioning of man, in which there are possibilities of extracting the gold of consciousness.

The next question is very involved.

Mrs. Crowley asks about the situation characteristic of the relationship between the instincts and emotions.

Mrs. Crowley: You spoke last week of emotions being only useful when together with the instincts, and I wondered whether being sheltered from them in the pit would be considered a negative aspect towards the instincts.

Dr: Jung: You can never extract the gold if you don't shelter yourself against the instincts.

To extract a chemical body, you must put it into a retort, sever its connection with nature.

If you leave the rock in its geological strata, in its natural continuity, you will never get at the gold; you must break it out of its continuity, pound it up, and put the pieces into the retort for the chemical procedure to take place.

And so to create consciousness you must create a shelter from the onslaught of the unconscious; otherwise you will be dissolved in unconsciousness.

Therefore the very first thing you learn in analysis is to make a difference between yourself and emotions.

If you cannot make that difference you are their prey, you are all the time a wild animal, simply dissolved in unconsciousness.

You must first seek that place where you are safe from them, so that you can say: I am here and that is my emotion.

Then you are beyond manipura, you are in anahata, the center above the diaphragm in the Tantric yoga system, and there you have the first glimpse of the Purusha.

You may have an emotion but you are not the emotion; there is an emotion about you, but you are not identical with it.

One of the first results of analysis, as I said, is that one learns this, not mentally but by heart-one tries to carry it out.

That corresponds to what the chemist does in trying to extract the gold from its chemical concatenation.

Mrs. Crowley's second question is: "Would you say that the Eastern attitude was an attempt to make consciousness the guide of instincts, and the Western to use instincts as a sort of fuel for consciousness?"

I would say that the Eastern attitude was not an attempt to make consciousness the guide of instincts, but the opposite, to make instincts the guide of consciousness.

The great asset of the East is that they are based upon instinct.

We are always trying to make consciousness the guide of instincts, to say what is good for us, what one ought to do for the instincts.

We think the best use one can make of an erotic excitement is to play the piano, or get interested in a charity, to transform one's sexuality into Christian love.

This is what we do in the West, but it is just what they do not do in the East.

Everything is clearly based upon the instincts there, particularly in China. That is just the difference.

You can say that the Western point of view is to be on top, to use instincts, not only to guide them wisely by consciousness, but also to use them as a sort of fuel for consciousness.

We try to exhaust instincts and instinctual powers for the increase of consciousness.

For instance, we not only play the piano but we also learn to play the piano, and we read books and go to lectures with our sexuality, and by these means we increase our consciousness.

To our Western minds this is very wise counsel as to what to do with the instincts.

But this is all due to our extraordinary hubris; we think consciousness is all, and will power is all.

The proverb: "Where there is a will there's a way" shows this crazy hubris of our Western attitude; we think we can prescribe a way to nature.

The Eastern point of view is that the way of nature is the only way, what they call in China the ordinances of heaven, or the harmony between heaven and earth.

They are too much on that side as we are too much on the other.

The truth lies between.

The question to which Mrs. Rey alluded, for instance, the fact of the contradiction of instinct, forces us to use consciousness.

For if we are left to the play of instincts we are simply left to the unconscious, to the eternal enantiodromia, the pairs of opposites, clashes and unaccountable changes-that is the way our life would roll on.

We need consciousness in order to create at least a trace of civilization.

We show our knowledge of danger in that respect in our punctilious politeness; we greet each other in order to assure one another that we have quite friendly intentions.

The moment somebody we know does not greet us, we assume that there is a hostile tendency behind it, we are grieved and assume that something must .be wrong; therefore-particularly on the Continent-we are so careful about handshaking.

"He didn’t even shake hands with me" means that he didn’t show his hand, he held it behind his back and might have a gun or a knife in it.

Or if he kept his hand in his pocket it would mean: "Go to hell, you don’t know whether I have a gun in my pocket."

Both hands must be shown.

In America you are by no means so polite as we are because you are far more optimistic about your neighbor’s intentions.

The Eastern greeting is to bow and raise both hands, meaning: "I have no weapons," it is quite clear.

The primitive man is terribly afraid that a sudden emotion might burst out and sweep him off his feet.

He is far more violent than we are, so he is more polite; he is exceedingly particular in that respect.

When two armed men of different tribes meet in the wilderness, they have absolutely no hostile intentions because they are profoundly afraid of each other, they stand still at a great distance.

As you are very wise to do when you see a wild animal of whose intentions you are not aware; every animal stands still and observes, and then decides.

So if those armed men stand still, they show their hand, they are not going to attack-it is always a kind of assurance that they have friendly intentions.

Then they slowly approach each other and put down their weapons, which takes a long time, and then they move away from their weapons and sit down at a distance of about six yards, and begin to speak in a soft low voice, because raising the voice means that there is fire in the roof, danger.

In the palavers they always talk in a low voice and in a sitting position.

If you are sitting down quietly you are supposed to be reasonable, while if you stand up one never knows when you are going to jump.

The moment you get up and raise your voice, slaves come along with their whips and beat you down; otherwise there would be bloodshed.

There is always the danger that they will lose their heads and fall into an emotion; they are still so close to the unconscious that their contradictory and paradoxical instincts might get hold of them; they themselves are terribly afraid of it and try by every means to liberate themselves from their emotions.

That is why we need and are grateful for consciousness, why consciousness is gold.

A person having no consciousness, who is only emotional, is a public danger, one never knows what next; but if he can inform people that he is in a bad mood and not to come anywhere near him, they are grateful for the warning and can stay away.

In the man who can say: "I am angry and dangerous," you know there is a superior being who realizes what that other fellow is up to, and might interfere; he might say, "Now don't do that."

Otherwise people are simply left to the fear of dealing with something utterly unaccountable.

We should not undervalue consciousness.

We have to be critical of it only because we make too much of this power, and so we deviate from nature and have to pay for it.

For the moment we think we can make use of instincts, that we can guide them, tell them what they ought to do, we commit the crime of idiocy.

Now Miss de Witt asks: "You said the animal part is necessary as a completion of the spiritual. Is that why the black poodle appears to Faust when he calls the devil? And is that why there are lizards, snakes, toads, etc., in the witch's cauldron in Macbeth?"

Well, it is just an opposition, a pair of opposites; inasmuch as something spiritual exists there is something animal.

Miss de Witt really answers her own question when she mentions the black poodle in Faust, you remember the devil disguised himself in that form.

She also suggests the lizards and snakes and toads in the witch's cauldron in Macbeth as an example.

But where is the spirit there? You only have the animal counterpart.

Miss de Witt: In the spirit of prophecy. Dr. Jung: That is perfectly true, that is the spirit in the animal kingdom, animals can prophesy.

Miss de Witt: The witches also prophesy, they know the future.

Dr: Jung: Ah, yes, to that extent they are spiritual, they also can prophesy.

Have you ever seen animals that could prophesy the future?

Miss de Witt: They prophesy the weather.

Mrs. Fierz: They know death beforehand.

Remark: And fire and shipwrecks.

Dr. Jung: Yes, and earthquakes and storms they know ahead in a miraculous way.

Mr. Allemann: And the seasons.

Dr. Jung: Well, the seasons would be more habit, but they can foresee events that are not in the regular order of things.

That is the spiritual in the animal, as Faust would represent something like the spirit and the poodle would be the corresponding animal part.

One sees the Western attitude to instinct in that famous verse when the poodle appears to Faust, and he says: Dem Hunde wenn er gut gezogen, Wird selbst ein weisen IVIann gewogen.

This means that a wise man feels friendly to a dog that is well bred, that has manners.

That is the attitude of our Western consciousness: we are always above, we think we must educate nature and give it manners; we condescend to nature.

But when Faust touched the poodle, he only just escaped; it was a very close call, the devil almost caught hold of him.

In the original legend he did catch him.

That animals have the gift of prophecy is by no means just a mystical belief, it is a fact.

This is the recognition of the spirit in the animal, and you can carry that hypothesis further; Miss de Witt asks whether animals can be parts of our own psychology, so I will tell you the case of a man I knew years ago.

He was not my patient, but a colleague who had had the misfortune to go stark mad, he had been in a lunatic asylum with an attack of schizophrenia.

I met him quite accidentally, not knowing his past, and he told me that he had had such an attack but was now entirely cured.

I was a bit suspicious and asked him about all the details of his disease in order to see whether he was really cured, whether he had insight enough to know if a thing were true or not.

He told me that the thing that had troubled him particularly during his illness was that he had been constantly visited by mice.

I thought this was quite possible, because in lunatic asylums there are always a lot of mice; the lunatics leave bread crumbs and other things about which attract them, so we always kept cats in our clinic.

But he said he noticed that these mice did not behave naturally.

He described them as doing all sorts of impossible things, so he thought they were sort of experimental mice that had been trained by the director in his laboratory to make tests on the patients, to see how they would react; he said he himself had been observed by the doctors who used invisible rays to see his reactions.

I said: "But you do not really believe that?" "Oh no, I know now that the mice only did what ordinary mice would do, but I must say that there was one mouse who really behaved in a most extraordinary way."

I asked if he was absolutely certain that this one mouse was not a doctor mouse, and in that sense of the word he was really certain that one mouse behaved in an uncanny way.

Of course that was a remnant of his disease.

And now suppose you were in an ordinary frame of mind and were just thinking of a certain book, when a mouse entered your room and ran up and settled on that very book.

Would you assume that it behaved as if it were part of your psychology? Would that be possible?

Answer: Yes.

Dr. Jung: Now who is for and who is against this idea?

Well, the majority of so-called educated people believe that this lunatic was quite right in his assumption, and I must confess I am with the majority.

I think that under certain conditions, animals behave as if they were parts of human psychology.

Miss Hannah: Dogs do.

Dr. Jung: Ah yes, because they are always in the atmosphere of man, so it is more possible that they should be affected by them, particularly when they have a good rapport with the master or with a situation.

But I do know other cases where dogs have behaved in a very inexplicable way, that is true; also creatures that are not domesticated, a beetle or a bird or a fox, for example.

Primitives are absolutely convinced of the fact that animals do things which only human beings are supposed to do, and I have met a number of educated people who were deeply convinced of this fact that animals act at times as if they were parts of our psychology.

Professor Wilhelm told me of a case that made a tremendous impression on him when he was in China.

He heard of a girl who was possessed by a fox spirit.

Now a fox spirit is a sort of witchlike spirit, it is a traditional idea that such fox spirits were the equivalent of witches; they are able to revive the dead body of a woman, for instance, to bring her back into life.

There is a Chinese love story where a man falls in love with a fox woman.

And Garnett's Lady into Fox contains the same idea, that woman was a fox spirit.

Now that a Chinese girl was supposed to be possessed by a fox spirit would not in itself have been an occasion for Wilhelm to investigate the case, because he knew that the attacks of any hysterical individual would have been explained in the same way, but the curious fact was that in this case the fox spirit was visible, it came almost every day and one could see it, so everybody told him.

So finally he went to that village and as he approached, he really saw a fox upon the wall of the courtyard near the house.

He went up and waved his stick at it, but the fox stayed quietly on the wall, and only when he came quite near did it walk slowly along the wall and disappear.

It was a real fox, and whenever it approached, the girl in the house had hysterical attacks.

This is an almost unbelievable story, but Professor Wilhelm was quite firm in saying that he himself had seen it.

It confirms absolutely what primitives say, that certain individuals have a connection with certain animals, either a friendly or a hostile connection.

Such experiences are really the basis for the totemic beliefs.

Mr. Henley: The nervous cat fear, the actual psychological reaction to an unseen cat by certain women, is a very good example of that.

Dr: Jung: It is characteristic of women that they are afraid of cats.

Mr. Henley: I mean where the two are invisible to each other. I have actually seen such cases.

Dr: Jung: That is like animals' premonitions; they behave very queerly when an earthquake or a thunderstorm is coming.

I could tell you a lot of recognized facts.

Now Miss de Witt asks me how animals, that usually cannot be domesticated, can nevertheless occasionally live with man; she mentions the case of a man in Java who had a poisonous snake and a grown-up tiger as domestic pets.

That is very unusual, but I know another case of a rather big boa constrictor that was kept in a private house in England.

Once in the night it escaped and disappeared, but after about a fortnight it came back and the man took a snapshot of it as it was crawling up the steps; the snake apparently had a rapport with him like a dog or cat.

Also tigers and bears can establish a positive relation to man.

I think it is quite possible, on account of that peculiar participation mystique which may exist between a man and an animal.

Don't forget that the animal is living in the same unconsciousness as we, to a certain extent we are in the same psychical world as animals.

Herodotus speaks of "man and the other animals."

And primitive man never assumes that he is the highest form of animal; the elephant and the boa constrictor-or the python and the lion are all higher, and then comes man, and then the apes, and so on, which simply expresses the fact that in relatively primitive circumstances man is still aware of his participation mystique with animals.

Inasmuch as participation mystique is possible among human beings, it is also quite possible among animals.

So when two people have a certain thought at the same moment it is participation mystique, or parallelism, synchronicity; and, likewise, you may think a certain thing and then the dog does it, as if he had been aware of your thoughts.

Such things happen not only with animals, they can also happen with inanimate objects; facts or events occur in accordance with your fantasy.

For example, a certain thought comes into your head quite suddenly and when the newspaper appears, there it is printed.

Or you come across a very rare word or name, and the same day you see it in a book which you have had in your library all the time.

These things happen constantly.

There is a book by a very learned zoologist named Kammerer, a professor in Vienna, which is called Das Gesetz der Serie,'the law of the series.

He gives numerous very striking examples of the parallelism of events, synchronicity.

He is inclined to believe that things even prefer to happen in a series, an idea that is quite beyond the law of causality, and he substantiates his point of view by a number of most remarkable examples.

You see that is simply the expression of the fact that the collective unconscious is one; there is no such thing as my collective unconscious, it is all inclusive.

And moreover it is, one could say, the psychic counterpart of the outside world; what you see outside in your surroundings is also the collective unconscious seen from without.

You may see the collective unconscious within, as if it were in yourself, but you may also see it outside-in outer happenings.

So in what you call your own unconscious you know something of the general condition, and that explains why man has at times so-called supernormal perception or knowledge.

No wonder that animals have the same.

We must now go on with our text, where the problem of the instincts was represented by the symbol of the herd of buffalo rushing over the pit.

This describes a condition in which a certain place of safety is reached, a defense against the emotional forces, which are of course practically the same as instinctual forces-a chaotic multitude of impulses, emotions, and fears.

Now after reaching such a place of safety, it is inevitable by the law of enantiodromia that there must be a change, for it makes no sense to hide in a protected place when there is no danger.

To have reached safety is almost a provocation, as if you had left the field free for the onslaught; having retired within your walls, the attack can take place.

That theme is the beginning of the next vision.

It is called "The Market Place." What would you expect that to be in a general way?

Mr. Baumann: It is a symbol of extreme collectivity.

Dr. Jung: Exactly. The market place is the symbol of the crowd par excellence.

Our patient says: The herd of buffalo thundered by leaving a great cloud of dust. In the dust were many small snakes with the tails of fishes. In their mouths they held germs. A great mist arose, I could find no way to go beyond. The onrush of the instincts leaves a cloud of dust, which is like a great mist.

What does a mist or a cloud of dust mean psychologically?

Mrs. Baumann,· Things are not clear, there is confusion.

Dr: Jung: Yes, blurred, no clear outlines, therefore it is characteristic of a state of semi-consciousness.

You know when you have undergone the onslaught of a powerful emotion, you are left dazed or only half conscious.

Why is that so?

Mrs. Fierz: It is a lack of energy.

Dr: Jung: Partially that, because a great deal of energy has been wasted, but even in a state of great weakness one can be fully conscious.

The unavoidable consequence of an onslaught of emotion is that one is swept under by the unconscious, a wave of emotion is always a wave of the collective unconscious.

One is first submerged and afterwards one is left standing with half one’s body in the water.

Our patient then discovers that in that cloud of dust, which represents the dazed feeling, are many small snakes with the tails of fishes. What does that mean?

Mrs. Baumann: You spoke of the snakes last time as meaning fear, and the fishes would mean that her fears are half in the unconscious too.

Dr: Jung: Yes, in the vision before there was a wall of snakes above her, and now apparently these small snakes are in the air, in that cloud of dust.

That they are not ordinary snakes is shown by the fact that they have fishes’ tails, which, as Mrs. Baumann says, would mean half-unconscious fears.

A fishes’ tails belong to the water, that would refer to the wave of the collective unconscious which has brought up its contents, consisting of animals that are half terrestrial and half fishes; they are half-conscious fears, indistinct.

In their mouths they hold germs, and it is obvious from the later text that these are germs of plants.

What about that?

Mr. Henley: There is a possibility of life.

Dr: Jung: Besides the fact of fear, there is the possibility of new life arising from these unconscious contents.

So we have three attributes, the fishes' tails, the snake's body, and the germs they bring.

Holding the germs in their mouths is like the little olive branch brought by the dove that Noah sent out from his ark.

After the great flood comes the animal that brings the symbol of hope or expectation, the hope of land where plants will grow.

She continues: "I walked around the circle of rock feeling for a way of escape. There was none."

There is apparently no way out of the locality in which she finds herself.

That refers to the pit of onyx, and a little later in the vision it becomes obvious that that is in the center of the circle of rocks.

So it is really a mandala in which she is enclosed, almost as if she were a prisoner in it; that place of safety seems to be at the same time a prison from which she cannot escape.

As long as she is in that prison she is safe from the buffalo, but as soon as she tries to get out of it the danger begins.

At last I came to an iron gate which was shut. It would not open.

The mist cleared away and I saw that the rocks had become green.

Green denotes life, hope again, the plants begin to grow.

It is only an allusion, but the mist has cleared away and the situation looks more hopeful because she has discovered a way out, an iron gate.

That means that she can leave this condition provided she has the key to the gate.

"In the center of the circle where the pit of onyx had been grew a palm tree."

So we were right in the assumption that those germs were not destructive, but germs of life by which the rocks had become green.

And what about the palm tree growing in the center?

Mrs. Fierz: It is a movement upward.

Dr. Jung: She has somehow gotten out of the pit.

The pit, the depression, vanishes and instead of that hole there is now a tree.

But how can the pit transform into a tree?

Mr. Henley: The pit and its contents have gone over to their opposite, the spiritual side.

Dr. Jung: Yes, the tree would be in every respect the opposite of the pit of onyx.

Onyx is as dead as any inanimate thing can be; moreover the pit is hollow, while the tree branches out and fills space, it rises in the air, it is alive.

So this is an enantiodromia again: instead of the dead hole, like a grave, there is life; it is as if something had been in that pit just in order to make roots and to grow.

How do you explain this change?

Mrs. Baumann: The yoga tree has grown up.

Dr. Jung: Oh yes, but how do you explain that this tree grows at all?

Something must have happened.

Dr. Schlegel: Is it the effect of the buffalo perhaps?

Dr. Jung: I should say that that was not in vain.

Dr. Reichstein: There has been a union between matter and spirit, one could say etween a living person and the dead matter of the pit.

One could call it a tomb. And out of this union comes new life, it is like a child coming out of her.

Dr. Jung: Exactly, that onyx pit is the crater of rebirth.

She performed a magic ceremonial in it-holding the figure in the fire-and in that way she herself, or something in her, is transformed; it is no longer a pit or a grave, it now lives.

Yet it is not the life of the warm-blooded animal, it is not a human life, it is plant life.

That is an irrational compromise, one could call it, between the absolutely alive warm-blooded animal and the absolutely dead thing, the onyx; between the two is the plant, the spirit, the result of this strange union.

But the herd of buffalo thundering over the pit must also be a part of the transformation mystery.

What would be the effect of that?

Mrs. Schlegel: It is an afflux of new power, and she did not identify with it.

Dr: Jung: Well yes, but one could not call it just an afflux of power, because no additional power is given by it.

It is more a test to see whether the pit is really a safe place.

The fact that these emotions can assail the place of safety without destroying it is an asset, it makes the thing real.

So it has a sort of magic effect, as if a primitive said: "Let the buffalo walk over it to try out its strength."

If a herd of buffalo can go over a bridge without breaking it down, one knows that it is safe, it will hold.

There are many primitive fertility rites where walking over a thing is supposed to make it strong or to fertilize it.

Dancing is part of the fertility rites and in some of them they belabor the earth, they work it with their heels; it is a sort of impregnation of the earth with human libido, the earth is beaten or trodden upon in order to put themselves into it.

The same idea is expressed in the old Germanic custom of cohabitating in the field; in the spring the peasant goes out into the field at night with his wife, and by that cohabitation the fields are fertilized.

So the herd of buffalo had a sort of magic effect in that they test the safety of the place;

it has gained prestige, medicine power, by virtue of the ability to withstand the instincts.

As the sword that has killed has thereby secured prestige; it is a man-killer, it is now different from any other sword, it has beaten or stabbed an enemy to death and has become a mana sword; one can be sure it will kill again.

Therefore this is a magic pit-the onslaught of the buffalo has given it a particular prestige, and what seemed to be a grave or a prison transforms into a tree.

The movement, the mood, is no longer depressive, a sinking condition, becoming slowly black; it is now rising.

These movements are also expressed in the dance, the collapsing and then the coming up and unfolding.

The original roots of all language were expressions of such movements.

Language is also a sort of motor phenomenon, speech is a dance; you imitate the movements of nature as you imitate the noises of nature.

So the primordial roots for such concepts as shining, or rising, or welling up, are very similar; if you want to inform yourself about this, you can find a lot of examples of the etymology of words in my Psychology of the Unconscious.

For instance, the root word ba, which has just that meaning, is the positive word that describes a movement like the unfolding of the peacock's tail.

When the visions of our patient began to unfold, in the very beginning, there was one of the peacock unfolding his tail.

It is just that hopeful movement, extension, expansion, as when your lungs fill with air, when your heart breathes freely, when you can move, when you embrace space.

And the other mood is the collapse, the dragon, coldness, darkness, sinking down into a pit.

That expresses itself also in many speech metaphors.

One says in a painful situation: "I could have sunk into the ground." Or when one is ashamed of something: "I wanted to hide in a mouse hole."

The collapsing movement is also expressed by typical root words.

Now the palm tree stands in the center of that rock wall, so it reminds one at once of the tree growing in the center of the mandala, and that always symbolizes the development which takes place in stages, moving up in a sort of spiral.

It is the yoga tree, whose first shoot is the green leaf or the bud in muladhara, or Shiva in the dormant condition.

This is an entirely different psychological experience.

We are used to the psychology of the warm-blooded animals but we are not used to the psychology of the plant.

Yet it is a strange fact that spiritual development, the impersonal life of man, the life beyond his personal psychology, is symbolized by plant life.

And this kind of life must follow other laws, or it has its own particular laws, which are quite different from the mentality of the personal warm-blooded life.

Mrs. Baumann: I was just wondering why specially a palm tree? Would that emphasize peace in contrast to the stampede?

Dr. Jung: Yes, but that is not so important as the fact that the palm tree is a very perfect symbol of the root ba; the leaves have a movement like a fountain, and like the peacock's tail.

Therefore the palm tree is often chosen to symbolize the expansion of life.

She goes on: I went toward it and found at the foot of the tree a small image. I took it and hurled it against the gate. The gate swung open.

Now what has she found?

Dr. Reichstein: The Mexican image.

Dr. Jung: It is probably again some such primitive image, but we should know what it means and whether we have any parallels.

Mr. Baumann: Roots are a means of opening doors.

Mr. Allemann: That is the Alraun.

Dr. Jung: Yes. In English it is the mandrake or the mandragora, and the root often has a forked shape like a badly drawn little man, it is quite irregular.

There are still old specimens in museums which were used for magic purposes.

There is a particular legend about that.

The mandrake is supposed to be the connection of dead matter with the living man, without the intermediary of a woman.

The story is that when a man is hanged, his semen drops down under the gallows and impregnates the earth, and in that place grows the mandrake, which is half plant and half human.

Now if anyone pulls up that mandrake in the night of the new moon, it gives such a hellish shriek that the person dies of sheer terror, so nobody dares to pull that root out of the ground.

Instead, they take a black dog, fasten its tail to the root, and then offer it a piece of bread, having first stopped up their ears with cotton wool.

Of course the dog leaps at the bread and out comes the mandrake with a terrific shriek, and the dog dies.

But they have not heard it so they can take it. It is also called the Springwurzel, the root that makes all doors and locks spring open.

It grows under the gallows tree, and is the child of the magic intercourse between the dying man and the earth, inanimate matter.

Now this image is also found under the tree, and here is a very peculiar analogy.

What I have described to you of the Alraun-that it opens locked doors-is the negative aspect of a very positive thing, for at the root of the tree is found the hero child, the savior child, the great treasure, or at least the snake or dragon that guards the treasure.

In the legend of the Buddha it is the sacred boddhi tree that bends its branches down over Maya when she brings forth the Buddha.

The same image is in Spitteler's Prometheus, where the shepherd boy hides his jewel under the nut tree and its branches bend down to guard it.

All these are parallels for this image at the foot of the tree.

Now what is it? Either in its negative or its positive aspect? What is this Springwurzel? What is the jewel that opens gates, that helps this woman to leave the magic circle, showing her that it is by no means a prison?

Mrs. Sigg: The symbol.

Dr. Jung: Yes, but that is too vague.

Perhaps you can find some other analogy in Tantrism, which always gives us a chance to formulate such things.

Mrs. Crowley: Would it not be a sort of anahata attitude?

Dr. Jung: One thinks of the anahata attitude as being free from emotions, but would one be free from emotions in that circle?

You see it is not freedom in the emotions, it is away from the emotions; you gain your freedom by incarcerating yourself in a pit.

But this little magic figure is the way to unconditioned freedom.

Mrs. Baumann: The jewel and the child are symbols for the Self.

Dr. Jung: Yes, they symbolize the Self or the Purusha.

Now to what extent would that mean freedom?

Mrs. Baumann: It is detachment from collectivity in a certain way.

Dr. Jung: The point is not to be detached from collectivity or from emotions.

It means being in collectivity, having emotions, and yet being free.

Mrs. Baumann: It is an indestructible center, and that gives freedom.

Dr. Jung: Yes, but how is it psychologically possible that the Self can give freedom?

Mr. Allemann: Because one is no longer identical with the emotions.

Dr. Jung: Ah yes, but that is freedom from emotions; we want to know how you can live with emotions.

Mr. Allemann: Freedom to live emotions without identifying with them.

Dr. Jung: But how is that possible for the Self?

Dr. Bahadurji: Because the Self is freedom, and freedom is the Self.

Dr. Jung: Well, the inherent idea of the Self being freedom is that the Self comes to life in the detachment from the emotions, and shows its freedom by being undisturbed by emotions.

So the Self means a sort of impersonal condition which enables you to be not only detached from emotions but to be emotional, to be unaffected within the turmoil.

It means that you are always conscious of your own identity and know that you can never be other than yourself.

You can never lose yourself, you can never be alienated from yourself, because you know that the Self is indestructible; it is always one and the same, it cannot be dissolved nor can it be exchanged for anything else, and thus it enables you to remain the same through all conditions of life.

Now this does not mean that, by simply knowing of the idea of the Self, that will all be true, that things really happen like that; this is merely the idea of it, what one says of it.

It is perfectly logical and it is quite certain that if things behave accordingly, they will be like that, but it takes a long time and a long education before it comes about.

In India it takes the whole yoga training to bring out that identity with oneself which never allows one to exchange oneself for anything else.

This interpretation is substantiated by the subsequent text.

The next development is that she is leaving the magic circle, and she discovers that beyond the magic circle is New York.

She walks into Wall Street and is at once in a most uncomfortable situation, because the skyscrapers are all wobbling about and clashing against each other like the great clashing rocks in the legend, and she has to dodge through that turmoil. Carl Jung, The Visions Seminar, Page 1063-1078

LECTURE VI 14 November 1934 Zarathustra

Dr. Jung:

We were occupied last time with the symbol of the eagle and the snake, and we said that it was rather unusual and a bit abnormal that the serpent should be coiled round the neck of the eagle.

They are usually represented as opponents and the eagle holds the serpent in its claws- it is the general idea of the conflict between Yang and Yin, or between spirit and matter.

And as a rule, during the age of the fishes and perhaps earlier, reaching back to 2000 B.C., the result of the battle is that the serpent is overcome by the eagle: the spirit wins out against matter.

But one learns from Chinese philosophy that that is not always so; it might be reversed.

We are inclined to believe that the spirit is much better than the flesh, and that the flesh or matter deserves to be eaten by the spirit; but one comes across cases where it is rather doubtful whether that is commendable.

One even concludes from certain experiences that it is not really desirable.

I have here two interesting cases where that symbolism of the eagle carrying the serpent round its neck was discovered by other people besides Nietzsche.

The first contribution I owe to Mr. Baumann who is generous enough to let us see some of his pictures, where the fate of the serpent-or the achievement of the eagle-is demonstrated.

It is the story of the relationship of the spiritual and the material principle as a part of the inner development, the drama interieur.

One can call it a sort of initiation process.

Or one can also express it in a reversed way, that all the initiation processes we know from history or by experience are the external manifestation of a natural inner process which is always happening in the mind.

And our dreams are like windows that allow us to look in, or to listen in, to that psychological process which is continually going on in our unconscious.

It is a process of continuous transformation with no end if we don’t interfere.

It needs our conscious interference to bring it to a goal-by our interference we make a goal.

Otherwise, it is like the eternal change of the seasons in nature, a building up and a pulling down, integration and disintegration without end.

No crops are brought home by nature; only the consciousness of man knows about crops.

He gathers the apples under the trees, for they simply disintegrate if left to themselves.

And that is true of our unconscious mental process: it revolves within itself.

It builds up and it pulls down; it integrates and disintegrates-and then integrates again.

It is like the seasons, or the eternal sunrise and sunset, from which nothing comes unless a human consciousness interferes and realizes the result.

Perhaps one suddenly sees something and says, "This is a flower!"

Now we have reached something. But left to itself the process would come to nothing.

You can see that in cases of schizophrenia.

If you follow the dreams of a person who is definitely insane, you see the treasure growing up to the surface, almost to integration, and you realize that if in this moment that fellow could grasp it, or only lift a finger, he would have it and everything would be all right.

But in the next moment it sinks down again for nine years, nine months, nine weeks, and nine days, and it is gone.

Nobody can reach it.

It is exactly the same in a normal person; there are the same revelations without any issue if the conscious doesn't interfere and grasp the treasure brought up on the wave of the unconscious. [Slides are shown.]

Mr. Baumann has looked in through the window and painted some of the pictures presented by the unconscious.

Here is the eagle with the snake, and the figure of a boy is hovering over the water seeking the heart in the water.

This is of course a particular case; the discovery of feeling in a man is a special problem.

The heart in the water cannot be discovered as long as the snake is also in the water.

To enable the boy to find the heart, the snake has to be brought up into the sky or the air. If the two are together, then the heart is the heart of the snake, the feeling is identical with the snake.

Therefore, Yin must be taken out of its element, the cold, waterlike condition of the unconscious.

Afterwards follows a fight between the eagle and the serpent as of course they are not on good terms with each other.

An almost identical symbol exists in Indian mythology.

Mrs. Zinno was so kind as to call my attention to the myth of the Garuda and the Naga, and I have here a picture of Vishnu enthroned upon the Garuda, the snake-killing bird.

The Garuda is the mind bird, a sort of demoniacal eagle, usually represented with feathers and wings.

The Nagas were probably not only serpent-demons; they may also have represented the snake worshippers, a lower stratum of the population, probably of Dravidian origin, autochthonous inhabitants of India who were uprooted or wiped out by the Aryan invaders.'

The Aryans would be the eagles, the air, heaven people that fell upon the dark colored, rather primitive Dravidic population.

Other autochthonous tribes also have such a chthonic form of worship: the Hopi Indians in America for example, who are not nomadic but town-building, or Pueblo Indians, the forefathers really of the Aztecs.

The Spanish word pueblo means town; it comes from the Latin word populus meaning people, but has changed its meaning and become the name of a place where there are people.

Those tribes are called Pueblo Indians simply because they build the villages in which they live.

And the Hopi Pueblo Indians have such a chthonic cult of snakes.

They even perform their snake dances in the Christian church, for they are also Christians.

They have Christian Spanish names and receive the Catholic baptism.

But they always retain their Indian names as well, which are important on account of their mystical meanings.

So something similar may have been the case in India; those Naga people were probably snake-worshippers.

But the myth is of course purely psychological.

It is the struggle between the air principle-the strength which is in the air, light, and wind-against the chthonic Yin principle represented by the serpent.

The Garuda is said to have extinguished all the Nagas except one, which he put round his neck and wore as a neck ornament.

You see, in this case it would not be an encumbrance, nor would it be a sign of particular friendliness.

It would simply be a sign of his victory over the serpent.

Now, it is a curious fact that the ladies of old Rome really used to wear in hot weather a living snake as a neck ornament-of course a harmless snake.

The neck was cooled by the body of the snake, and the snake loved to be coiled round the neck of its mistress because her skin was warm.

So the idea of the neck ornament was also a sort of fashion, and I can easily imagine that Rome was not the only place in the world where snakes were used for that purpose.

You know, children like to carry their pets around with them in just such a fashion.

Now we will continue.

In the last part of Chapter 10 he says: "More dangerous have I found it among men than among animals; in dangerous paths goeth Zarathustra. Let mine animals lead me!"

This shows that he is not going in the path of the animals, which he thinks would be less dangerous, but means to go amongst men.

His enterprise is of course dangerous, because through Nietzsche's identification with Zarathustra, he is lifted up out of his element into the world of the spirit.

If we forget that we also consist of living body, and try to live in an entirely spiritual medium, the body is going to suffer; and inasmuch as the body suffers the mind will be affected too.

It is a terrible strain on our minds when we are not right with our bodies.

The mind then becomes as overstrained as the body.

So though he hopes that his beasts will guide him, it is very questionable whether they will.

We often express such wishes when we are at bottom quite doubtful whether they will be granted.

He would surely need the helpful animals in his enterprise.

When Zarathustra had said this, he remembered the words of the saint in the forest.

Then he sighed and spake thus to his heart: "Would that I were wiser! Would that I were wise from the very heart, like my serpent!"

You see, he suddenly remembers the old man in the wood who doesn't believe so much in spiritual enterprises, and has therefore withdrawn to the woods, which means to the animal, the Yin principle.

Zarathustra doubts his way here. He feels that it is not particularly wise.

It would need a great deal of wisdom in order to make it a safe way.

He would need the wisdom of the serpent, the chthonic wisdom of the earth, but that he cannot contact when he is out of his body; when he is going with the Garuda bird he is necessarily hostile to the serpent.

Therefore, quite logically after Mr. Baumann's picture where the bird is apparently carrying the snake in that friendly fashion, a very bad fight takes place between them, for they are like dog and cat.

Of course there are certain examples where a dog and a cat have become friends, but those are domestic miracles; and a wild bird like an eagle and a wild animal like a serpent are never domesticated and no such miracle can happen.

They are on different planes altogether and therefore hostile to each other.

Now, with this pious wish the introductory chapter ends, and we come to the real text of Zarathustra.

Mrs. Baynes: May I just ask why Nietzsche identified pride with the eagle?

Dr. Jung: It is always a symbol of pride, but here it is a sort of interpretation.

He was worried with that symbol of the eagle and the serpent.

That came out of the original stuff in him, just as Mr. Baumann chose the symbol of the eagle and the serpent to express his inner experiences, as one would-as always has been done-therefore, the identity of these symbols.

When Nietzsche is faced with such a problem he quite naturally will choose that symbolism.

The serpent creeps on its belly in the dust, and the eagle flies on high, very marvelous and imperial, like the Prussian eagle for instance; so it is of course a symbol of pride.

But that is psychologically absolutely insufficient.

If he had gone further, he would have struck upon the problem of the relationship of spirit and matter, and then his Zarathustra would have taken an entirely different turn. He would have given body to Zarathustra.

But it is just his peculiar attitude which doesn't allow him to take that experience of bird and snake seriously.

You see, you only begin to think decently about such symbolism when you ask yourself, why the devil a snake and a bird?

Why not anything else?

But he was so overcome by it that he didn’t even wonder about it.

We are all like that. There is a Christmas tree on the 25th of December.

Of course! We all have Christmas trees.

It is what one does at Christmas to give pleasure to the children.

You simply float along on the Christmas mood.

You wear a Christmas face and you have a Christmas tree because one has a Christmas tree: you are identical with that mood.

But if you really ask yourself why the devil just a Christmas tree, you suddenly discover that this has nothing to do with the birth of Christ.

There were no pine trees in Palestine, and there is not one single thing about it which has to do with Christianity.

Yet we think it is the most Christian symbol.

To this extent do people never think, never question themselves as to why they do such things-why that hell of a nonsense, the Easter hare and the colored eggs, and so on.

In making a Christmas tree, one is not one but many.

The mother who makes the Christmas tree is an eternal mother who for centuries has done that.

Formerly, of course, they made something else I suppose, but always with the same feeling of the eternal figure.

It is such a wonderful moment because it has always been so; you are in the olden time again.

The great lure of the archetypal situation is that you yourself suddenly cease to be.

You cease to think and are acted upon as though carried by a great river with no end.

You are suddenly eternal.

And you are liberated from sitting up and paying attention, doubting, and concentrating upon things.

When you are once touched by the archetype, you don’t want to disturb it by asking foolish questions-it is too nice.

We are all like Parsifal when he sees the Holy Grail.

It is too good, too marvelous-why should he spoil the situation by asking questions?

The suffering of the old man is all right, as it ought to be.

It is so good to be in the miracle; don't spoil it. So you become identical, naturally.

And that is the way Nietzsche becomes identical; to encounter the old man, perhaps to be the wise old man, is such a great discovery and so sweet, that he doesn't stop to ask questions.

He just slips into it and is gone without noticing it.

When the archetype comes up and touches you, you are gone in a wink. You become eternally valid.

You can act and perform and it just goes on by itself.

I always quote the story of King Albrecht who was murdered near Zurich at a ford where the river Reuss empties into the Aare.

His suite, his nephew and several other knights, had made a conspiracy to kill him.

They were riding behind him, deliberating whether they should do it or not, and they could not decide, for it was a crime, parricide.

But the moment the king rode into the ford, which is the archetypal place of danger, the nephew pulled out his sword and said, "Why let that carrion ride before us?" And they fell upon him and killed him."

It was the archetypal situation, and therefore there was no hesitation.

Then you can act, no doubts any longer.

Then you are the dragon, and the murder must happen there; killing is indicated.

Either you are the victim or you are the killer.

So when the old wise man touched Nietzsche, he did not bother when the animals came up.

The Hamsa comes with soft wings and lifts one up and one doesn't notice it and then one is gone.

But then naturally the animals are there; one becomes conscious of the presence of instincts which would inform one that the Hamsa is a bird, not a man, and the snake rises and cries: "He is my enemy."

And they could be helpful.

Nietzsche could disidentify from the wise man if he listened to the cry of the eagle. That was a cry of warning.

But being the wise old man, he knows all about it of course, and he interprets the eagle as his pride, and the serpent as his wisdom-it is like the Christmas tree.

So the bird and the snake are no longer valid.

They are interpreted according to what the old wise man might say about them.

Through the identification with the archetype one falsifies the archetype and then it is no longer reliable. It is only reliable when one separates oneself, when one resists that temptation to the uttermost.

That is the meaning of Jacob's fight at the ford with the angel of God.

He fought against God in order not to identify with him; in that way only could he bring out the real meaning of the whole situation.

To identify with the archetype is unavoidable under certain conditions, however; and Nietzsche's case was unavoidable.

He did not know; it was his fate.

In reading Nietzsche, one must always keep in mind that he was also a victim, and inasmuch as he was a victim he falsifies the true function of the archetype.

The old wise man never would have talked in this way if Nietzsche were not mixed up with him.

There is a lot of unrealized sexuality in Nietzsche.

He was taken out of his body and had not lived a proper life.

Mrs. Baumann: In the last line, isn't the word folly one of those twisted, uncertain places where he could have had a hint of his situation?

Dr. Jung: Ah yes, because he really understands that his enterprise is folly-that is the wise old man.

But Nietzsche himself does not sit up and say, "Why do I say 'folly'? Is it because I am going on a fool's errand with that book?"

He plays with that word; it is a Christmas tree.

If I had written such a passage I would have asked myself, "Now come, folly! What does that mean? Am I going to do something foolish?"

I would have spoiled, of course, the whole joy of the ride, sure enough.

But I am a doctor and that makes a difference. I am too little a poet.

Mrs. Sigg: I think behind the picture of the eagle and the snake there is really another picture which has a near relationship with it, the vision the lunatic saw which you have mentioned in your books, the sun disc with a pipe hanging upon it. That is quite a dangerous symbol, and it seems to me that it has something to do with this because Nietzsche said the snake was hanging onto the eagle, and Nietzsche was really identified with the sun in the beginning of Zarathustra.

Dr. Jung: No, I would not make that analogy.

The vision of the lunatic is utterly different and has to do with this only in a very remote way.

That has to do with the generative meaning of the sun.

It is the sun generating the word in man, the birth of the soul from the sun; it is really a sort of antique vision like the analogies in the great magic papyrus, the so-called Mithraic liturgy, which is very clearly of antique origin.

It is a concretization of the beginning of the Evangel of St. John, where it is said that the word is the light which shines into the darkness, the Logos.

We would go pretty far astray if we considered this a parallel.

That was a case of dementia praecox where one cannot expect very modern symbolism; usually such people, particularly the uneducated ones, start from a medieval Christian level of consciousness and simply fall into the collective unconscious which then has a chiefly historical character, as our unconscious has when we first contact it.

The unconscious first produces aspects of the historical symbolism which becomes modern or advanced, or anticipates the future through the interference of a definite consciousness.

Mrs. Durer: I want to ask about the very last word. Why does he not say going upwards instead of “down-going?" Is it a premonition?

Dr. Jung: There may be a sort of premonition in it, but all through the introductory chapters he describes his movement towards the world as his down-going, his Untergang, which of course is also spoken out of the archetype, because the Hamsa is the bird of the great heights.

And when the spirit comes into the world, it comes down.

The Logos comes down from heaven to earth, and God descends upon the earth in order to be born. Yang is sun or light and is always above; if a reconciliation is attempted, the Yang principle comes down to matter, because matter cannot rise.

And then it lifts matter up.

In Christian symbolism this would be the transfiguration of Christ.

He was in a state of levitation, thus showing how the spirit overcomes matter, how matter can be completely undone.

You know, our mind begins with the downfall of antiquity, and it was first a theologically speculative mind, scholastic philosophy.

We were all up in the air.

We thought up the most abstruse things, absurd things really.

We were only concerned with unempirical problems.

Then, very slowly we began to discover nature.

Albertus Magnus, although a Scholastic, made observations on nature in the early thirteenth century; he was interested in botany.

And through alchemy, chemical interests came in.

Towards the sixteenth century such interests developed rapidly, and at the same time the Gothic style, where everything was vertical, began to spread out, and there was a sort of regression to antiquity because antiquity was nature.

The horizontal movement began and they discovered the way round the world. India and America were discovered, and so on.

It went on in this way until in the nineteenth century our whole point of view became realistic.

That means that the light which was in heaven and a god on earth then went into the earth, into matter.

One could say that Christ was then buried in the earth.

Our mind, our whole mental development, wound up with complete materialism.

The celestial world entirely disappeared and only a few idealists were left crying for help, for support for their shaking ideals; and with the war the whole thing tumbled down for good.

But now we make an extraordinary discovery. What has the mind done in the ground?

Mrs. Baynes: The new physics has turned the ground into spirit.

Dr. Jung: Yes, the new physics has done the trick, exploded matter altogether, and the most recent development is reported in an article by a very modern physicist, in which he shows how modern physics becomes psychology; they climb in at the bottom of the collective unconscious."

Mrs. Baynes: How did they get into the collective unconscious?

Dr. Jung: Through the fact that when you observe the phenomenon of the interior of the atom, you find that your observation disturbs the thing you observe; and if you go on observing, you observe the thing that disturbs, you discover the psyche.

They are now dealing with the telepathic phenomenon, namely, the fact that the collective unconscious-what I call the collective unconscious-is a factor which is not properly in time and not properly in space.

Before long you will read that article on these questions in a very scientific paper.

So the spirit that descended into the earth has exploded matter, and comes up again in the form of psychology.

That is what the Garuda has done.

The thing has happened which is always foretold in Chinese philosophy: Yin increases till it overcomes Yang.

Yang disappears into utter darkness. It is completely gone.

But then Yang is seeking the heart of darkness and overcomes the darkness from within, and suddenly out of the power of Yin appears the Yang again.

That transition is also in the time calculation of China.

In the time when everything consists of whole lines or Yang lines, suddenly towards the end of that period we get a new picture.

Here we have full light, it is all Yang.

Then the first line of darkness appears in the next sign: and so on: until there is complete darkness: == I And then it begins again, the Yang comes up: -==-== You see, we have reached that stage where everything is a derivative of matter, the Yin condition.

But now physics has done the trick.

The Yin condition is exploded and the first Yang line is appearing.

There is no return to material matter now, no chance. It is completely gone.

For the last thing you really can observe is the mind.

You disturb whatever there is by means of your mind, and what you are able to disturb, you can observe: you can perceive your disturbance.

As when you look into a black hole where you see nothing, after a while you see yourself.

That is the cognitional principle of the Yoga: you create the void and out of the void comes the beginning of all knowledge, all real understanding. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 236-245

1. II. 18.

I recognize him. He makes my heart rejoice, the old rebel-yet his hand brings death and the lower half of his body is of stone.

Soul. Yet in his But-his brother is the Buddha, the blessed one.

I. What are you saying-the Buddha? Welcome, Ka you are welcome, you who grant death. You are revered, the brother of the Buddha. What good fortune, to see you!
Ka: Do you recognize me? I built the temple, full of eternal beauty, the palaces of death, the grave chambers of the Gods. Do you see my beauty, my art? My thoughts, which have become gold and precious stones? Where is truth now? Speak!
I. The truth? Should I choose? Since you ask me, is truth perhaps in me? Yes, the truth is in me: I am. That is the first principle of all truth. Where else is truth? The truth is in me. What do I know of Philemon's truth, or yours? I know that you speak of your truth and you contradict one another. So my truth decides. The second principle of my truth goes: I don't know. You know your truth and Philemon knows his. I don't know mine. That is the truth.

S. My friend: and I? You forgot mine. I praise your God. I praise the luminous one, the guider, the consoler. I praise the light that receives you, that leads you up, that illumines you. That is my truth.
I. That is the third principle: I follow the inner light, as I obey the sun that illumines my day.
Ka: The God of the grain of sand?
I. Yes, truly, the God of the grain of sand.
Ka. You base yourself on a nothing.
I. I am, that is something.
Ka: I cannot deny you, yet you are so small.
I. All the greater is my God.
S. What are you saying? Do you really believe in this God?
I. What, did you not just praise him?
S. True, but my feeling quickly changed.

In an interview in the New York Times in 1936, Jung said,

How can these primitives be impressed with our religion? (2021-12-04 04:07)

[1]Dream Analysis Seminar

Miss Wolff: There is an old German poem where Christ is represented as the hero with a sword, doing great deeds.

Dr. Jung: Yes, he is represented there as the healer and also as the hero and warrior.

It is peculiarly applicable to our Christian nations, just emerging from the Great War. We are most of us very unconscious about it.

To one born in the East it is convincing and impressive that a Christian people could use the sword to that extent.

It is the German warlike quality, the primitive berserker rage that is in the Western man in general.

So this man's Christ is equipped with a long sword, that most peaceful redeemer Lord leading an armed host.

And the sword is detachable, an impression that would not originate in the Western Christian mind, only in one born outside, to whom the European is not the model of virtue.

As soon as I was outside our white civilization, I saw what Europeans are like. We look awful.

The Chinese call us devils and it is true, thin cruel lips, and our wrinkles are uncanny.

And we are always intent on something no devil can understand. What are we seeking? Why the devil should we be seeking at all?

To a Pueblo Indian, God in his completeness is walking over the heavens every day.

As you approach the coast of Europe from the great flats of Africa, and see the snow-capped mountains, the little bays, etc., you know that this is the country where the pirates live, where their raids start upon the quiet, cattle-like men on their grassy plains.

From Europe, that half-island, the white man came in ships, bringing awful diseases and fire-water, and even intentionally selling infected clothing to destroy the population, as they did in the South Seas.

Wherever the white man went, there was hell for the other nations; one has to be outside to understand.

The white man is a very beast devouring the earth, the whole world trembles at him. Such Christianity is a compensation, a hellish lie.

The missionaries told me how they shoot antelopes from their bedroom windows, and how they cheat the British Government for a game license.

They complain of their lot, when actually there is nothing more interesting than life among the primitive tribes.

Rockefeller has given a great deal of money to the missions, but the people of the countryside say, "Don't employ a boy trained in the missions-they all lie and steal."

How can these primitives be impressed with our religion?

They accept it as the old Britons accepted it, who took Christianity, trembling, from the lances of the Roman legions. Carl Jung, Dream Analysis Seminars, Page 337-338

"Do not wait until rawly bungling hands of men hack your God to pieces, but embrace him again, lovingly, until he has taken on the form of his first beginning"
- C.G. Jung, Liber Secundus 49/52

[1]Red Book

Take your God with you.

Bear him down to your dark land where people live who rub their eyes each morning and yet always see only the same thing and never anything else.

Bring your God down to the haze pregnant with poison, but not like those blinded ones who try to illuminate the darkness with lanterns which it does not comprehend.

Instead, secretly carry your God to a hospitable roof.

The huts of men are small and they cannot welcome the God despite their hospitality and willingness.

Hence do not wait until rawly bungling hands of men hack your God to pieces, but embrace him again, lovingly; until he has taken on the form of his first beginning.

Let no human eye see the much loved, terribly splendid one in the state of his illness and lack of power.

Consider that your fellow men are animals without knowing it.

So long as they go to pasture, or lie in the sun, or suckle their young, or mate with each other, they are beautiful and harmless creatures of dark Mother Earth.

But if the God appears, they begin to rave, since the nearness of God makes people rave.

They tremble with fear and fury and suddenly attack one another in fratricidal struggles, since one senses the approaching God in the other.

So conceal the God that you have taken with you.  Let them rave and maul each other. Your voice is too weak for those raging to be able to hear.

Thus do not speak and do not show the God, but sit in a solitary place and sing incantations in the ancient manner:  Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 283-284

1. XII. 1922.

[I]. Your voice called me. You have disturbed my sleep.

You came to me in the middle of the night and attacked me with fear. You are not my soul. Or are you? Answer.

S. It’s not me, faithless one,

I was kept waiting by you for so long, and yet I stood with you the whole time and gave you more than a warning these last days.

And still you have hesitated. Are you finally listening?

[I]. So speak, who is it that robs me of sleep, coming in the middle of the night, like a lost stranger, or like a thief?

S. Here he stands, one greater than you. Foreign and yet known.

I. I can’t see him.

S. He is decorated with green wreaths, almost naked and half-draped in loose silk. [I]. How should I make him out? Who are you?

He. One whom you overcame.

[I]. Are you my friend, my much loved one? Did the heart of Africa release you? How did you find the way through northern clouds?

He. I had to come, the time was ripe, the conditions have been fulfilled. I have come to be with you.

I. What do you want to say? How are you going to be with me? You, whom I don't see, whom fear proceeds, the terror of death, nocturnal anxiety and sinister forebodings?

What do you bring so suddenly, you long awaited and unanticipated one?

He. I bring the gold, the golden heart of the world.

[Note: It emerges, from the following exchange, that the figure had first appeared to Jung in a dream he'd had in Tunis in 1910.]

I. What do your words mean? Gold is deceptive.

Has the word not already deceived?

He. Don't be surprised.

You thought that you knew me, because you saw my beauty in dreams, as you slept blissfully under the silver moon of Africa.

But you don't know me. You saw one of my coverings, a mortal appearance that I borrowed from you.

As you can't see me, so you can't make out my form. Your soul made a song about me, since she is a woman.

What you may always grasp of me is appearance. My words are appearance, borrowed from the chambers of your speech.

The golden heart of the world is an appearance, something radiant or shining like gold, like a sun of the world.

I come from the heart of the world, I am the heart of the world, I am radiance, not light.

I cover myself in solstices, my robe is time, and time is my appearance. I am unable to appear to you without appearance,

Oh teacher of the black letters!

I. Oh, you speak of the book, that I forced you to read - a teacher, who should learn from his own children!-it was not I, noble master, who raised himself and was presumptuous.

It was a dream vision gifted to me, a gift of heaven, that fell to me that night from the middle of the fourfold division of the world, when I saw the starry heaven of the eternal desert for the first time. Yes, what nights!

I wasn’t presumptuous, a dream from unknown eternity was.

I longed for you, my most beautiful friend, in all cold and foggy darknesses, in all the confusion and sickness of Europe.

Yet you were far and only once did I hear a distant message from you.

Yes, I have seen your true divine beauty; I didn’t do it from the hubris of my imagination, but the dream from the foreign heaven showed it to me.

My eye was truly unworthy, my understanding, dull. I believed that I had seen you, but I saw only your appearance, and I didn’t know this.

I didn’t teach you from myself, from my hubris, but the dream sent from the heaven of the Gods showed it to me.

I didn’t teach you my wisdom, but I taught you from a book that I found on the carpet, the red carpet of your he-use chamber.

It lay in your house. The book didn’t belong to me. It was precious and more beautifully written than I could ever write.

I never saw more delicate, whiter parchment than this, never was there a blacker ink than that which the book was written with.

It was indeed an old book, and it spoke a language which wasn’t my language, but one more beautiful and perfect than there truly has been on earth.

And how could I have taught you, if that dream hadn’t shown it, that thrice blessed dream, that truly flowed to me from the heart of the world.

He. Stop, it was truly you who was elevated to the radiance, because you overcame me. Have you ever understood that?

I . Never. My understanding was puny and couldn’t even get to a question.

And whatever wanted to say to myself about it was hollow and stale. Noble one, you know it better, so teach me.

He. Do you believe that I have come to teach you? Didn’t the dream show you that you had to teach me as a youth, ignorant of wisdom?

Didn’t it say that I am the ignorant one, since you had to be the teacher?

I . What do I have to teach you from my poverty?

He. Appearance thirsts for content. What is appearance, when it is not mirrored on bodies?

I. Oh, you speak in riddles that I can't make out. I fear that a king is the guest of a beggar. What can I offer you? What is your wish?

He. I would like to be taught by you.

I. Who are you, that I could teach you?

You call yourself the heart of the world. How can I speak to the heart of the world, I, a poor man, who sits in the cover of darkness?

He. Speak to me and you speak to the heart of the world.

I. But what should I say to you, my beloved, whom one night gave to me and robbed?

You have returned to me invisible, truly beautiful beyond all measure; oh, if I had the vision of my soul!

Perhaps I would then find the words to speak to you.

He. Spell it out, teach me. I don't know. Tell me who I am.

I. How should I know that?

He. What use is my light, if it does not illumine you?

But it illumines you and you will not be able to contain your words, since my appearance betrays them. Don't hold back.

Express what darkness and poverty taught you, express what you found from errancy in eternal clouds and what you brought back from long wandering.

Don't be afraid of your words.

I came to you at midnight, l disturbed your speech, l demanded entrance, l wanted instruction, as the dream that came to you from the depths of the world taught you.

Talk to me and I will listen to your words. You've overcome me and made me willing. The Black Books, Vol. VII, Page 222-224

In 1921- 22, Jung painted Images 129,131, and 133 in the calligraphic volume of LN.

On November 25 he completed Image 135. It bore the following inscription: "Completed on 25 November 1922.

The fire comes out of Muspilli and grasps the tree of life.  A cycle is completed, but it is the cycle within the world egg.

A strange God, the unnameable God of the solitary, is incubating it.  New creatures form from the smoke and ashes."

In Norse mythology Muspilli (or Muspelheim) is the abode of the fire Gods.

On November 29, Jung was transcribing p. 134 in the calligraphic volume of LN.

He gave a lecture to the Society for German Language and Literature, "On the Relation of Analytical Psychology to Poetic Art Works," on May 26 (CW 15), which he repeated at the Psychological Club on July 9. From June 2 to 6 he was on holiday in Schmerikon.

On November 7, Emma Jung gave a presentation to the Psychological Club, "Considerations on a Word of Meister Eckhart."  The Black Books, Vol. VII, Page 222, fn 199

Last winter semester we grappled with a very difficult question, namely that of active imagination.

Over the course of my lectures I tried to give a sense of how we might understand active imagination from an historical perspective.

Of course, I’m fully aware that this problem of the active exercise of the imaginative capacity is a matter that is not exactly popular, especially these days while the world resounds with war and rumors of war, and our culture is gradually disappearing into obscurity or at least is threatening to disappear.

I am making every effort in my humblest of situations to ward off this process of erosion, which is another aspect of the soul, and for this reason I am punishing the present audience with this difficult problem of the human soul.

It is quite the same to me whether this makes me popular or not.

I will go on seeking incessantly to pursue the path of the human soul, unfazed by which recent treaties have been agreed and then abrogated.

Those of my audience who were here last semester will know that by active imagination we understand an active engagement with otherwise passive fantasy.

By fantasy we mean something usually quite useless.

Like a leisure activity for people with time on their hands.

One often thinks there's something pathological about it.

If someone entertains a fantasy, it is said that they are ripe for the Burghölzli, yet no one stops to consider that not a single cultural artifact would exist if it did not grow out of the finest imagining.

It must be admitted that fantasy is a game, a creative game. In Indian mythology the play of the gods is the making of the world.

So, in microcosm, man can become creator, at least "the little god o' the world" as Faust says.

Fantasy is nothing to be trivialized, although some make bad use of it, since nothing is so good that it cannot also be misused.

Our fantasy is in fact not an object of education, and for this reason it is mostly wild and produces weeds.

For some people it serves in the creation of works of art and even of technical discoveries, which these days harvest the ultimate honorary awards.

In the Middle Ages and in the East fantasy as imagination played a specific role.

They trusted it more than we do today.

And there used to be systems of religion—and in the East, these still exist—in which fantasy was subjected to a special process of education.

We have no such process, but there used to be one, and this still exists in specific circumstances.

We will hear more about it.

In the East, however, the training of fantasy, the transformation, the mere act of phan-tasizing is an active exercise, an absolutely meaningful question in philosophical and religious systems.

Over the course of the winter semester we concerned ourselves with two texts.

Both are Buddhist texts.

One is the so-called Amitâyur-Dhyâna-Sûtra, the text about Amitâbha (or Amitâyus) contemplation.

Secondly, we considered the Shrî-chakra-sambhâra Tantra the book of the sacred wheel collection.

The wheel is a symbol, a mandala, expressing the wholeness of man.

The Amitâyur-Dhyâna-Sûtra is the older text.

We have a Chinese translation from the fifth century. The Sanskrit original is lost.

In the form of a frame narrative, this sûtra teaches how the concentration of fantasy is to be carried out.

Concentration begins by directing the gaze towards the setting sun as a fixed point.

Then follows the meditation of imagining the water, then the ice, then the lapis lazuli whereby one is ferried across to firm ground.

That is a further object of imagination.

Then follows the imagination of nonvisible things: namely, the so-called dhvajâ is imagined under the ground, i.e., the flag or standard, but also a symbol.

I think it is better translated here as symbol, because we immediately learn from the text that this sign extends into the eight directions of space.

These directions are then depicted by the golden cords, and the whole is thought of as enclosed in a circle.

This is the chakra. It is also called padma.

It has a double meaning, it can also mean yoni and the feminine in the sexual sense.

I’d like to remind you that as far as Eastern fantasy is concerned everything has a different character than it does for us.

The East, unlike us, does not suffer from a morbus sexualis, in this regard being absolutely normal.

Then follows the meditation upon the eight lakes, corresponding to the directions of space.

The lakes are strewn with lotus flowers, which are all perfectly round.

The round element is stressed here.

These eight lakes strewn with countless lotus flowers actually have the meaning of worlds or groups of humanity.

The individual lotus flowers actually refer to single individuals, all perfectly formed.

Thus all these lotus flowers contain Buddha figures.

They are the expression of perfect humanity, whose only form is that of the Buddha, the perfect, the enlightened one.

According to these meditations, a single lotus is imagined, located on the foundation, the firm ground of reality.

So when a lotus is imagined upon the firm floor of the real it means that the lotus is really made through the imagination.

This is an extremely particular Eastern requirement, this imaginal exertion to create something psychically real through practice and the utmost concentration.

Of course, we cannot imagine this very well. For us the concept of the real is based on something actually extended through space in three dimensions, whereas the East has no such prerequisites.

A truly educated Indian will of course not accept that something that fills the room can be created.

But there is a large group of people in India who are firmly convinced that in the caves of the Himalayas live great wise men, the Rishis, who are gifted with supernatural abilities and who, from there, direct the fate of the world through the strength of their thought.

And yet they have never been seen.

The Ramakrishna mission actually sent out people to investigate this question, who undertook research in the entire Himalayan area, but not a single example of such men was found.

As a rule it is accepted that psychic reality is nonspatial, for in the East psychic reality is a thing which exists in and for itself, it can be perceived and even induced to appear, but it cannot be invented.

But we in the West think that someone has an idée fixe or has been gripped by an idée fixe as if it has happened to him.

In the East, it is a matter of a fixed form which is simply entire unto itself, which does not arise from some sort of idea, but which in fact can be apperceived.

In the final chapter of the book With Mystics and Magicians in Tibet by Mme. David-Néel, there is a description of how she was guided to produce such a splinter figure within herself, who then however became truculent, and how it took several months to work free of this figure once again.

The reality of this description cannot be doubted. I know Mme. David-Néel personally.

She is a very intelligent, clear-thinking French woman of whom one cannot easily presume fanciful “nonsense.”

But all sorts of remarkable things can happen to one who lives for a long time in this environment and specifically in this natural environment, which of course would never happen to one on the Bahnhofstrasse here in Zurich.

I met a sportsman who was on the first expedition to Mount Everest, a geologist, a highly educated scientist who assured me in all seriousness when he returned that he had been cursed by the lâmas in a lamaic monastery, and he was completely convinced that the mountains were inhabited by devils.

Fortunately I have had my own experiences in Africa, so when I’m told such things, I always keep a straight face.

Our European consciousness is nice only here at home, under other conditions it becomes something completely different.

When I went to East Africa to visit the Negroes, a medicine man asked me: “What, you want to study these negroes? That’s not interesting at all.

you must study the Europeans who come to Africa!” And he was right.

Our psychology is infected by its own devils.

We also did not think that this Europe of ours could develop so curiously as it has in the last ten years.

We’ve got it in us, and thus it doesn’t come by chance.

The evil is not hidden behind the mountain but is right in front of it.

When the lâma imagines something real and it succeeds, then he has made something real.

He has created something with his fantasy that adheres to him.

His conscious psychology has changed, and he has made another being.

I don’t mean to say that I would be able to see this second figure with my physical eyes, but I would recognize this person, the author of such a peculiar accomplishment, by virtue of his peculiar psychology.

Upon this lotus of the real an equally real tower arises, characterized by four.

The conclusion reached by the text is that upon this tower is located the ultimate being, the Buddha himself.

And in this moment, if this realization succeeds, the one who is meditating has become the Buddha himself, i.e., the omnipresent spirit who is dispersed into the whole world, i.e., the universal Buddha.

This figure, then, is simply identified with what is always translated into English as mind: Buddha consciousness.

In any case it is evident that this Buddha corresponds absolutely to the mystical idea of the inner Christ.

In the New Testament there are individual places referring to this idea, namely that everyone is in fact a Christ, inasmuch as he succeeds in identifying himself in imagination with Christ.

The occurrence of the stigmata is a living expression of this medieval idea.

Concerning the Shrî-chakra-sambhâra Tantra, this is an uncommonly rich text, which it is impossible for me to recap for you.

The best way to do that is to present to you once again the series of symbols that forms the skeleton of the text.

In this series the entire exercise emerges from shûnyatâ, i.e., the void or ávidyâ as far as Mahâsukha at the end.

It is the typical developmental process from (1) unknowing to (12) ultimate enlightenment.

1. At the beginning we do not have the void state achieved through ultimate consciousness, i.e., Buddha consciousness, but rather the original void, the void of the world where unconscious beings dwell, who do not know that there is a world.

For when one does not know that there is a world, then there is no world.

This is the basic fact of the Indian spirit, that it realizes that the world is as we see it and that it is because we see it.

This is also the basic idea of Schopenhauer's philosophy. He was also influenced by Indian ideas, although his rather limited knowledge of the Upanishad texts must be kept in mind.

This original state is actually based upon unknowing: ávidyâ, i.e., unconsciousness.

We must imagine that we would be in the state of ávidyâ.

Thus, every person in the West is in the state of ávidyâ which makes a redemption necessary.

Active imagination serves the purpose of introducing psychic enlightenment into this void and thus transforming the inner dark unknowing into the light so that one is not in non-existence, but one knows that one exists.

1. The series begins with the splitting of the void. Something must be differentiated so that one knows that something exists.

Thus, the separation, the division into four elements, is the foundation of knowledge.

So there is a typical analysis of knowledge in this text, as well as an analysis of the psychic functions, which can even be translated directly into modern speech.

The division into the elements is a system of orientation: a four-part orientation system like the crosshairs in a telescope.

It is exactly like the directions of the wind that divide the horizon into four parts.

Or the four elements: fire, water, air, earth, which have always been identified with the four points of the compass or the four seasons.

This is a complete system of order because it completely illuminates the spirit.

You can also divide the circle into sixteen parts, but the division into four is the simplest, and for this reason it is an archetypal, basic attitude of the human spirit.

1. After this differentiation follows the symbol of the world Mount Meru.

This is the first creation of something magnificent, towering, heaped up. Concentration intensifies somewhat with this, and that is symbolized as a mountain, which of course determines the central point because Mount Meru is situated in the center of the earth: a complete division into four parts, in every direction.

1. Upon Mount Meru there is the city. Enclosed as a human community.
2. Then a four-part vajra appears, a diamond, symbol of the accumulated energy that can be radiated, with which one can do something.

This is the lightning energy in Tibetan: dorje.

The diamond is hard and indestructible.

That is why one can translate the word vajra simply as eternal, i.e., this form is transformed into an eternally indestructible one.

This form that is created through active imagination is eternal.

It exists on the other side of time and space and thus is completely liberated from the corruptibility of our things located in space.

So it is something symbolic, but psychically completely real.

1. This now transforms into a lotus, upon which rests the moon.
2. The moon is considered nearly everywhere to be feminine, although it is a masculine noun in German.

However, in middle High German mâne is feminine. It is the “reflecting light.”

1. And the sun is the masculine counterpart. This is the actual light.

The sun, source of light, of radiation, and the moon is the reflecting light; they are feminine and masculine principles.

This would no longer be a division into four, but rather into two.

1. The yoni arises out of the lotus, the feminine organ.
2. The moon then appears as the feminine, united with lingam, the masculine.

Lingam is mostly translated as phallus.

In the ancient Shiva temples you sometimes find a whole series of such phallic symbols, described as lingam, mostly in the inner sanctum of the temple, inaccessible to Europeans.

With us, in the choir of Christian churches there is the high altar and suspended above it is the cross.

In contrast, in the East the holy of holies is in a deep shaft in the earth, three to four meters deep: beneath is a yoni in a lotus, upon which is the lingam, the phallic symbol.

We associate the spirit with above; in India it is below, in the mulâdhâra, meaning in the root support from which the whole of life ascends.

The layout of the church depicts a human form.

In India one gathers that the innermost of the temple corresponds to the innermost of the human body.

The early Buddhist chaityas are usually hewn from the rock, and this then looks like a ribcage from the inside.

In the background stand the Buddha and the lingam.

This leads to a further meaning of the lingam.

In sâmkhya philosophy, or in Vedânta altogether, the lingam means the subtle body containing the ancient idea of the anima.

The subtle body is thought of as half matter.

The soul has a fine subtle body, and it is called lingam.

This comes from the fact that lingam is an appendage, a mark, a sign, so it also carries the meaning of the sexual sign of the masculine, of male genitals.

In the same way, the subtle body is appended to the actual body, a sort of appendage.

All this points to the fact that the lingam symbol is in fact a symbol of the soul.

Remarkably, I experienced this from a Tantric teacher in Puri in Bengal.

He told me all kinds of things about the temple and now, at long last, he wanted to share the most profound secret with me because I was so full of understanding, so then he whispered: “This is in fact a masculine member.” I thought, well, every child knows that.

But—this is India, where what is the biggest secret is the most obvious thing to us.

And we thought we already knew it, yet we have not understood anything about India. It was hard for me to get my bearings.

I simply could not understand why this should be a secret for Indians.

This unification is a very significant moment in the entire series of symbols.

1. Then follows the so-called vihâra.

No longer a town of this world, but a spiritual monastery, a seminary, an enclosure for a few who are a fellowship in a particular spirit.

Within is the great magic circle.

1. In the center of this magic circle is Mahâsukha, the lord of great blessedness.

Mahâ means large, sukha is blessedness.

This is the Buddha.  The series ends in the same way as the Amitâyur-Dhyâna-Sûtra.

The lâma finally becomes Buddha through the unification of moon and lingam.

The moon (manas) means reflective knowledge, understanding, consciousness, truth. Consciousness (or psyche) unified with the subtle body (lingam) creates the holy gathering.

This is the reality of the Buddha.

The idea of the exercise is that the exercise is accomplished insofar as the lâma who undertakes it ultimately is completely realized in the second version of himself, which he has found through imagination.

Rather like Mme. David-Néel with her shadow, into which she threatened to transform herself.

But then she would never have existed, for then the other becomes the real.

Such things may sound pathological to you.

A young woman who was pretty normal, perhaps a bit nervous, had transformed herself into another, completely unconscious of herself.

The one a rather morose person, the other euphoric, funny, enterprising, the opposite in every regard.

When the one within her had retreated, the other stepped forward.

This second personality animated her so strongly that when she became pregnant, the first personality knew nothing about it.

So she was unconscious of the state she had entered into, before she had realized it consciously.

The woman gradually transformed into the second person within her.

This is a pathological occurrence. I have seen similar things.

People who are rather retarded in their conscious development in this way give themselves over to what they do unconsciously, which brings with it a very remarkable disposition of character.

It is the same phenomenon of the split in character that is accomplished consciously in our Shrî-chakra-sambhâra Tantra through active imagination. Carl Jung, Psychology and Yoga Meditation, Page 177-185

I had not dreamed of my father since his death in 1896. (2021-12-06 04:40)

In Memories, Jung narrated the dream as follows , dating it to September 1922:

"I had not dreamed of my father since his death in 1896.

Now he once more appeared in a dream, as if he had returned from a distant journey.

He looked rejuvenated, and had shed his appearance of paternal authoritarianism.

I went into my library with him, and was greatly pleased at the prospect of finding out what he had been up to.

I was also looking forward with particular joy to introducing my wife and children to him, to showing him my house, and to telling him all that had happened to me and what I had become in the meanwhile.

I wanted also to tell him about my book on psychological types, which had recently been published.

But I quickly saw that all this would be inopportune, for my father looked preoccupied. Apparently he wanted something from me.

I felt that plainly, and so I refrained from talking about my own concerns. / He then said to me that since I was after all a psychologist, he would like to consult me about marital psychology. I made ready to give him a lengthy lecture on the complexities of marriage, but at this point I awoke.

I could not properly understand the dream, for it never occurred to me that it might refer to my mother's death.

I realized that only when she died suddenly in January 1923.

/ My parent's marriage was not a happy one, but full of trials and difficulties and tests of patience. Both made the mistakes typical of many couples.

My dream was a forecast of my mother's death, for here was my father who, after an absence of twenty-six years, wished to ask a psychologist about the newest insights and information on marital problems, since he would soon have to resume this relationship again.

Evidently he had acquired no better understanding in his timeless state and therefore had to appeal to someone among the living who, enjoying the benefits of changed times, might have a fresh approach to the whole thing.

/ Such was the dream's message. Undoubtedly, I could have found out a good deal more by looking into its subjective meaning but why did I dream it just before the death of my mother, which I did not foresee?

It plainly referred to my father, with whom I felt a sympathy that deepened as I grew older" (pp. 346- 47) .

The dating here has the dream occurring the night before his mother died.

In 1925, Jung contributed an essay on "Marriage as a Psychological Relationship" to Count Hermann Keyserling's The Book of Marriage (CW 17).

On January 13 he wrote to Josef Lang, whose mother had also died: "My mother's death surprised me while I was traveling in the South.

When I came home, I found the note telling me about your mother's death.

That explains why I'm getting back to you only now. The death of one's mother is an unusually difficult experience.

It's probably the secret organic connection which makes this loss so wrenching, against all reason.

You are being taken toward death for a bit yourself, as there is a part of you that wants to die, too.

I did not know anything beforehand of the impending end, but I did have very ominous premonitory experiences and dreams: for example, my father, who has been dead for 27 years, appeared in a dream, and also once when I was awake, and he was laughing and in a good mood.

Strangely enough, I was stricken with blindness, and it simply did not occur to me that my mother might die.

Today is her funeral.  Given the circumstances, there is no need for more words:  we share the same grief" (private possession, Stephen Martin).  The Black Books, Vol. VII, Page 232-233, fn 225

A dream and a vision of shooting stars by Sabina Spielrein (2021-12-07 04:15)

[paypal _donation _button border="5"]

A dream and a vision of shooting stars by Sabina Spielrein

(Translated by Pramila Bennett in collaboration with Barbara Wharton)

These two observations are interesting because of their common structure; the two cases are about people of different nationality; one of the girls is rather plump, the other is schizophrenic.

In spite of that, in both cases, we have the image of the golden rain in the foreground and that of personal desire in the background; in the dream there is a signboard in the sky bearing in large letters the word ‘love’, in the vision it is the beloved himself.

The dream of shooting stars

Plump Miss N. tells the following dream to a small group of people:

I was by my bedroom window; the window was closed, there were lots of stars; I was looking at them casually; suddenly I saw several shooting stars.

I found the sight magnificent; it was never ending, it went on and on. I went on admiring them.

Suddenly I saw that they were not shooting stars, that it was rain, rain-water running down the other side of the window, driven against the other side of the window by the wind. It was like the reflection of starlight, with the water falling in a continuous motion, like rivulets of gold, threads of gold, not really threads as it was a flowing movement, not a linear one.

She was astonished when she woke up.

The contradiction of stars and water, rain, both being present in the same dream struck her.

When she discovered that it was nothing, 'only water', she was disappointed, but she drew comfort from the fact that it was nevertheless very beautiful.

One must always make a wish when a shooting star appears; but she was always too late for it.

This time she said to herself in her dream: 'If you are too late for that one (star), there will be another'.

Analysis (a few days later)

The shooting stars remind her of a childhood memory: she was walking with her aunt, when suddenly a star fell; it was so fast that she did not have time to make a wish; then a second star fell; a million stars.

The aunt commented that she ought to have made a wish, to which she answered that she had already made it silently. 'How stupid I was then', she said to me, 'this time I would have made an altogether different wish'. – 'What would you have wished?' – 'A great love'.

Later she confides to me that she had not wanted to tell her whole dream in front of everybody.

What she hid from us was this: on a signboard in the sky she had seen written in huge letters the word 'love'; the letters were round and black on a red background.

'Now I am thinking of a dish (a kind of brown pudding which is sold as a powder); I think of the factory that makes it; the letters were round like those on the wrapper of this pudding; I see the rivulets of gold; I remember yesterday's walk (after the dream), we were in a restaurant where we drank tea; there was an advertisement showing a comet, with a tail, like the golden rivulets in my dream.

I was told that once having sustained a knock on the head, I saw stars.

As a child I used to love the marvellous candles on the Christmas tree; once I burnt myself on them.

In my dream too I saw a torrent; a firework; it was magnificent, but it was soon gone! It was a waste of money'.

'I would like to have a great love, an immense love; I am so afraid that it will never happen'.

The rivulet of gold makes her think of money. 'Good gracious!' she exclaims in surprise, 'I never think of money, that is, I am happy to be able to carry on with my studies, but money is not important to me.

I think of gold, of Mrs. Holle and the golden rain; a fir-tree wished it could have golden leaves.

I remember a sad story, something that happened recently to a young girl.

This young girl, like me, was always looking for the ideal.

She loved a young man and was fighting this feeling; she thought she had conquered it.

And then this young man came to ask for her hand.

But he does not love the girl, he is thinking of her money. The poor girl on the other hand loves him very much; she is very disappointed'.

Miss N. also is very disappointed. What if the same thing were to happen to her too?

These days she is always thinking of this young girl.

Miss N. has never experienced anything as 'disgusting' as this.

She confides in me that she is in love with a young man for the first time.

She will soon be going away, she will be able to conquer this love, but she feels transformed since that moment, she feels a new, until now unknown, element penetrating her soul against which she will have to fight constantly. She has been offered a good job at R.

Her future boss is very rich (golden rain, the rivulet of gold in her dream and the associations with money); but he is said to be not very likeable ('he has been painted black' in her own words).

He is thought to be very lazy, and stingy, though he is rich; he would love the pudding.

‘All this considered I said to myself that it would perhaps be better not to be introduced to him.

He loves the pudding, like me’.

I think the dream is understandable without explanations: the young girl is looking for a paradise on earth, a heaven of love, something immense and pure. At the same time she has doubts whether it exists.

The sad story of her friend accentuates this feeling of doubt even more.

She herself has recently felt the torments of love.

She runs away, carrying in the depths of her heart, unknown to her, the secret desire of finding this ideal love in the form of her future boss.

The letters on the board are black – they have been painted black, but fundamentally there is something good – the background is red (=the colour of passion); the letters are round as on the pudding wrapper – he likes puddings, as she does.

The impressions of the last few days, which have played their part in the formation of the image of the signboard, are still present.

These black letters remind her of a comedy poster, it is that of a performance … here she hesitates, of ‘La dame de Chez Maxime’ (‘The woman from Maxime’s’).

She confuses the poster of this play with another, which had black lettering on a red background.

These two posters have a common characteristic, in that they both advertise plays of a rather frivolous, ‘improper’ character.

The idea of ‘heaven on earth’, the doubt (‘a false flash which is gone in a moment’), the image of the boss, who is very rich (=gold), are evocative of the image of the shooting stars in the dream; there is one more point, based on the popular belief that a shooting star could bring one happiness.

Images of shooting stars have played a big part in Mrs. N.’s life since her childhood.

As free association shows, they are transformed into images of golden rain.

The two stories of ‘Mrs. Holle’ and ‘the little fir-tree’ are well known: Mrs. Holle rewards the beautiful and good young girl by showering golden rain on her: this rain makes her even more beautiful, rich, and finally brings her a handsome prince.

She had heard this story when she was four or five years old, and had always wanted to hear it again and again.

The story of the young fir-tree had impressed her even more: the young tree was not happy with its needles: it wanted leaves of glass: once its wish had been granted, the leaves were broken by the wind; next it wanted leaves of gold but the children plucked this finery off; its third transformation was as unhappy as the first two: the beautiful green leaves which it received this time were eaten by animals. So it was very happy to get back its old needles.

Some people may believe that dreams reveal an idea of a moral order, because these stories contribute to the formation of the images.

Objective observation does not corroborate this supposition; throughout the dream we see only the crisscrossing of the desire and its negative aspect, doubt; desire happens to triumph: the signboard in the sky is the image of the fulfilled desire.

Even the shooting stars, which give rise to numerous associations with doubt, give great pleasure to the dreamer in the end: the great love is only a firework; it fades away very quickly. She finds out 'that it was nothing, only water', at the same time she feels that it was nevertheless 'very beautiful'.

The vision of shooting stars

A patient (a schizophrenic) had read somewhere in the Bible that at the time of the last judgement a shower of shooting stars will fall on to the earth and destroy the world. In her delirium, one rainy day, it seemed to her that the rain was a shower of shooting stars; behind it came the angels, dressed in blue; they introduced the patient to a Mr. K. with whom she was in love.

She could see all this through the window of her cell.

The patient herself said to me: 'Yes, in my delirium the shower of shooting stars meant something completely different from what the Bible says!

On the contrary there was great rejoicing! Such force! A thrilling of the senses.

I still feel that sensation when I think about it!'

She felt a warm glow at the same time.

So here as in the previous dream, the symbol of the shower of stars has become the image of personal desire, which, so it is said, must be prepared for or introduced, and enhanced, while at the same time perhaps remaining hidden, as a result of this symbol. Last time we traced the symbol series of Tantric yoga.

Today I want to give you a brief résumé of what we discussed in part last term, namely the second series.

This is a short overview of the symbolism from medieval natural philosophy, the so-called hermetic philosophy, which became known particularly in the form of alchemy.

As you know, the opinion was generally held that alchemy was a formidable piece of nonsense.

A modern book on it begins with the affirmation that this is a narrative of the greatest errors.

But this comes only from the scientific perspective.

All researchers of alchemical history have overlooked the fact that the main point in what they said and thought was not the making of gold.

The most important and most interesting thing is that it is a Western form of yoga.

This has been completely overlooked apart from a few exceptions.

I say this for the sake of historical justice.

In the first half of the nineteenth century there were a couple of alchemists still living who practiced this philosophy in the proper ancient manner.

An old English private scholar and his daughter practiced this yoga, and when the father felt that he was getting old he was convinced that these yoga experiences should be shared for posterity.

He proposed to his daughter that she should report on these exercises in her own way, without any influences from him, and he wished to do the same in his own style.

They had a large house with two separate wings, with one of them inhabiting each of the wings so that they could write down their history of these experiences separately from each other.

After a few months the daughter had finished her writing, and she brought it to her father contained in a respectable volume.

He was delighted with it and confided in her that he had also been writing, but in verse.

So the old man collected his experiences in poetic form, his daughter in scientific language.

But no sooner had this been published than the old man became concerned that he had committed a terrible sin by revealing the secret of hermetic philosophy.

These are exactly the same scruples that an Eastern philosopher gets when he wants to publish a sacred document.

This is why everything remains secret and is only gradually coming to the surface.

He got into such a state of panic that the daughter felt obliged to withdraw all of the copies.

So they burned as many printed copies as possible.

But nine copies were not returned.

The book was written in 1850 and the daughter died at a great age in 1909 or 1910, I believe.

Then the admirers of her work published her writing after her death.

This work represents a first attempt in modern times to shed light on this extremely curious school of thought for Western consciousness.

Although the Western spirit gave rise to the entire tradition, there are only allusive philosophical or psychological explanations about it within actual hermetic philosophy.

One must seek out rather onerously the allusions to it in the ancient texts.

The relevant book is called A Treatise on Alchemy by Mrs. Atwood.

It can be found only on rare occasions in antiquarian bookshop; it is a rather rare book.

I would not advise you to rush to read this book.

It is rather indigestible, permeated with theosophy, and one must know quite a lot about alchemy oneself to be able to understand what it actually means.

Until the last few years the book remained rather obscure except in those circles in which alchemy is still practiced.

There are still ancient alchemists.

I noticed this when I wrote a small text on “Notions of Redemption in Alchemy” for the Eranos Yearbook of 1936.

I got hold of some texts then.

Among them were certain alchemists who complained that I had not understood the true meaning of alchemy: it was really about gold making.

Looked at from its outward contents, alchemy is of a rather contemptible character, but its inner content is more interesting.

In order to understand the issue, we must descend inwardly far more into our unconscious to understand what is happening.

You see the table here: a complete parallel.

By way of introduction I have given you the salient points of the hermetic process.

1. It begins with the chaos, the massa confusa, the compound in the primeval sea, the genesis, where the original water was brooded over by the spirit of God.

These primal waters are expressed by the chaos.

I will return to this and explain the psychological significance to you, but I will first give you a further explanation of the series of symbols.

This is a dark, watery chaos.

1. Then comes the tetramery, the division into four, the attempt to de-compose the compound.

They wish to divide this compound of the darkness into the original four parts in such a way that a certain differentiation emerged, a discriminability.

This happened with the assistance of fire.

Some sort of material—described as prima materia—was heated and separated into an upper and a lower part.

One could say that it is a reiteration of the work of the creator, based on Genesis.

Thus something firm arose below. Vapors arose from the matter; if mercury, then it was Hg vapors.

Since the materials with which the medieval chemists operated were never pure, all sorts of vapors arose.

So what was above was described as volatile, the spiritus, the ephemeral; what was below as the corpus.

In these and similar processes, such as distillation, sublimation, and whatever they were all called, the ancients were so immersed and yet understood so little of what they were doing that they projected their own unconscious state into this activity.

And then they had visions.

You must imagine: these people lived in great isolation and worked in secret, as this was a forbidden activity as far as church doctrines were concerned, and so there was a danger that one would get a reputation for being a gold maker or magician.

This was very unpleasant; one did not want to be denounced as a magician.

So they poured tremendous hope into their chemical operations and saw something within them that can no longer happen to us today.

They saw all their unconscious expectations in process.

There were actually Latin texts that contain descriptions of such visions, and that is the origin of alchemy’s curious metaphorical language.

1. They described what towered above the annealed body as a mountain.

They also named the upper part of the retort where the clouds gathered as mountain.

The deposits on the retort were described as rain or dew.

This is where the idea of the mountain comes in. It is considered the carrier of precious substance, which is supposed to come into being through this process.

Upon the mountain lies the treasure: the lapis philosophorum as the elixir of life.

Alternatively, the wonderful medicinal herb grew upon this mountain.

That is why the mountain was also compared with all the saints, not least with Christ himself.

They could do this all the more easily since Christ too was described as mountain, as the small stone that was hewn without hands from the mountain (Book of Daniel).

So a Christian allegory. This was known to the alchemists.

A series of alchemical tracts are attributed to the Church Fathers Albertus Magnus and Thomas Aquinas, although it has been proved that neither Aquinas nor Albertus Magnus in fact wrote either. But what is certain is that they engaged with them.

The Church Fathers practiced and spoke an enormous number of metaphorical and symbolic languages.

One who was most involved with this was Alanus de Insulis (Alain de l'Isle), a general doctor, philosopher, and theologian who lived from 1128 to 1213, secluded in Citeaux.

He made use of an exceptionally lively metaphorical language. Such tracts were also attributed to him.

The philosopher's stone was also equated with the cornerstone, which is another allegory of Christ.

1. Upon the mountain lies the city, the idea of the civitas or the castrum.

This is the idea of the vessel in which the precious substance is enclosed and protected from external effects so that what is within does not escape.

It is important in alchemy that what is cooling and vaporizing does not disappear.

The vapors must not evaporate. Nothing may escape from what is going on within.

1. Then follows the quaternarium, i.e., the four elements into which the primal material is dissolved, but in a new meaning.

Here, a coagulation appears: solidification, freezing, coagulation; here the four are put together again.

This corresponds to the vajra with the four heads. This composition takes place upon the mountain.

Above, the spiritus make a compound together, not the bodies.

These elements that make a compound through the coagulation are the essences of the elements.

These essences are compounded, resulting in the quinta essentia as the medium inter quaternas.

This middle one naturally has a highly symbolic meaning, just as we also see in Tantric yoga out of which the lotus develops.

It is also the uterus in which the divine birth takes place.

(6) Out of this quaternarium arises the quinta essentia in the form of the golden flower, flos auris. The blossom of gold.

This is a typical expression in alchemy. In chemistry, we also now still describe certain precipitations as sulphur blossoms; they are just such efflorescences.

The saltpeter or salpetre that oozes from ancient walls is one such efflorescence.

All these results were described as golden flowers—remarkably not only here in the Middle Ages but also in Chinese alchemy, hence also the Secret of the Golden Flower.

(7) When this flower has manifested itself, then what follows this blossom is the moon and

(8) the sun, also in tantrism. In alchemy, the golden flower is considered a vessel, chalice, or bath in which sun and moon unite.

And this is why: tetramery is not the only division that is possible, for masculine and feminine also exist.

For the original division was one into two: clouds above—water below, spiritus considered masculine above, the watery below being feminine.

“The spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters.”

One could almost say that the spirit of God brooded over those waters.

The ancients also dreamt that the water was impregnated with the seed of God.

So the golden flower is a vessel in which the opposites of the sexes are united, not only the four, but also the two.

When this unification is complete, it always manifests in the form of a personification.

There is no objective unification as in chemistry.

(9) Usually the moon is described as a white woman: femina alba. In Arabic it is al-baida.

The Arabs passed Greek alchemy down to us, although there was a Greek codex in Venice: the Codex Marcianus.

But in the Middle Ages no one in Europe understood Greek. Not until the time of the humanists, when Byzantium was conquered from the Turks, did part of this Eastern spiritual culture arrive in the West.

The white woman al-baida was changed into Beya.

There was a famous myth of Garbricus and Beya.

Gabricus comes from the grouping of Arabic words: el Kibrit, i.e., sulphur, and Beya is white, i.e., silver or mercury.

Thus, these come together: sulphur is yellow (red), i.e., the sun which is fire, sulphur being plainly identical with fire—and the moon, i.e., mercury or white.

(10) This was the famous alchemical wedding of Gabricus and Beya, described as conjunctio. It is the union of the fiery with a cool, watery substance.

There is a Latin tract with Arabic influences from the sixteenth century, the Consilium Conjugii, seu de Massa Solis et Lunae (Counsel for the Marriage of Sol and Luna).

I have brought you a series of old visual representations in which you can see how this is depicted.

A conjunctio now becomes the ultimate composition. Even the difference between the sexes is removed.

I must add that the difference between sun and moon is not thought of as physical.

For this reason alchemy never tired of stressing: “Our gold is not the it is the essence of gold.” This was their secret.

Despite the palpable symbolism, the conjunctio is not to be thought of as a physical connection, but rather as a unification of the spiritus, the subtle body.

(11) Now follows the holy enclosure, the house, the secret chamber.

The monastery vihâra corresponds to the mysterious vas hermetis in alchemy in which the conjunctio took place.

In the Chinese Book of the Yellow Castle it is described as the “purple room in the Nephrite city.”

It was also described as a secret crystal in which a very small sol and luna in union could be seen.

This means nothing other than the final removal of opposites, this being an ultimate composition. A union of the mutually warring.

It must be protected as if in a cloister or a building, a treasure house, where the precious substance is enclosed and concealed.

(12) Then, at last, in the Tibetan text the lord of the whole appears, the personality, the end product: identification with the Buddha.

This is where the identification with Christ logically follows. Alchemy compared Christ with the lapis.

Conversely, as in the language of the church, the lapis is allegorized by Christ, namely the highest figure is also described as hermaphroditus in which the masculine and feminine have completely unified in a perfect being.

It has probably struck you that the representations of Christ are always exceptionally feminine, a very feminine man.

This corresponds not only to the general flavor, but also to the meaning that all opposites are united in him.

This is that secret, feminine influence.

He is also sometimes symbolized by some of the Church Fathers in a feminine way, as “the woman” (mulier), for he could not be the savior if man and woman had not been united in him.

All opposites had to fuse within him. That is where the psychological secret gathers itself home. This form is also a child.

There is an alchemical text: The Hermaphrodite Child of the Sun and the Moon.

This is the homunculus, a tiny thumbling, considered very small because he is on the inside of man.

The philosophers say of this stone that it consists of body, soul, and spirit, just like a man.

An ancient text says: “you are the stone.”

It is also described as lumen or lux moderna, as a “light that has arisen in the darkness” or as “sun of righteousness, descended from heaven.”

And there is also always the idea that the stone cannot be thought of without the intervention of divine grace.

“It cannot be made apart from the grace of God.”

It is therefore also known as opus magnum, as a great work, because God himself is manifested within it.

This is the intervention of the divine in the experience of the laboring alchemist.

In the Greek alchemists, in particular with the philosopher Zosimos, a gnostic from the third century, we encounter the symbol of light: phôteinós, i.e., of the luminous one or the man of light.

This plays a great role in gnosticism: the man of light is a spark from the eternal light that has plummeted into the darkness of matter (scintilla, i.e., the spark).

Man is to redeem light out of the darkness.

As you will see, in alchemy the reigning idea is that salvation results ex opere operato, out of works carried out, in contrast to the church’s belief where salvation depends utterly on the gratia dei.

Alchemy has this belief in common with the East, as you will see: the individual works at what is necessary in order to deliver himself into the state of salvation.

This belief also prevailed in alchemy, and it would be mistaken to say that the alchemists were unacquainted with it.

There is evidence that some of these ancient philosophers really did hold this belief, in which this process and the unconscious were so intermingled that it also had a psychological meaning.

While these people worked with their chemical materials, they did so with such hope and expectation that the effort also had a psychic effect upon them.

This is hard for us to understand.

If you can envision primitive man who knows nothing of psychology and sees nothing but the world as he animates it, then it won’t surprise us that such was still the case in the Middle Ages in an area where still one knew nothing.

Men encountered within dead matter what it would now be impossible for us to experience.

We can only empathize with it psychologically or metaphysically.

Nor do we these days know anything of metaphysics either. That gives you the whole alchemical series.

Now I will supply you with a psychological parallel to the two series of symbols:

- The original state corresponds to ávidyâ, unconsciousness. We all assume we are not unconscious.

But in a certain respect we are all unconscious. We are not conscious of all of our contents by a long shot.

Because we don't know these matters, we also don't know that we are unconscious. "What you don't know can't hurt you."

If someone does not know that America exists, then for that person there is simply no America. But of course others notice it.

(2) If you encounter a person who for some reason has had a shove from the unconscious, who "has a screw loose," they must be shown that this reason is not unconscious but are close at hand, even if those affected resist learning of it.

Here begins the tetramery, because something presses to be brought back into order, if, for example, someone complains that people do not understand him, or is troubled by difficulties with his wife and child, he does not know why, then something is out of order. He is not conscious of how all of this could have happened.

As if overcome by hypnosis or by being drunk.

Here, there is a dark unconscious state that we must bring to light. So he requires analysis.

That is why Freud named his work psycho-analysis, i.e., the dissolution of the dark state.

In that way one manages to bring a bit of order into the situation. And this bit of order is always a system of four.

Of course, with such a dissolution, the image that one had of oneself also completely dissolves.

There are those who have a very high idea of their ability and their qualities, who experience no self-doubt.

Despite all that, everything goes pear-shaped, and others have to suffer him and complain about it.

When these people land in a neurosis, one is faced with the unpleasant task of showing these people that not everything about them is made of gold, for all sorts of dross has accumulated.

For sure, when the generous man gets to discover where he is greedy, and the upstanding man where he is disreputable, people experience a lot of self-doubt.

An unsatisfactory, secret condition in which one can completely lose oneself.

(3) Yet somewhere there is a firm place—where one can say: this is how I am, I see exactly that here I am upstanding, here not; clear here, dark there; right here, completely wrong there—at least this is what I am.

Something clearly emerges, like a mountain, like Mount Ararat did for Noah's ark in the flood. Finally, there is an instinctive foundation.

At last he sees: I am not completely right but also not completely wrong. This is the mountain: the sure conviction that emerges.

At first it is a small island that comes up out of the flood.

Then something becomes manifest that one can describe as the actual Self of the person.

All this means that one actually knows very little of oneself—that there is no ground for certainty—yet a certain instinct is present, which ultimately decides.

One can call to mind one's own foundations: "At root, I am simply like this or like that."

(4) This insight is precious and promises much because it is a new attitude for the person. Hence the symbol of the city.

It is like a magic circle that one places around oneself so that no one else prattles their way into it, not even one's own reason.

One requires a certain inner and outer protection against all of that. Carl Jung, Psychology and Yoga Meditation, Page 186-197

Marie-Louise Von Franz on the "Animus" - Quotations (2021-12-08 03:56)

[paypal _donation _button border="5"]

The animus fosters loneliness in women, whereas the anima thrusts men headlong into relationships and the confusion that accompanies them. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 55

Woman needs life, relationships with people, and participation in meaningful activity. Part of her hunger comes from an awareness of dormant, unused aptitudes.

The animus contributes to her unrest so that she is never satisfied; one must always do more for an animus-possessed woman. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 55

If she can stand for her human rights without animus, and if she has a good relationship with the man she loves, she can tell him things about feminine psychology which will help him to differentiate his feelings. The animus fosters loneliness in women, whereas the anima thrusts men headlong into relationships and the confusion that accompanies them. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 55

Woman needs life, relationships with people, and participation in meaningful activity. Part of her hunger comes from an awareness of dormant, unused aptitudes. The animus contributes to Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 9

In our Christian civilization, as I mentioned, the image of the woman is incompletely represented. As Jung has said, she has no representative in the Upper Parliament. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 10

In a matriarchal structure, such as in South India, women have natural confidence in their own womanhood. They know their importance and that they are different from men in a special way, and that this does not imply any inferiority. Therefore they can assert their human existence and being in a natural way. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 10

The source of evil and of things going wrong in women's lives is often a failure to deal with and to get over hurt feelings, for hurt feelings open the door to animus attacks. The source of things going wrong, and of evil in women, in a tremendous number of cases, is that archetypal reaction of not getting over a hurt, or resentment, or a bad mood, through being disappointed in the feeling realm, and then being overpowered by the animus. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 35

If you can get back to the origin of the hurt and where you have not worked it out, the animus possession will stop; for that is where it jumped in, and that is why in animus possession there is always an undertone of the reproachful hurt woman. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 35

Animus possession in a woman annoys men madly; they go up in the air at once. But what really gets the man's goat is this undertone of lamenting reproachfulness. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 35

Men who know a little more about this know that eighty-five percent of animus possession in women is a disguised appeal for love, although unfortunately it has the wrong effect, since it chases away the very love that is wanted. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 35

Underneath the animus there is a feeling of reproach and at the same time of wanting to get back at the one who has hurt you. It is a vicious circle, and arguing develops into a typical animus scene. Thus the ignored femininity which plays up in a woman's anger is something archetypal. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 35

If the woman is in Tao and functioning according to the inner laws of her being, she can afford that kind of feminine nastiness, and it is not animus possession. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 43

There is the expression "a typical lovers' quarrel." We would call it an anima-animus quarrel, the sword crossing of animus and anima, which consists in a most horrible way of hurting each other in the most vulnerable spots. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 55

Just where the man has a most uncertain delicate feeling, the woman places the thorn of her animus; and where the woman wants to be understood or accepted, the man comes out with some anima poison dart. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 55-56

A world in which nothing on the harsh side is ever allowed, is not on the side of life, and here we come to a typically feminine problem. The more feminine a woman is, and the less aggressive her animus, the more she will tend to be overrun by her surroundings. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 65

So we have a marvelous picture of the annoying and irritating side that a woman's animus can produce. It shows how a grownup, intelligent woman can entangle herself in such a silly idiotic quarrel or discussion. The irritated animus loses his sense of humor and is ungrateful and full of power. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 66

But usually there is a projection of the woman's destructive animus onto the man. Even if there is no man on the outside to torture her, the woman will get it from within, for when she is alone her animus assures her that she is lonely and nobody and nothing and will never get anywhere—the sadist within tells her that Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 70

In every couple relationship there are actually four figures involved: the man and his anima, and the woman and her animus. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 76

I have often observed that women who make a first attempt to use their mind, say at the university, show an animus especially inclined to mix up the instrument of the mental work and its meaning. It is typical for a kind of half-baked animus. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 78

As soon as she touches anything on the side of life activity she may fall into animus possession or a power drive and become as cold, ruthless, and brutal as her father was. All she can do is to keep right out of the life of the spirit. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 88

The animus is a kind of primitive man, just as the anima in men is a kind of primitive woman who overdoes things and then collapses. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 88

That is the tragedy of such women, but they can get to the turning point, and in the second half of life have their hands healed and can stretch them out for what they want—not from the animus or from the ego, but, according to nature, simply stretch out their hands toward something they love. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 97

It is typical for the animus that, statistically seen, he is generally right, which is why we fall for him. But he is not right in the actual situation. You might say to such a lonely woman that she should introvert more, sink into her loneliness. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 99

A woman who always gives advice irritates a man. It needs a veiling of the inner face of her animus. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 99

The head is a wonderful image of the animus, with its opinions and musings going on all the time. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 111

The moon god is another beautiful animus figure but different from the head in the sea because he is not the single ghost of a dead person but the generally recognized god of the tribe, a god to whom the Eskimos do not show much love but to whom they pray for luck in hunting. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 115

I have seen analysands again and again cheat themselves in this way. They fight with animus and anima, abreact the emotion, then think they do not need to talk about it. But this is an illusion! Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 135

Women, much more than men, especially if they do not have a strong animus, vegetate in an amazing way. They can live ten or twenty years like plants, without either a positive or a negative drama in their lives. They just exist. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 159

When women have an undeveloped animus, when they have not worked on the animus, their mental functions often remain fixed on gossip and thinking about their neighbors. They get interested in a divorce in the neighborhood and want to know how. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 174

And it is very true that if women live alone for a long time without being in touch with men, they generally fall into the hands of the animus. It is very difficult to stand loneliness without getting overwhelmed by the unconscious, and in a woman's case naturally by the animus. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 193

In the present-day women's liberation movement, the animus plays a very prominent role. Often the tyrannical boss that women are struggling against is not so much an external man as the tyrannical animus within themselves, which they have projected onto him. Such women even seem to attract the tyrants in their environments or to choose them as partners. They fail to see that this is connected with their inner worship of their own animus, which is suppressing their femininity. The same thing also sometimes holds true for men. They become woman-scorning homosexuals and never see that the cold, inconsiderate, and tyrannical behavior that they criticize in women is seated within themselves. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 220-221

It is just the same but one layer further in. You could say that with a woman the animus always anticipates what she has to do later in reality. Marie-Louise Von Franz, The Problem of the Puer Aeternus, Page 16

If she has a puer aeternus animus, she generally has a creative problem, and the cure for women is unfortunately exactly the same as for men: it is also work. When you say that, do you include having children? Marie-Louise Von Franz, The Problem of the Puer Aeternus, Page 16

In private life it is the animus of the devouring mother who takes the lead for the sheep-son. Marie-Louise Von Franz, The Problem of the Puer Aeternus, Page 44

The devouring animus of the mother feeds on the innocence and the best and most devoted feelings of the son. And there too the sheep have been eaten by the shepherd. Marie-Louise Von Franz, The Problem of the Puer Aeternus, Page 44

With a woman, it is the animus who whispers something at the back of her mind, some kind of "nothing but" remark. Marie-Louise Von Franz, The Problem of the Puer Aeternus, Page 85

In the case of a woman, it is the animus who engineers things, and he is always a professional pessimist who excludes the tertium quod non datur. Marie-Louise Von Franz, The Problem of the Puer Aeternus, Page 149

The animus says to the woman that he knows there are only so many possibilities; he says the thing can only go in such and such a way, thereby blocking off any possibility of life producing something itself. Marie-Louise Von Franz, The Problem of the Puer Aeternus, Page 149

Like so many women who feel unloved, in her bitterness she has sold herself completely to the animus. Marie-Louise Von Franz, The Problem of the Puer Aeternus, Page 208

The pretension of knowing all the answers is exactly what the father-animus produces in a woman: the assumption that everything is self-evident—the illusion of knowing it all. Marie-Louise Von Franz, The Problem of the Puer Aeternus, Page 209

Women usually accept any new spirit of the times more quickly than men, and accept it with their animus, which is a logos spermatikos, because frequently they are less skeptical. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Dreams, Page 89

When a woman stays alone, she often falls into the animus. The Arabs say of a woman who leads a lonely life that a djinn has captured her in the desert! Marie-Louise Von Franz, Dreams, Page 105

Animus Personification of the masculine nature in the unconscious of a woman. The animus is often recognized in projection onto spiritual authorities; in this way, a woman’s inner image of masculinity finds expression. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Dreams, Page 193

There the wolf becomes an attribute of a dark feminine goddess and of dark nature. In the dreams of modem women the wolf often represents the animus, or that strange devouring attitude women can have when possessed by the animus. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Shadow and Evil in Fairy Tales, Page 255

Even if one watches one’s shadow or one’s animus, if one is not constantly on the alert, these figures get one in a moment of fatigue or in an abaissement du niveau mental. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Shadow and Evil in Fairy Tales, Page 321

In general, the extraverted man has an introverted anima, while the introverted woman has an extraverted animus, and vice versa. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Shadow and Evil in Fairy Tales, Page 30

If I project my animus onto a man it is as though a part of my psychic energy would flow towards that man and at the same time I would feel attracted to him. This acts like an arrow, an amount of psychic energy which is very pointed. Marie-Louise Von Franz - Psychological Meaning of Redemption Motifs in Fairytales, Page 71

Unfortunately, possession carries the conviction that one is right. Just as Russian protagonists are convinced that the Western world is the destructive thing, so if the animus has you, you are sure that it is so. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Meaning of Redemption in Fairytales, Page 105

The great thing is to know that. Like most of my brothers and sisters, when I am possessed by the animus, I do not notice it I am convinced it is my own and not the animus's opinion. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Meaning of Redemption in Fairytales, Page 105

When you are too much in the animus you cannot get out of it at once, so keep quiet. Go back into your room and say, "This is all wrong, there is something very suspicious about the state in which I find myself so I will not say anything for a few days," and then afterwards you can thank God that for once you managed to keep it inside. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Meaning of Redemption in Fairytales, Page 105

Thus when a woman feels she needs to assert herself in some respect vis-à-vis the man, she finds herself face to face with the problem of a "two-front war"—against the man, on one hand, and against her own animus, which spoils her plan, on the other. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 145

This masculine spirit is the animus of the woman, mentioned earlier, which now, however, no longer manifests purely as affect, impulse, and vital force, but has become human, can express itself in words and deeds on a human level. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 148

The prince can be looked at as an animus figure within the woman, and in this case it would mean that when a woman makes an effort to develop the masculine side of herself, she inevitably passes through a temporary phase in which she behaves arrogantly and unskillfully by way of compensation for her otherwise yielding feminine nature. (History shows this, for example, in the behavior of the first feminists before the First World War.) Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 149

Jung tried to prove in his life's work that behind the animus and anima in the unconscious of man and woman, a still mightier content dwells hidden, the true "atomic nucleus" of the psyche, which he called the Self to distinguish it from the ordinary everyday ego. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 153

Women, for example, often confuse the rigid opinion of their own animus with the much softer divine inner voice, which is why the French are wont to remark sardonically, "Ce que femme veut, Dieu veut!" Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 154

Beyond those, it seems to have been chosen by nature to serve the development of consciousness and the realization of the Self; for without a deep psychic relationship and interaction with a member of the opposite sex, one cannot become conscious of one's animus or anima. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 155

Jung pointed out in his work that the tendency exists for both animus and anima to be projected onto a human partner, or in the framework of the Christian tradition to be projected onto the dogma. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 209

The projection of anima and animus onto religious figures was in many ways quite useful, because it protected people from overvaluing and deifying the opposite sex, the result of which was that there was more room for straightforward, realistic personal relationships. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 220

Today the religious symbols that could have served as a vehicle for the projections of anima and animus have lost their meaning for many people. Anima and animus have fallen back into the unconscious of men and women, where, as Jung showed, they create complications in people's relationships. To this we can ascribe the enormous number of shattered marriages we see around us today. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 220

When men and women get to know more about their own anima or animus, they get along better with the opposite sex and also redeem these figures within themselves. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 221

The animus, however, does not express itself so often in women as an erotic fantasy or mood, but rather as "sacred" convictions. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 279

One can seldom contradict the animus, for it (he) is always right; the only problem is that his opinion is not based on the actual situation. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 279

The animus appears in many myths, not only as death, but also as a bandit and murderer, for example, as the knight Bluebeard, who murdered all his wives. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 280

The animus then embodies those half-conscious, cold, unscrupulous thoughts that many women permit themselves in the "quiet hours," especially when they are neglecting matters that are obligations from the feeling point of view—thoughts about the division of the family inheritance, manipulative plans in which they go so far as to wish other people's death. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 280

Like the anima, the animus, too, consists not only of negative properties. It too has an extraordinarily positive and valuable side, in which it, like the anima, can form a bridge to the experience of the Self and perform a creative function. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 281

The animus frequently appears, as it does in this dream, as a group of men, or as some other collective image. Thus also the pronouncements of the animus possessed woman usually begin with "one should" or "everyone knows" or "it is always the case . . . ," etc. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 281

Many myths and fairy tales tell of a prince, who has been turned into an animal or a monster by sorcery, being saved by a woman. This is a symbolic representation of the development of the animus toward consciousness. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 281

As the anima does with men, the animus also creates states of possession in women.

Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 282

Through her suffering, the animus (for both the demon and the savior are two aspects of the same inner power) can be gradually transformed into a positive inner force. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 282

In real life, too, it takes a long time for a woman to bring the animus into consciousness, and it costs her a great deal of suffering. But if she succeeds in freeing herself from his possession, he changes into an “inner companion” of the highest value, who confers on her positive masculine qualities such as initiative, courage, objectivity, and intellectual clarity. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 282

The creative courage in the truth conferred by the animus gives a woman the daring to enunciate new ideas that can inspire men to new enterprises. Often in history women have recognized the value of new creative ideas earlier than men, who are more emotionally conservative. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 282

As mentioned, the woman’s animus can lead to courage, a spirit of enterprise, truthfulness, in its highest form, to spiritual depth and intensity; but this only happens if beforehand she musters the objectivity to call her own “sacred” convictions into question and to accept the guiding messages of her dreams, even when they contradict her convictions. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 283

For this reason Jung says that the integration of the shadow is an apprentice’s work, but the integration of the animus and anima is a masterpiece. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 319

In the Middle Ages, the negative animus of women was embodied in the devil (the witch trials), the positive animus in Christ. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 320

Today the problem of projection of animus and anima onto collective religious figures has become much less acute, and thus these contents exert pressure directly and immediately on the individual. Hence the vulnerability of marriages. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 320

The beard plays an enormous role in fairy tales. You know the story of Bluebeard, who killed his wives. Now he is a wonderful image of the destructive, murderous animus! There is also the tale of King Thrushbeard, which illustrates the transformation of the negative into the positive animus. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 18

When one is possessed by the animus, one has a holy conviction about one’s assumptions. But one must ask, "Is that what I really believe?" One must pin down the flow. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 19

Women cannot fight the animus by killing him-they can only (catch him by pinning him by the beard so they can then escape. The male hero in myths fights, overcomes, conquers the monster. The feminine follows the path of individuation by suffering and escaping. It is enough if a woman can walk out into the human situation, rebuild human relatedness, relationship. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 20

If a woman hasn’t gone through the experience of being trapped by the demon animus, she has only unconscious thoughts. It is the demon who provides her. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 21

Such a woman becomes a vampire because she has no life in herself. But she needs life and so must take it where she finds it. The negative devil-animus kills every feminine aspect in life. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 23

The Div represents the darker, more archaic form or image of God. The daughter belongs to a particular civilization. The anima is usually one step behind, and therefore the animus is also represented by a very primitive, pagan God. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 31

The animus produces emotional, stormy arguments. Whereas the anima is subject to subtle moods that come out in spoiling remarks. The animus is prone to brutal demonstrations of his power-brute force. The anima has more cunning ways to get what she wants or to make her presence known. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 31

In dreams we often see disorderly hair, which shows animus confusion. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 32

The animus loves to create a misty atmosphere, an ambiance which one cannot find one’s orientation.

The spreading of a cloud over a country is also attributed to dwarfs and giants because they disturb consciousness. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 32

Animus possession may take the form of criticizing everybody and everything-and the damnable thing about the animus is that he is quite right’ but likely to be wrong in the specific situation. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 36

A way to stop the arguing and criticizing is for the woman to say to her animus’ "lf you are so terribly fanatical about what is wrong and what ’should’ be’ let’s look at my shadow." Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 36

if a woman has a strong animus, and can overcome her reluctance to knowing her shadow, she can develop a degree of male objectivity about what goes on in her and thereby become conscious’ She must learn to tell the difference between herself and her opinions, between her feminine ego and her masculine animus. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 36

Jung once said that where love is lacking, power jumps in. A woman with a strong animus has a prestige persona which she tries to protect. That is power. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 37

When a woman comes to grips with her animus, when she reflects on his influence in her life, he drowns in her reflections’ while she herself is saved from drowning. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 38

Women can be tortured by the animus, who tells them they are a complete failure, that their life is finished and now it is too late. The thing to do then is to say, "Okay, I am a failure; let's not discuss it any more." This is a sort of stepping out of it and thus one saves energy and can turn to something else. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 39

Every possession by the animus is a secret inflation, Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 39

If you check on the standards used by the animus in his constant criticism, you find that they are always a collective truth, something much beyond the individual. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 40

A genuine spiritual attitude which lacks the negative quality of the animus does not oppose real feminine life. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 40

Women are not committed to specific ideas (though their animus may be), and that is why they are able to contribute to the renewal of collective attitudes. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 42

The animus is frequently like this, too impatient: a woman feels she must make up her mind immediately, cut through a situation, act one way or another, instead of waiting for the pregnant psyche to bring forth the proper new development. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 43

Through this appeasement of the animus, one may find one's true feelings and discover that it was all animus talk. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 44

Every animus conflict, if it is serious enough, seems to touch these deepest, archetypal layers of the psyche where there is an ongoing conflict between the light god and the dark god. That is why we should try to stand outside the conflict and at the same time watch it, try to realize it objectively. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 45

It is important to understand this, because we can see it in people today who blindly marry an anima or animus projection, which then leads to a situation where the couple is not able to deal with the problem. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 58

Sometimes the relationship involves only the anima and the animus and not the human beings at all: anima and animus are attracted to one other, but when the two people are thrown together they may not be able to stand each other at all! Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 60

Animus and anima are not always happy to have this relationship-they lose part of their power when they are made conscious. They would prefer to remain gods and goddesses and keep their power. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 75

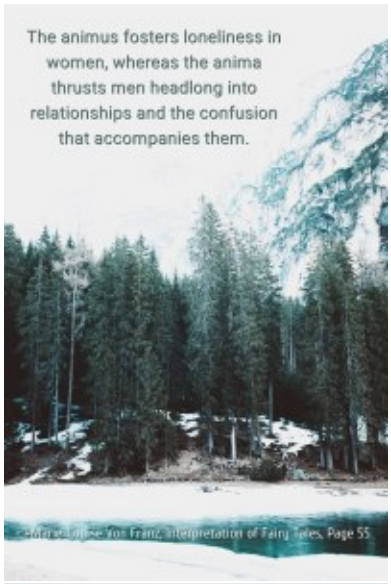
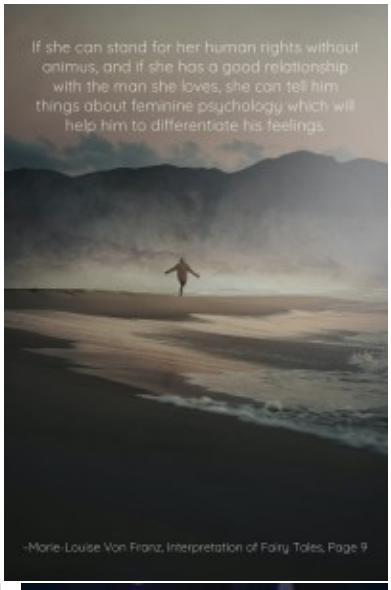
In the animus situation, his destructiveness takes the form of an inner argument, which makes it necessary to give him something to chew on. But for a man, if he goes into a place where the anima herself is, it would mean that here he takes a step into life. This has to do with the fact that the anima is an archetype of life, and the animus an archetype of death. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 77

The anima's darkness is that she wants to entangle the man in the doubtful ambiguities of life, while the dark side of the animus is a demon who would pull women away from life, cut them off from it. Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 77



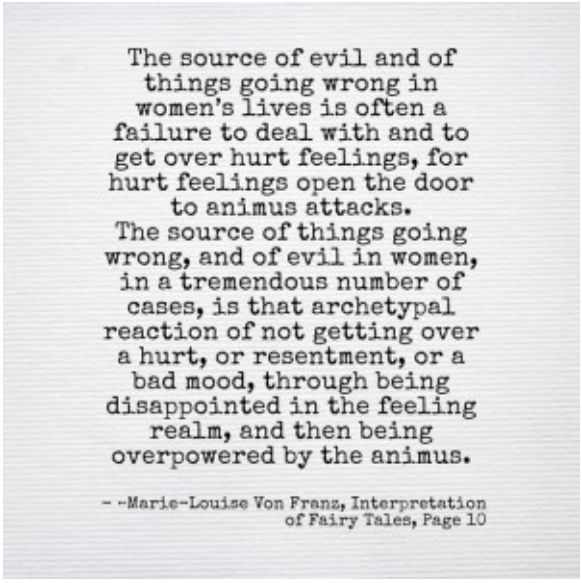
The animus fosters loneliness in women, whereas the anima thrusts men headlong into relationships and the confusion that accompanies them.

Woman needs life, relationships with people, and participation in meaningful activity. Part of her hunger comes from an awareness of dormant, unused aptitudes. The animus contributes to her unrest so that she is never satisfied; one must always do more for an animus-possessed woman. ~Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 55
~Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 55



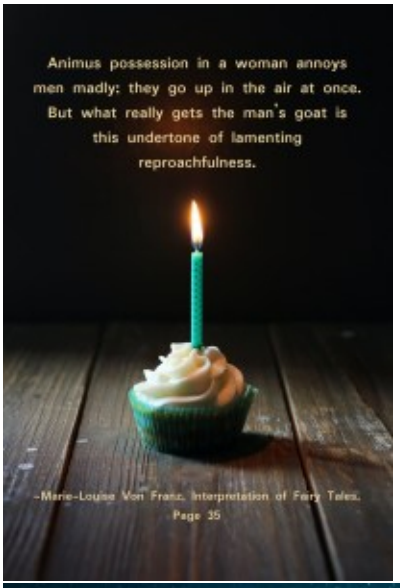
If she can stand for her human rights without animus, and if she has a good relationship with the man she loves, she can tell him things about feminine psychology which will help him to differentiate his feelings.

In our Christian civilization, as I mentioned, the image of the woman is incompletely represented. As Jung has said, she has no representative in the Upper Parliament.



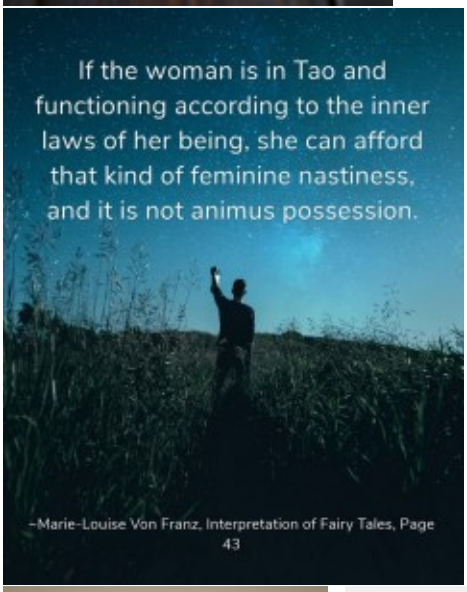
The source of evil and of things going wrong in women's lives is often a failure to deal with and to get over hurt feelings, for hurt feelings open the door to animus attacks. The source of things going wrong, and of evil in women, in a tremendous number of cases, is that archetypal reaction of not getting over a hurt, or resentment, or a bad mood, through being disappointed in the feeling realm, and then being overpowered by the animus.
- ~Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 10

If you can get back to the origin of the hurt and where you have not worked it out, the animus possession will stop; for that is where it jumped in, and that is why in animus possession there is always an undertone of the reproachful hurt woman.

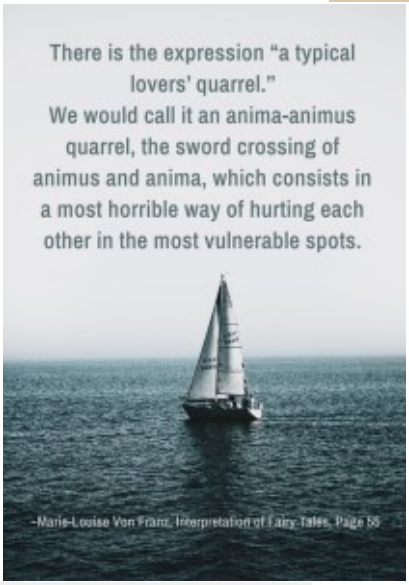


Animus possession in a woman annoys men madly: they go up in the air at once. But what really gets the man's goat is this undertone of lamenting reproachfulness.
~Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 35

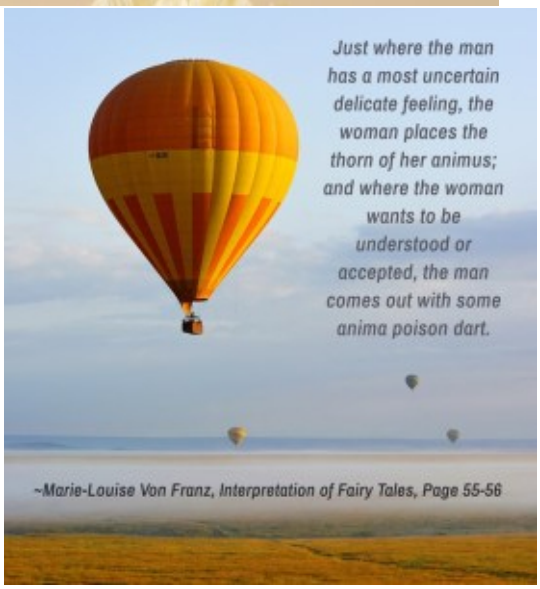
Underneath the animus there is a feeling of reproach and at the same time of wanting to get back at the one who has hurt you.
It is a vicious circle, and arguing develops into a typical animus scene.
Thus the ignored femininity which plays up in a woman's anger is something archetypal
~Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 55



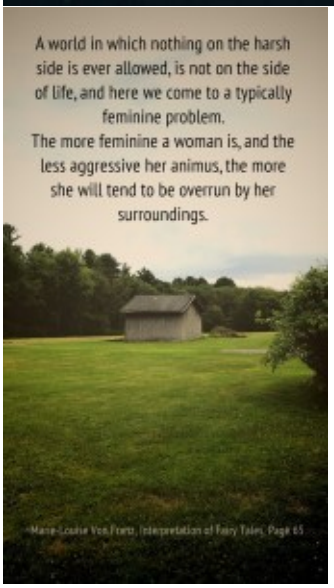
If the woman is in Tao and functioning according to the inner laws of her being, she can afford that kind of feminine nastiness, and it is not animus possession.
~Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 43



There is the expression "a typical lovers' quarrel."
We would call it an anima-animus quarrel, the sword crossing of animus and anima, which consists in a most horrible way of hurting each other in the most vulnerable spots.
~Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 55



Just where the man has a most uncertain delicate feeling, the woman places the thorn of her animus; and where the woman wants to be understood or accepted, the man comes out with some anima poison dart.
~Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 55-56



A world in which nothing on the harsh side is ever allowed, is not on the side of life, and here we come to a typically feminine problem.
The more feminine a woman is, and the less aggressive her animus, the more she will tend to be overrun by her surroundings.

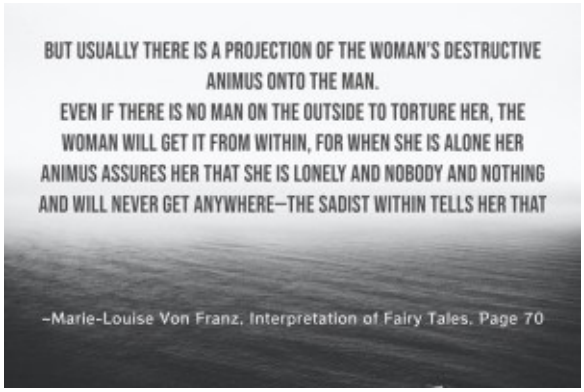
So we have a marvelous picture of the annoying and irritating side that a woman's animus can produce.
It shows how a grownup, intelligent woman can entangle herself in such a silly idiotic quarrel or discussion.
The irritated animus loses his sense of humor and is ungrateful and full of power.
~Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 66



BUT USUALLY THERE IS A PROJECTION OF THE WOMAN'S DESTRUCTIVE ANIMUS ONTO THE MAN.
EVEN IF THERE IS NO MAN ON THE OUTSIDE TO TORTURE HER, THE WOMAN WILL GET IT FROM WITHIN, FOR WHEN SHE IS ALONE HER ANIMUS ASSURES HER THAT SHE IS LONELY AND NOBODY AND NOTHING AND WILL NEVER GET ANYWHERE—THE SADIST WITHIN TELLS HER THAT

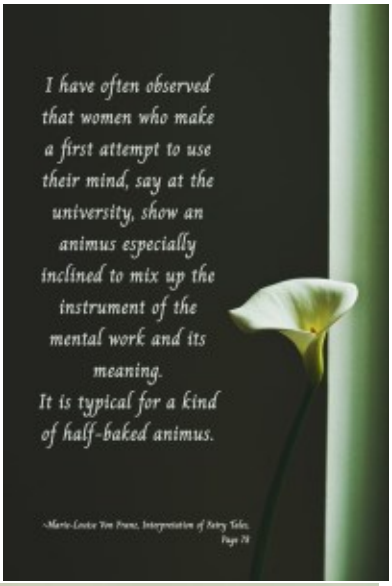
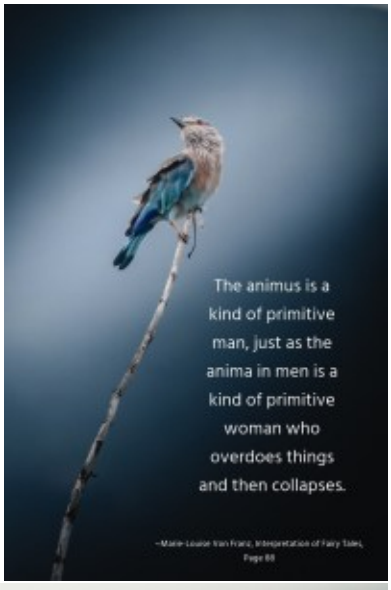
In every couple relationship there are actually four figures involved: the man and his anima, and the woman and her animus.
–Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 76

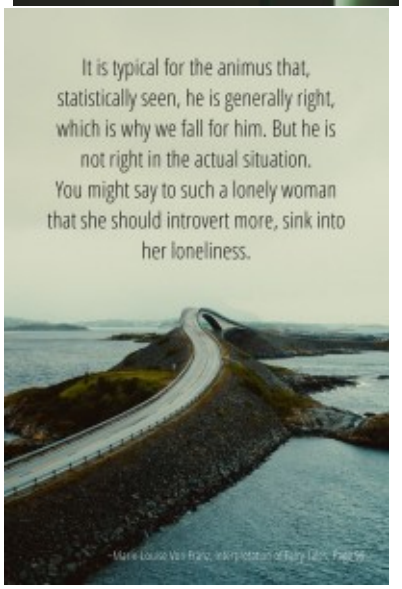


I have often observed that women who make a first attempt to use their mind, say at the university, show an animus especially inclined to mix up the instrument of the mental work and its meaning.
It is typical for a kind of half-baked animus.



The animus is a kind of primitive man, just as the anima in men is a kind of primitive woman who overdoes things and then collapses.

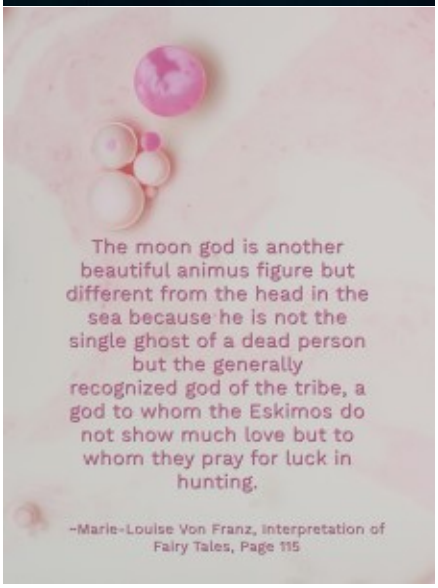
That is the tragedy of such women, but they can get to the turning point, and in the second half of life have their hands healed and can stretch them out for what they want—not from the animus or from the ego, but, according to nature, simply stretch out their hands toward something they love.
–Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 97



It is typical for the animus that, statistically seen, he is generally right, which is why we fall for him. But he is not right in the actual situation.
You might say to such a lonely woman that she should introvert more, sink into her loneliness.

A woman who always gives advice irritates a man. It needs a veiling of the inner face of her animus.
–Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 99

The head is a wonderful image of the animus, with its opinions and musings going on all the time.



The moon god is another beautiful animus figure but different from the head in the sea because he is not the single ghost of a dead person but the generally recognized god of the tribe, a god to whom the Eskimos do not show much love but to whom they pray for luck in hunting.
–Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 115

I have seen analysands again and again cheat themselves in this way.
They fight with animus and anima, abreact the emotion, then think they do not need to talk about it. But this is an illusion!
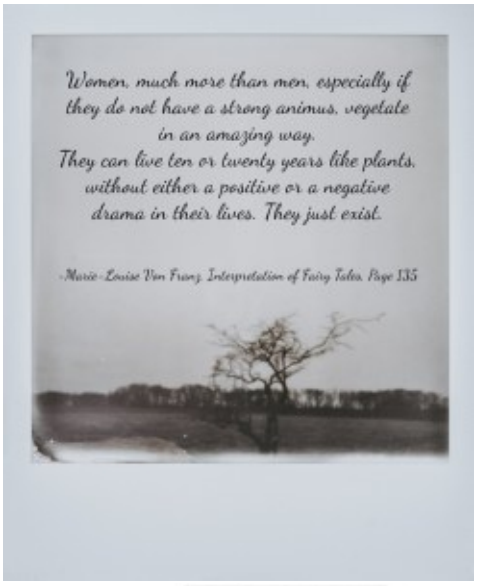
-Marie-Louise Von Franz,
Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 135



Women, much more than men, especially if they do not have a strong animus, vegetate in an amazing way.
They can live ten or twenty years like plants, without either a positive or a negative drama in their lives. They just exist.
-Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 135

When women have an undeveloped animus, when they have not worked on the animus, their mental functions often remain fixed on gossip and thinking about their neighbors.
They get interested in a divorce in the neighborhood and want to know how.
-Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page

And it is very true that if women live alone for a long time without being in touch with men, they generally fall into the hands of the animus.
It is very difficult to stand loneliness without getting overwhelmed by the unconscious, and in a woman's case naturally by the animus.
-Marie-Louise Von Franz, Interpretation of Fairy Tales, Page 198

In the present-day women's liberation movement, the animus plays a very prominent role.
Often the tyrannical boss that women are struggling against is not so much an external man as the tyrannical animus within themselves, which they have projected onto him.
Such women even seem to attract the tyrants in their environments or to choose them as partners.
They fail to see that this is connected with their inner worship of their own animus, which is suppressing their femininity.
The same thing also sometimes holds true for men.
They become womanscorning homosexuals and never see that the cold, inconsiderate, and tyrannical behavior that they criticize in women is seated within themselves.
- Marie-Louise Von Franz,
Archetypal Dimensions of the
Psyche, Page 220-221

It is just the same but one layer further in.
You could say that with a woman the animus always anticipates what she has to do later in reality.
-Marie-Louise Von Franz, The Problem of the Puer Aeternus, Page 16

If she has a puer aeternus animus, she generally has a creative problem, and the cure for women is unfortunately exactly the same as for men: it is also work.
When you say that, do you include having children?
-Marie-Louise Von Franz, The Problem of the Puer

In private life it is the animus of the devouring mother who takes the lead for the sheep-son.

The devouring animus of the mother feeds on the innocence and the best and most devoted feelings of the son. And there too the sheep have been eaten by the shepherd.
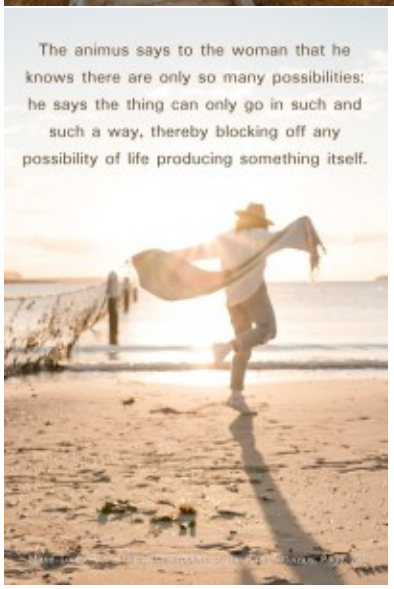
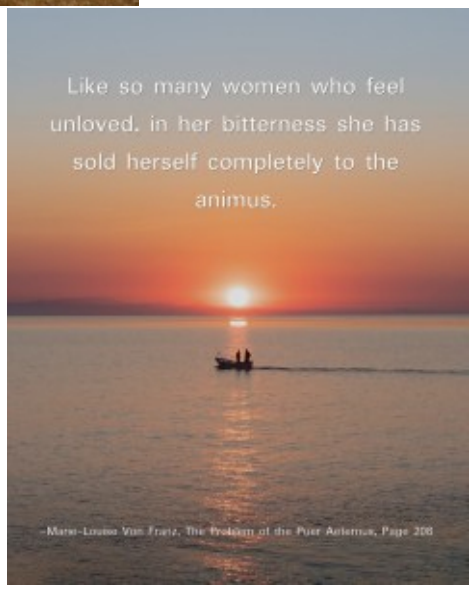
-Marie-Louise Von Franz, The Problem of the Puer Aeternus, Page 44

With a woman, it is the animus who whispers something at the back of her mind, some kind of "nothing but" remark.

In the case of a woman, it is the animus who engineers things, and he is always a professional pessimist who excludes the tertium quod non datur.
-Marie-Louise Von Franz, The Problem of the Puer Aeternus, Page 149



The animus says to the woman that he knows there are only so many possibilities: he says the thing can only go in such and such a way, thereby blocking off any possibility of life producing something itself.



Like so many women who feel unloved, in her bitterness she has sold herself completely to the animus.

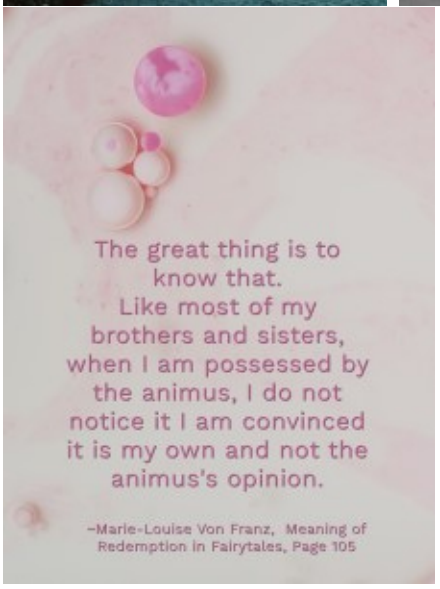
UNFORTUNATELY, POSSESSION CARRIES THE CONVICTION THAT ONE IS RIGHT.
JUST AS RUSSIAN PROTAGONISTS ARE CONVINCED THAT THE WESTERN WORLD IS THE DESTRUCTIVE THING, SO IF THE ANIMUS HAS YOU, YOU ARE SURE THAT IT IS SO.
~Marie-Louise Von Franz, Meaning of Redemption in Fairytales, Page 105



The great thing is to know that.

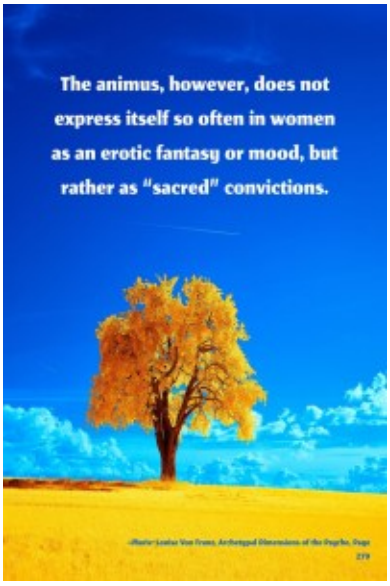
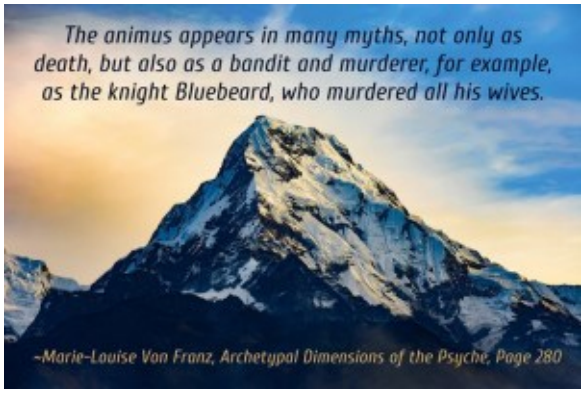
Today the religious symbols that could have served as a vehicle for the projections of anima and animus have lost their meaning for many people.
Anima and animus have fallen back into the unconscious of men and women, where, as Jung showed, they create complications in people's relationships. To this we can ascribe the enormous number of shattered marriages we see around us today.
-Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 220

When men and women get to know more about their own anima or animus, they get along better with the opposite sex and also redeem these figures within themselves.

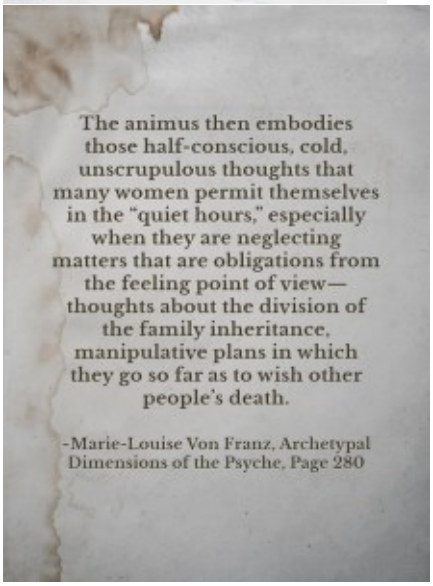


The animus, however, does not express itself so often in women as an erotic fantasy or mood, but rather as "sacred" convictions.

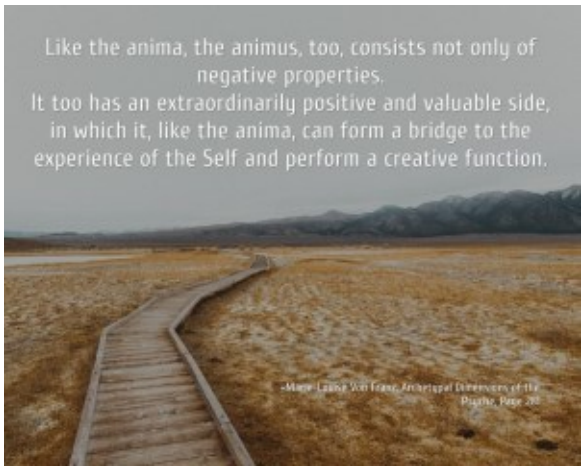
One can seldom contradict the animus, for it (he) is always right; the only problem is that his opinion is not based on the actual situation.



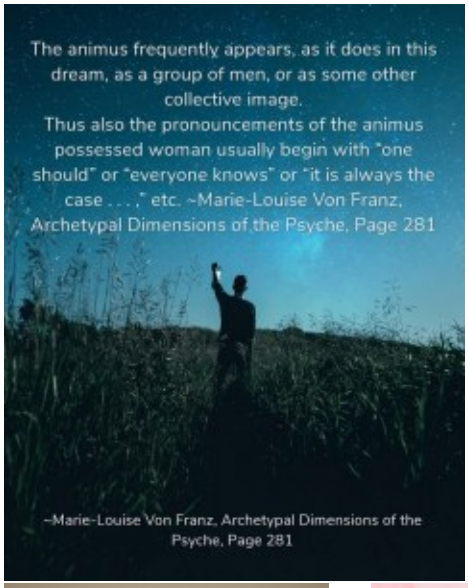
The animus appears in many myths, not only as death, but also as a bandit and murderer, for example, as the knight Bluebeard, who murdered all his wives.
~Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 280



The animus then embodies those half-conscious, cold, unscrupulous thoughts that many women permit themselves in the "quiet hours," especially when they are neglecting matters that are obligations from the feeling point of view—thoughts about the division of the family inheritance, manipulative plans in which they go so far as to wish other people's death.
-Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 280

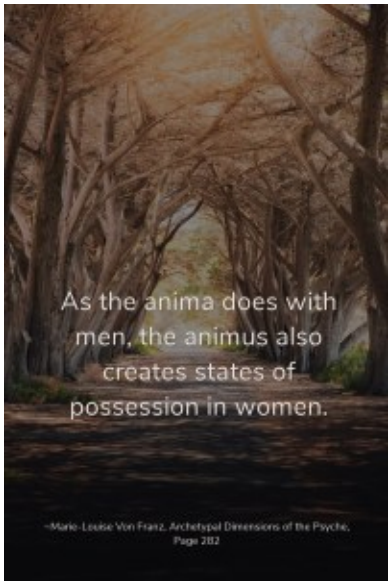


Like the anima, the animus, too, consists not only of negative properties.
It too has an extraordinarily positive and valuable side, in which it, like the anima, can form a bridge to the experience of the Self and perform a creative function.

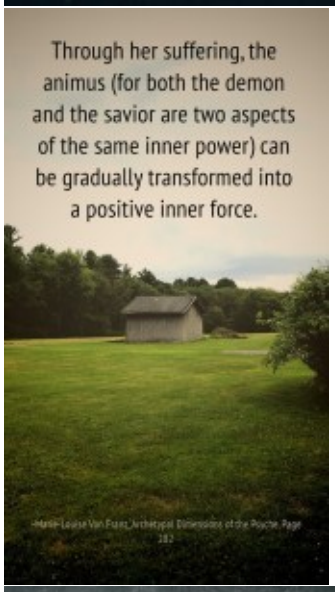


The animus frequently appears, as it does in this dream, as a group of men, or as some other collective image.
Thus also the pronouncements of the animus possessed woman usually begin with "one should" or "everyone knows" or "it is always the case . . . ," etc. ~Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 281
~Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 281

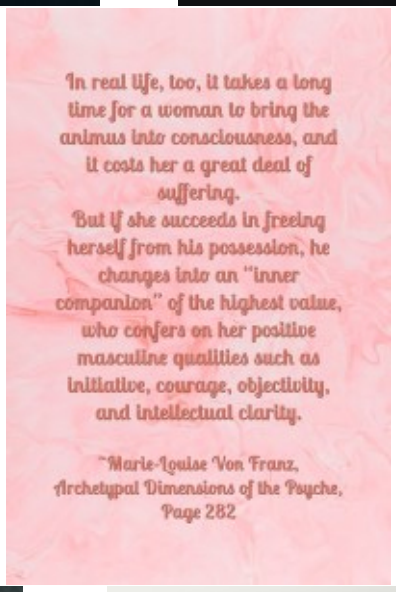
Many myths and fairy tales tell of a prince, who has been turned into an animal or a monster by sorcery, being saved by a woman. This is a symbolic representation of the development of the animus toward consciousness.



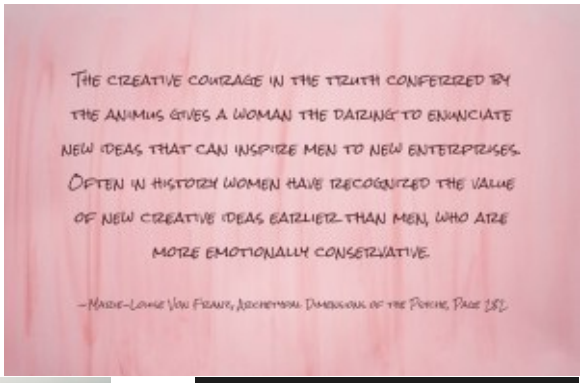
As the anima does with men, the animus also creates states of possession in women.



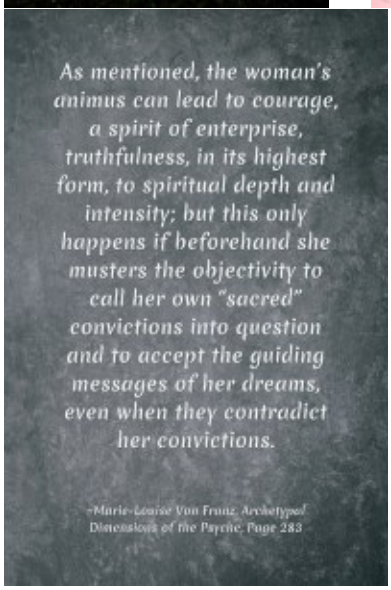
Through her suffering, the animus (for both the demon and the savior are two aspects of the same inner power) can be gradually transformed into a positive inner force.



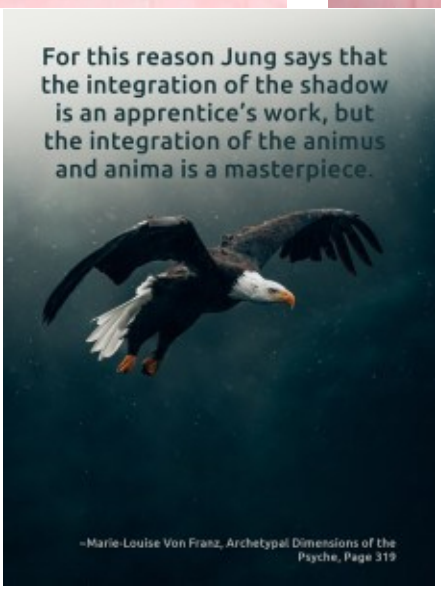
In real life, too, it takes a long time for a woman to bring the animus into consciousness, and it costs her a great deal of suffering.
But if she succeeds in freeing herself from his possession, he changes into an "inner companion" of the highest value, who confers on her positive masculine qualities such as initiative, courage, objectivity, and intellectual clarity.
~Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 282



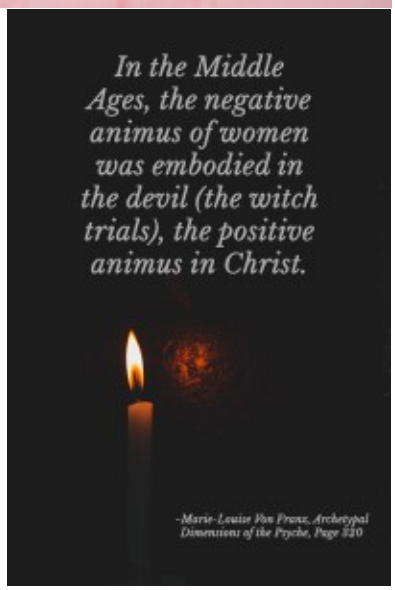
THE CREATIVE COURAGE IN THE TRUTH CONFERRED BY THE ANIMUS GIVES A WOMAN THE DARING TO ENUNCIATE NEW IDEAS THAT CAN INSPIRE MEN TO NEW ENTERPRISES. OFTEN IN HISTORY WOMEN HAVE RECOGNIZED THE VALUE OF NEW CREATIVE IDEAS EARLIER THAN MEN, WHO ARE MORE EMOTIONALLY CONSERVATIVE.
—MARIE-LOUISE VON FRANZ, ARCHETYPAL DIMENSIONS OF THE PSYCHE, PAGE 281



As mentioned, the woman's animus can lead to courage, a spirit of enterprise, truthfulness, in its highest form, to spiritual depth and intensity; but this only happens if beforehand she musters the objectivity to call her own "sacred" convictions into question and to accept the guiding messages of her dreams, even when they contradict her convictions.
~Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 283



For this reason Jung says that the integration of the shadow is an apprentice's work, but the integration of the animus and anima is a masterpiece.
~Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 319



In the Middle Ages, the negative animus of women was embodied in the devil (the witch trials), the positive animus in Christ.
~Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 320

Women in general have this tendency– to take up new ideas, new movements, because their mind (the animus in them) is less bound by tradition.

Today the problem of projection of animus and anima onto collective religious figures has become much less acute, and thus these contents exert pressure directly and immediately on the individual. Hence the vulnerability of marriages.
~Marie-Louise Von Franz, Archetypal Dimensions of the Psyche, Page 320

The beard plays an enormous role in fairy tales. You know the story of Bluebeard, who killed his wives.
Now he is a wonderful image of the destructive, murderous animus!
There is also the tale of King Thrushbeard, which illustrates the transformation of the negative into the positive animus.
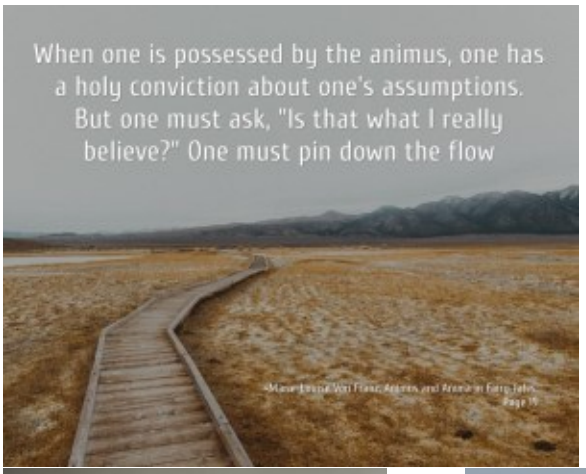
~Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 18



When one is possessed by the animus, one has a holy conviction about one's assumptions.
But one must ask, "Is that what I really believe?" One must pin down the flow

Women cannot fight the animus by killing him-they can only (catch him by pinning him by the beard so they can then escape. The male hero in myths fights, overcomes, conquers the monster.
The feminine follows the path of individuation by suffering and escaping.
It is enough if a woman can walk out into the human situation, rebuild human relatedness, relationship.
~Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 20

If a woman hasn't gone through the experience of being trapped by the demon animus, she has only unconscious thoughts.
It is the demon who provides her.
~Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 21

Such a woman becomes a vampire because she has no life in herself. But she needs life and so must take it where she finds it.
The negative devil-animus kills every feminine aspect in life.
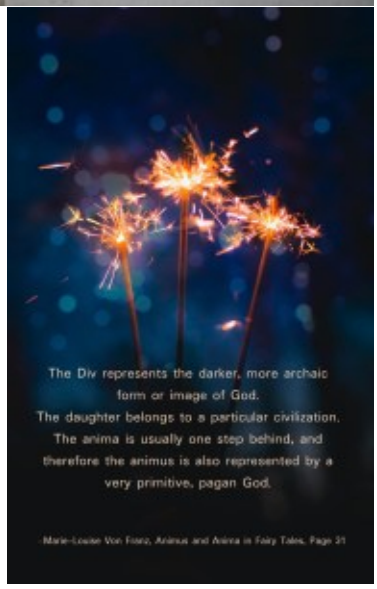
~Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 23



The Div represents the darker, more archaic form or image of God.
The daughter belongs to a particular civilization.
The anima is usually one step behind, and therefore the animus is also represented by a very primitive, pagan God.
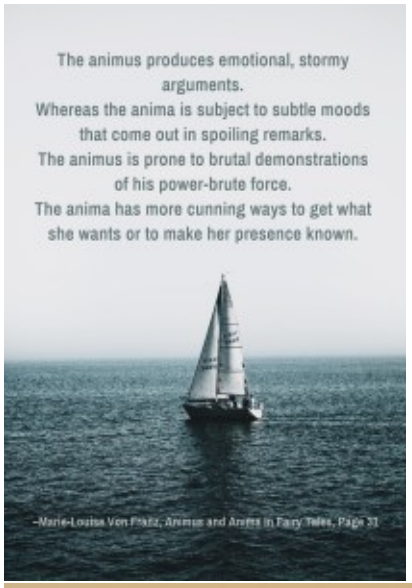
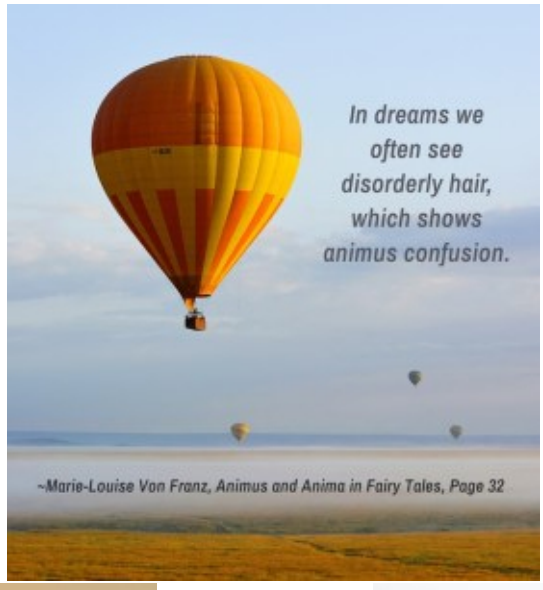
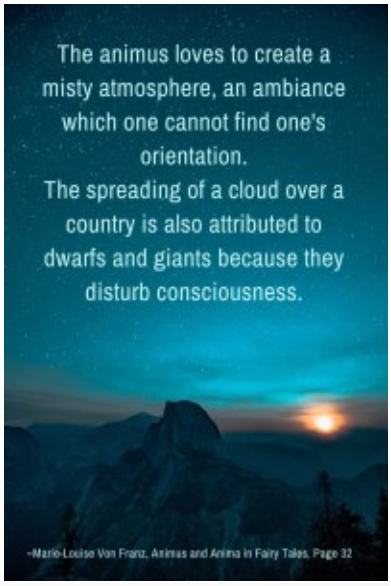
Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 31



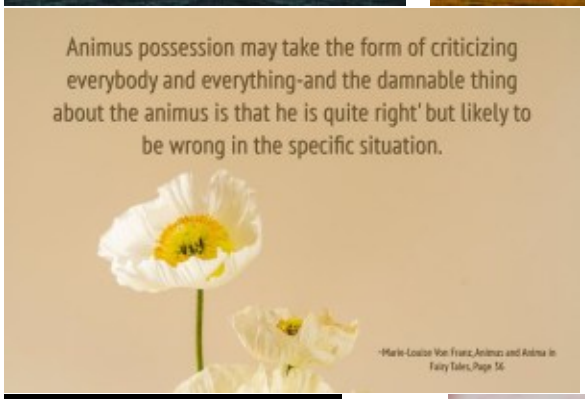
The animus produces emotional, stormy arguments.
Whereas the anima is subject to subtle moods that come out in spoiling remarks.
The animus is prone to brutal demonstrations of his power-brute force.
The anima has more cunning ways to get what she wants or to make her presence known.



In dreams we often see disorderly hair, which shows animus confusion.
~Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 32



The animus loves to create a misty atmosphere, an ambiance which one cannot find one's orientation.
The spreading of a cloud over a country is also attributed to dwarfs and giants because they disturb consciousness.



Animus possession may take the form of criticizing everybody and everything-and the damnable thing about the animus is that he is quite right' but likely to be wrong in the specific situation.

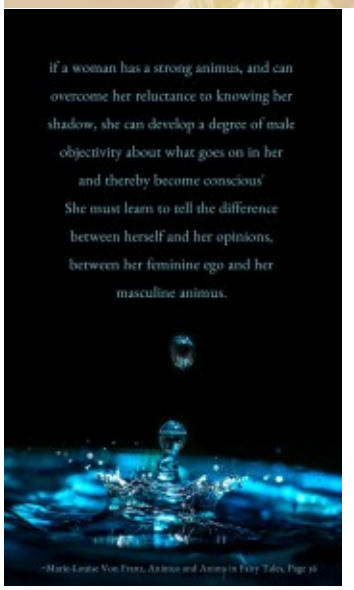
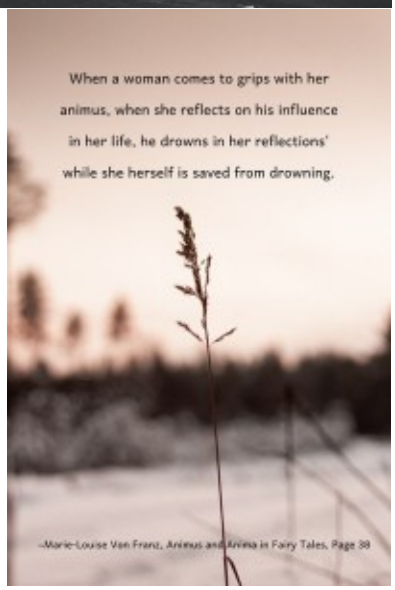
~Marie-Louise Von Franz. Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales. Page 36

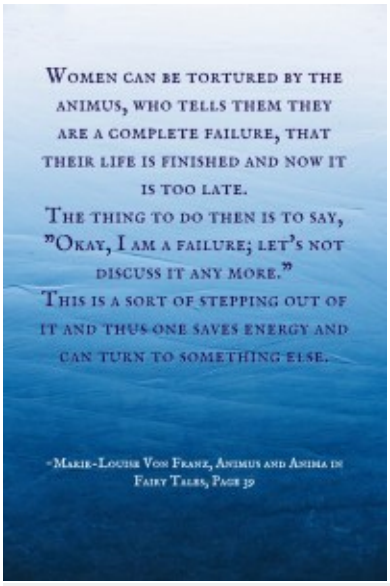


if a woman has a strong animus, and can overcome her reluctance to knowing her shadow, she can develop a degree of male objectivity about what goes on in her and thereby become conscious'
She must learn to tell the difference between herself and her opinions, between her feminine ego and her masculine animus.

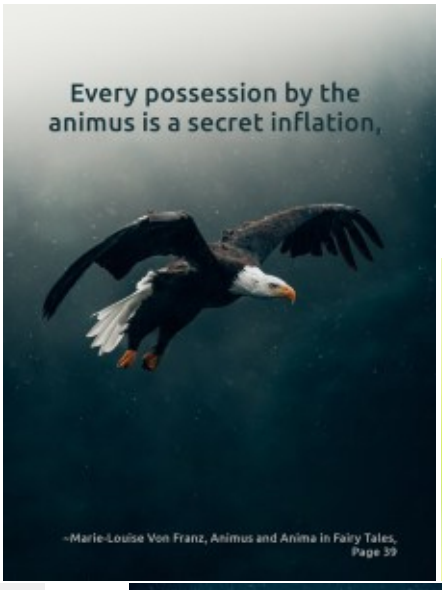
Jung once said that where love is lacking, power jumps in.
A woman with a strong animus has a prestige persona which she tries to protect. That is power.
~Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 37



When a woman comes to grips with her animus, when she reflects on his influence in her life, he drowns in her reflections' while she herself is saved from drowning.

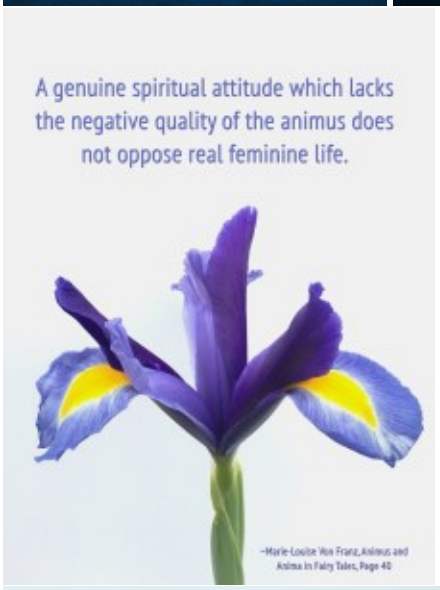


Women can be tortured by the animus, who tells them they are a complete failure, that their life is finished and now it is too late.
The thing to do then is to say, "Okay, I am a failure; let's not discuss it any more."
This is a sort of stepping out of it and thus one saves energy and can turn to something else.
~Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 39

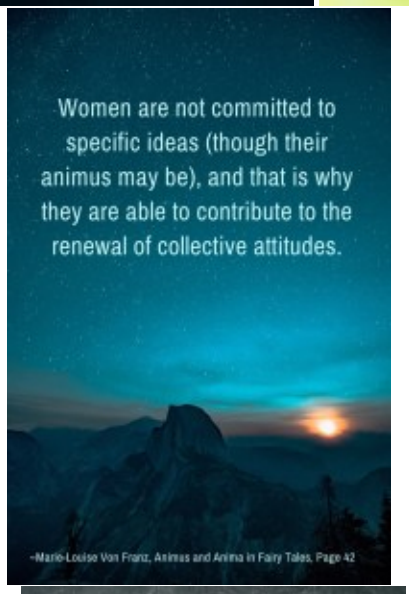


Every possession by the animus is a secret inflation,
~Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 39

If you check on the standards used by the animus in his constant criticism, you find that they are always a collective truth, something much beyond the individual. Every possession by the animus is a secret inflation,

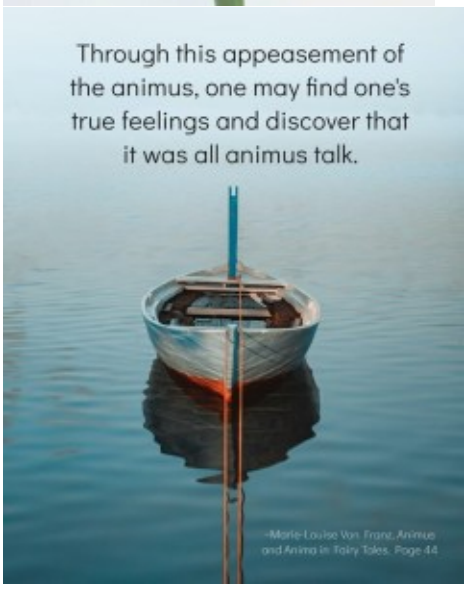


A genuine spiritual attitude which lacks the negative quality of the animus does not oppose real feminine life.
~Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 40

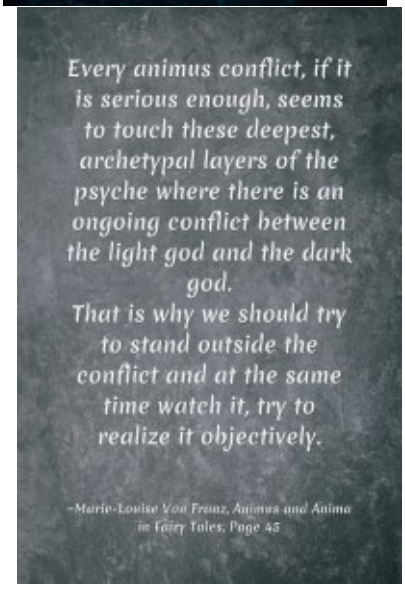


Women are not committed to specific ideas (though their animus may be), and that is why they are able to contribute to the renewal of collective attitudes.
~Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 42

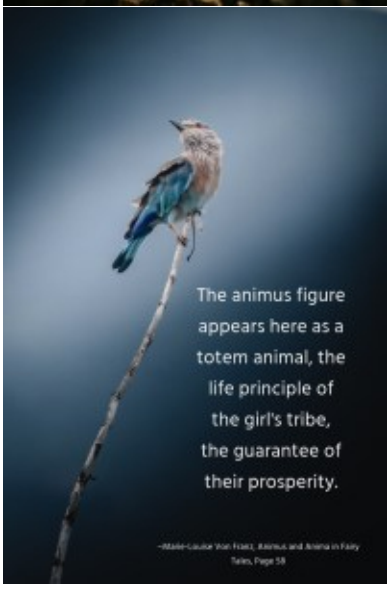
The animus is frequently like this, too impatient: a woman feels she must make up her mind immediately, cut through a situation, act one way or another, instead of waiting for the pregnant psyche to bring forth the proper new development.



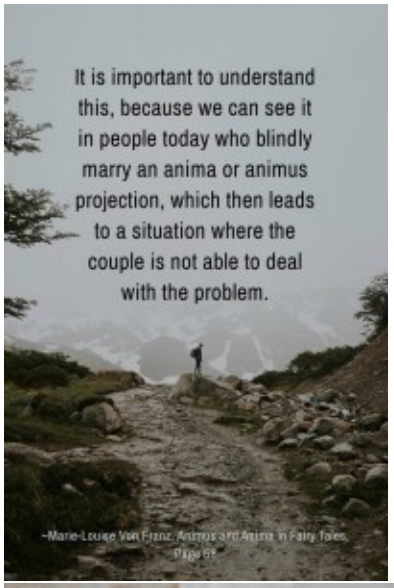
Through this appeasement of the animus, one may find one's true feelings and discover that it was all animus talk.
~Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 44



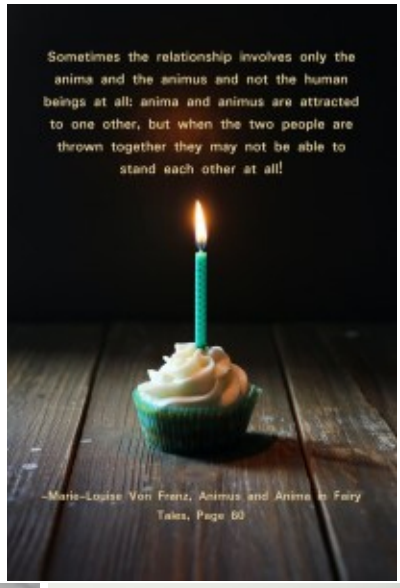
Every animus conflict, if it is serious enough, seems to touch these deepest, archetypal layers of the psyche where there is an ongoing conflict between the light god and the dark god.
That is why we should try to stand outside the conflict and at the same time watch it, try to realize it objectively.
~Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 45



The animus figure appears here as a totem animal, the life principle of the girl's tribe, the guarantee of their prosperity.

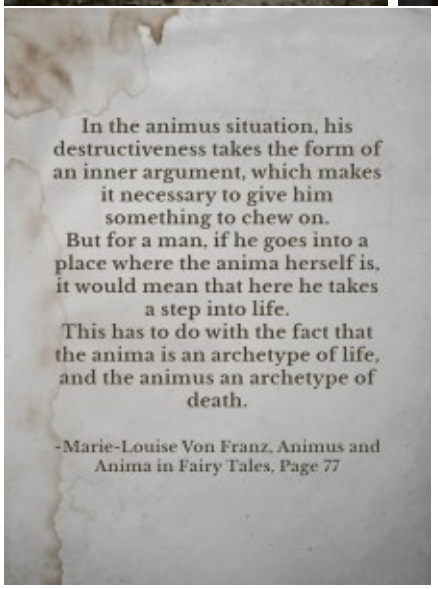


It is important to understand this, because we can see it in people today who blindly marry an anima or animus projection, which then leads to a situation where the couple is not able to deal with the problem.
-Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 69

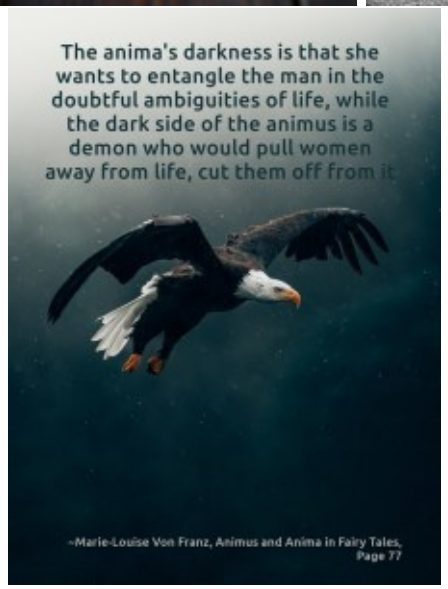


Sometimes the relationship involves only the anima and the animus and not the human beings at all: anima and animus are attracted to one other, but when the two people are thrown together they may not be able to stand each other at all!
-Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 69

Animus and anima are not always happy to have this relationship-they lose part of their power when they are made conscious. They would prefer to remain gods and goddesses and keep their power.



In the animus situation, his destructiveness takes the form of an inner argument, which makes it necessary to give him something to chew on.
But for a man, if he goes into a place where the anima herself is, it would mean that here he takes a step into life.
This has to do with the fact that the anima is an archetype of life, and the animus an archetype of death.
-Marie-Louise Von Franz, Animus and Anima in Fairy Tales, Page 77



The anima's darkness is that she wants to entangle the man in the doubtful ambiguities of life, while the dark side of the animus is a demon who would pull women away from life, cut them off from it

[1]Visions Seminar

8 November 1933 Visions Seminar LECTURE V

The last vision ended with that circle of old men, the animi.

The new vision was called "The Procession of the Dead," and was a continuation of the same scene-our patient was still talking to the old men.

And we discussed the advisability of leaving those old fellows, who seemed to her so lifeless, and of going out into the market place which symbolized the collective life.

Then having come out there, she said: "The market place was deserted. All was dark. I stood alone."

A market place is supposed to be full of life, thousands of people coming and going, yet here it is dull and empty. What does that mean?

Dr. Harding: Her libido is withdrawn.

Dr. Jung: Yes, so nothing happens.

One sees that particularly in cases of melancholia, as well as in all ordinary depressions; the whole world and the people in it seem to be lifeless, dead.

In melancholia it goes almost as far as an illusion.

A man once told me that the world looked quite unreal, like a photographic reproduction; it was not even plastic, just flat, and without color or movement, as if everything were frozen or congealed.

So when this woman comes out into the open, she finds that her libido is withdrawn from the world, and she feels that she stands alone.

Yet, she says: The great buildings still clashed together and again I saw the red mangled birds screaming up into the sky. A great wind blew.

We have already spoken of those birds, but what would it denote that a great wind was blowing?

Dr. Shaw: Spirit.

Dr. Jung: The wind symbolizes spirit or pneuma, but what does it mean that a great spirit is blowing?

Dr. Harding: It is the missing libido. There is no movement or life in the sthiila aspect, but in the sukshma aspect there is still life.

Dr. Jung: That is perfectly true. Her libido has withdrawn from the sthiila aspect of existence.

Mrs. Smith and Mr. Jones and concrete life as it is in its ordinary aspect, all that is empty.

The only thing that is alive is another aspect: all those phenomena are moved by a great wind.

I cannot help feeling an analogy here with what I have just seen in Germany.

Individuals hardly matter there any longer, everything is moved by the great wind.

I did not think of this vision then, but in trying to formulate my impression of the atmosphere, the only analogy I could find was a tremendous storm.

That enormous uprush of forces is as indistinct as the wind, one doesn’t know where it started or where it is going; it is a phenomenon of which nobody knows the interpretation.

The concrete conditions are, one could say, almost obsolete, they are at all events indifferent; not even the people concerned, the individual conditions, matter very much; everybody is fascinated by the great movement because every individual fate depends upon it.

They all feel shaken by that wind and only want to know what it is doing.

As when you are being carried along in a moving crowd, you naturally want to know where it is going, because that will be your fate; you cannot consider your own position or your own choice, you have none, you simply move along.

In our vision we are confronted with a very similar situation.

Our patient is affected by the great wind, she is no longer concerned with individuals, so naturally she would like to know what that whole movement means. This is the secret movement of collectivity.

To put it into concrete form, one could say that she drops into America right out of analysis and finds there a peculiar secret movement going on, the sukshma aspect.

And she asks herself what the sukshma aspect of that noise and movement which they call American life may be.

Her unconscious smells a rat; not being concerned with individuals her unconscious is concerned with the secret forces underlying the American activity.

Mind you, that was some time ago; she had this vision, I think, in 1926 or 1927, before the actual conditions in America had become obvious.

But they were already there, whatever is happening now was there then in the germ, and the unconscious might have had a hunch about it.

As one might have had a hunch about the feelings that were in preparation in the year 1926 here in Europe, one might have felt that wind already starting in the unconscious.

So one could say that such a vision was really a hunch about the things that were to come, namely, that after a while the individual and individual conditions would not matter so much because a great wind would come up and move the whole nation.

And that will be interesting, because every individual fate will depend upon the movement.

Now after this statement one would expect an attempt at an interpretation of what is happening, and she says: "I saw, winding through the streets, a burial procession."

The movement in the streets is first called the wind, and now the unconscious tries to formulate it better.

For the wind is invisible, so one has the feeling that that spirit, or dynamic phenomenon, should be grasped in the shape of a vision; and here instead of the wind she sees the movement in a visible form, as a burial procession winding through the streets.

She continues: All the men were in black with black hoods. They carried a bier, and behind the bier walked men with torches. I stood with my arms out to stop them. They stopped. I said: "I would behold the corpse." I lifted the black pall. Beneath it there was nothing. I cried out asking: "Where is the dead?" Then the men called in a loud and awful voice: "Behold we are the dead." They are celebrating their own funeral, they are corpses carrying an empty bier; they are all dead and are going to bury themselves as their own corpses.

This is the interpretation of the wind, this is the sukshma aspect.

Now what kind of feeling does this vision give you?

Dr. Barker: The world today is celebrating its own funeral, as it were.

Dr. Jung: Yes, you see that is rather banal, you can read it in the papers, and in books, it has been said very often already.

It is a very pessimistic point of view.

Of course, the world won't go to hell or come to an end, the day of judgment has not arrived; it merely means that something is going on which causes a disturbance, and that is represented as the great wind.

Mrs. Sigg: Old customs and ideas and forms of living are perhaps dead, so it might be the time just before a rebirth.

Dr. Jung: Exactly.

It means that a new spirit is stirring, a new attitude is coming, and naturally all the old convictions and ideas are decaying, they are going to their own funeral; all that has to vanish. If you compare the America of today with America as it was seven years ago, say, you find a tremendous difference.

Many of the old convictions have vanished prohibition has evaporated, for instance, even the gangsters are slowly beginning to disappear; and American prosperity has gone by the board, it is no longer what it used to be.

America is in a condition which she has never experienced before in her history; even in the most critical times of the Civil War there was no such stagnation.

It looks as if America has reached her limits as we have in Europe.

There is nothing further to explore here, we do no more pioneer work because Europe is full to the brim.

And that is now true of America; they begin to realize there that a continent has certain limitations, that in a way they have come to the end of their rope; and since the conditions are changing, the spirit of the country will change.

Therefore it is quite possible that our patient, upon leaving Europe and analysis, where she was deeply imbued by the collective unconscious, would instantly feel the incipient future movement that is going on behind the scenes when confronted with America.

Of course, the impression is not realized, it is realized as little as her own experiences of the collective unconscious, which are only faintly perceived.

I am sure she did not realize that she was feeling something of the life of the nation, as little as I would have then been able to tell her that she was realizing something of the sukshma aspect of American psychology.

I would not have dared to go as far as that, for one feels a peculiar hesitancy when it comes to interpretations which have an importance for the future.

Dr. Escher: When the Holy Ghost descended upon the disciples at Pentecost, it was said that a powerful wind was filling the house.

Dr.: Jung: Yes, the wind symbolized the pneuma, and together with the tongues of fire, it would also mean the destruction of the old values.

Mrs. Crowley: There were terrible winds and storms at the time of Caesar's death just before the Christian era.

Dr. Harding: Christ said to one of his disciples: "Let the dead past bury their dead."

Dr. Jung: That is the same idea.

Dr. Escher: I meant especially that the disciples had to bury their old ideas. It was the birth of a new idea, they themselves must go their own way through the burial and birth.

Dr. Jung: Yes, that was destruction and birth at the same time.

Here we are only concerned with the burial, but one may expect that after such destruction rebirth will follow.

For it is perfectly plain that those figures that form the funeral procession are the dead, the bier is empty, they only carry it as a sort of symbol.

She continues: They pulled off their hoods and I saw their faces sad and ghostly in the flickering light of the torches. They said: "The ground beneath our feet is hot. Beneath us there must be life but we are dead."

This demonstrates the character of the situation.

The things that are visible on the surface are dead, her libido is withdrawn from them, and naturally that libido must be found elsewhere because it cannot disappear; so it must be underneath because we always instinctively think of the unconscious as being below, in the earth or in the sea.

And the dead say that the ground under their feet is hot, which means that there is fire underneath, a tremendous accumulation of energy or tension.

Then in a not very polite way she exhorts them to dig: I said: "Dig, you fools." They began to dig. Suddenly the paving stones cracked and burst and a great fire rushed up from the earth with volcanic fury. It cast forth wild beasts and strange half-human forms. The men shrieked and ran. The wild animals prowled down the silent streets.

How do you interpret this?

Miss Hannah: Everything which has been repressed by the Christian era bursts up again from below.

Dr. Jung: Let us say the late Christian era, particularly the Victorian age, whose god was respectability.

That attitude blindfolded humanity; also a certain politic optimism that man was very nice, always meaning well and doing the right thing, while in reality he is always doing the wrong thing.

We do not realize what he really is and what our ideals really are; we quite forget that our ideals are compensations for just the opposite quality.

To have certain ideals doesn't mean that they express our situation; it means that they are compensatory for something that is quite the other way round.

Our ideal of respectability means that we are by no means respectable.

The Greeks and Romans said of the Persians that they were the dirtiest dogs that ever existed, and therefore had the highest ideal of purity, the purest religion.

And Christians have the most cruel and bloodthirsty record ever known, and therefore they have an ideal of love.

Look at what they did in the East, calling it a crusade.

In the later crusades they did not even go to Jerusalem, they went to Byzantium for the imperial treasure there; and on their way through the Balkans and Asia Minor they burned and plundered everything they could lay hands on.

What we have done to the world in general is unheard of, and all in the name of Jesus.

Not to speak of the World War.

Well, below that respectable surface there is fire, and there are wild beasts and strange half-human forms which are not even animal, but something much worse, something between animal and man.

What would that be?

Miss Hannah: All sorts of monsters and mental deformities.

Dr. Jung: What would you call mental deformities?

Miss Hannah: There are a lot of mythological beasts, like centaurs and fauns and satyrs and incubi.

Dr. Barker: Beasts in human form would be bout the extreme I should think.

Dr. Jung: Yes, or a human being in animal form, a sort of perversity of nature, neither animal nor man but an awful thing in between.

You see, just through his progress man has caused such monstrosities to exist, for he only advanced on one side and the other was left in the dark undeveloped.

So the intellect, for instance, was allowed to produce the most monstrous devices and convictions; and the feeling was allowed to develop monstrosities because it was not counterbalanced by the mind; everything got out of proportion, so the most hellish beings were created.

In the Middle Ages a man in my position-medicine men, priests, and so on-would have said to the people: "By your misbehavior you have created half-human forms; you have allowed your intellect to act by itself without the balance of the instincts, and it has produced monstrous forms by illicit intercourse with matter; it has created machines, monsters hooting and tooting through the streets killing people, eating up human lives; you have invented half-living things that are only comparable to such horrors as the mandragora, or those awful monsters the succubi, which cause terrible diseases, all sorts of ailments to humanity."

Paracelsus used a similar argument at the time of the great epidemic of bubonic plague, when everybody was in despair, particularly the doctors who could do nothing against it.

He wrote a letter to the emperor telling him that the pest could only be suppressed if he would suppress the brothels, where the prostitutes were bringing forth succubi or incubi instead of real children; the bubonic pest, he said, was due to the generation of those demons, it was caused through a perversion of the natural instincts of propagation.

And the Gnostics had the very similar idea that the suffering of the world was brought about by the intercourse of mind with matter.

The serpent in Paradise was such a monster, neither animal nor human, and that serpent had much to do with the beginning of human consciousness.

For nature can only be completely unconscious; with consciousness begins the deviation from the course of nature.

We are always deviating, and we are always having to find the way back.

Our consciousness tries to persuade us that we can go very far away; our whole civilization has been a gigantic attempt to force nature into our rational schemes; the machine age was an attempt at a substitution-as if we could escape the unconsciousness of nature.

Conscious rationalism went too far and had to return; that became a monstrosity which led to chaos.

So this part of the vision shows that not only the animal instinct has been suppressed and lost, but also an insight into the real character of our conscious attempts to master nature: it really produces perversities.

Here a volcanic outburst brings out all those animals that go prowling through the silent streets.

This is by no means a unique idea.

There is a very similar idea in Die andere Seite by Kubin.

He describes how the city in the unconscious is slowly invaded by all sorts of wild animals, they creep out apparently from nowhere and appear among human beings, and they are preparatory to an absolute change in the unconscious.

That book is also a sort of prophetic anticipation of the outburst of volcanic forces in our days.

One can see these things in the sthiila aspect of the actual conditions in Germany, one can see the uprush of the unconscious dynamis, the big snakes and the prowling animals-all that happens in reality.

The wildest instincts have been let out onto the streets, and Germany is now trying to deal with that explosion of the collective unconscious.

And America is not far from it; what the farmers are actually doing in America is not so far from what is happening in Germany; perhaps America will also have to deal with such an outburst.

Now the patient says: "The fire roared up and consumed the bier." What does that mean?

Dr. Harding: It means that the new thing is overcoming and replacing the old.

Dr. Jung: Yes. The bier is the symbol, one could say, that expresses the meaning of, or characterizes, the funeral procession.

And this idea is consumed by the fire, there is no question now of the things that have gone by, they are consumed.

The thing that matters now is the fire and the prowling beasts.

She continues: I walked away wondering if the whole city would be consumed. All the streets converged into one narrow way and I found myself again descending the black path with black rocks high on either side.

What path is this? We have already seen it several times.

Mrs. Crowley: It sounds like the serpentine path of the unconscious, the spiral way.

Dr. Jung: But the unconscious has many ways; this is a very specific path.

Miss Hannah: The way of Tao?

Dr. Jung: Not necessarily.

No, this is her own path where she is fenced in with high rocks on either side; there is no escape, it is her inevitable path.

Now what does it mean, that all these streets in New York are converging into one path?

Mrs. Sigg: It means that the whole of New York does not really concern her, only the individual path is important for her.

Dr. Jung: Is that not morbid egocentricity?

Mrs. Crowley: She contains all those paths.

Dr.: Jung: That would be a hell of an inflation, I should say.

Mrs. Crowley: Or she may be contained in them, all those various paths converge into one.

Mrs. Baumann: It would be more like what you said about the person in a crowd and the big wind. For if all the streets converge into one path it is her own path, and that is in between the collective situation.

Dr. Jung: Ah yes, but when you are caught in a crowd that is rushing along, you are naturally interested in where it is going; for you cannot get out, you must follow.

In Germany at present everybody asks where that thing is going, where it will land, and nobody asks, where shall I land, because there is no question of the individual landing anywhere, it is a question of a whole nation.

Suppose Zurich were suddenly surrounded by water which threatened us with extinction; nobody would ask where do I land, but where do we land; we would simply be caught.

So in Germany the multitude is acting like one man despite the differences of opinion, they are all caught in the same movement; whether they say yes or no, whether they are willing to follow that crowd or not does not matter, they are carried away.

That is a very specific condition, and it is difficult to see a connection with this symbolism, where she suddenly finds that all the paths are converging into one.

And mind you, it is her own path that she has described again and again, with high black rocks on either side and no escape.

Dr. Harding: These two things are really equivalent. In the one case the crowd is being considered and the individual is lost; but you can put it the other way round, for the crowd consists of individuals, and through concentrating on the path of one individual, the path of the crowd will be found.

Dr. Jung: Exactly, and you can put that into one very short formula: it is the sukshma aspect of the collective movement.

This collective movement will naturally draw her attention away from herself, everybody forgets themselves, they can't afford to think of themselves.

But then one is simply confronted with the rush of wild waters in which nobody is conscious of himself.

This should not be, for there is then no consciousness of the movement, and people should have insight, they should want to know what is happening and to understand the meaning of such a collective movement.

And you can only come to an understanding of its meaning when you come to the understanding of your individual way within that movement.

Despite the fact that your body and your personal consciousness is being moved along, you should be able to stand still mentally and ask yourself what you feel and think about it. What does it mean, and what is this fellow here doing and saying?

Then you discover the sukshma aspect of it and then you can say that it is your individual way, just as any German at this time must discover that what is happening is his individual way; there is no escape for the individual.

I asked people who are right in the midst of the movement-I mean thinking people-and they told me exactly that.

There is nothing to be done about it, and the point is that you can surrender to it without knowing what the thing is or where it leads to, whether it leads to complete destruction or to a victory of some unknown kind.

You can surrender to it because it is your individual way.

You see, that is a complete acceptance of things as they are.

To be able to accept things as they are, inside and outside, is the way to individuation; without that acceptance you can never find yourself because you will always be peculiarly identical with everything.

That is, you are a microcosm, and a microcosm is also a macrocosm; you are the people, you are the world, and when you accept things as they are, you come into your own.

Our patient, then, is confronted with the individual path, that inescapable way which leads further down. She says: "I sat down sad and weeping."

This doesn’t look very hopeful, she obviously does not like that path.

It is true that it is the easiest thing in the world to be carried by collectivity, moved by the wind, because one then has to make no effort, one can drift with the crowd.

In a way, that is a beautiful experience, yet it is exceedingly dangerous because it always leads to a place of stagnation-all the waters run down to a place of stagnation.

And so it happens with all those blind movements, they never lead up, they always lead down.

The greatest display of energy is always where there is a potential, where something is coming crashing down there is energy; but after a while that comes to a standstill, it cannot go on eternally.

Therefore the longer such a movement lasts, the more people with insight or mind realize the need of understanding it, the need of opening their eyes and seeing what it leads to.

You see, no river has ever built power works, man has done that; he can do it with a rush of energy provided that he opens his eyes and sees.

He can say to himself: "Now here is good water power, here is a cascade which gives me the necessary energy to drive my wheel."

But he must build the wheel, he must know how to use the power which nature has given, perhaps in abundance.

To realize the trend of things will help him to open his eyes.

For it is necessary for each one to realize what all this means to him, what he feels as his own necessity in the movement, and what his attitude is to it.

And that is the individual path.

This is a rather difficult task because the temptation to follow the current is so great that one feels it almost impossible to resist.

Our patient is here confronted with this task; she should see the phenomenon by which she is surrounded, the collective movement, as her individual experience in which she is caught.

It is then no longer the experience of the masses, it is her own experience.

She must begin to ask herself where it leads to; she must sit down and reflect upon it.

The text continues: "I said: 'Is there no end to this black path into the valley which I must travel?'"

You see, that is exactly the question.

It is the way of the waters, rushing down to the valley, the place of standstill, and when it arrives in the valley it will at last be quiet, it will not be a cascade, it may even be a lake-anyway a more or less complete standstill.

Then she says something very peculiar.

Perhaps you can divine what that would be.

Suppose you are caught in such a maelstrom of collective movement; you only feel that tremendous rush of waters pouring down, and you are able to stop for a moment and you begin to wonder and worry about it.

Now what could you do?

Obviously it would be an attempt to stop the mad rush of things.

Dr.: Reichstein: I would look into the valley to see where it was going.

Dr. Jung: But the question is what we can do about it when things are rushing down like that.

Why should we become aware of our individual path?

It looks as if fate itself were trying to make us conscious that it is our choice whether we follow, or whether we can stop it, or whether we might be able to give a certain direction to the movement.

If everybody in the crowd realized that they were running into an abyss, what would they do?

Dr. Reichstein: As long as she does not know about the abyss, she cannot know whether it is advisable to follow.

Dr. Jung: Yes, but let us assume that she sees the path to be going down and realizes that she cannot possibly run with the herd all the time.

Miss Hannah: I think she would like to find another mandala, a protecting circle.

Dr. Jung: That is a good idea, she would look for a protective circle against the onslaught of the crowd.

Mr. Allemann: She would try to go back.

Dr. Jung: Impossible, you cannot swim against that current.

Mrs. Sigg: She might try to find a higher standpoint.

Dr. Barker: Or to find somebody to cooperate.

Dr. Jung: Those are also good ideas. Now who could cooperate with her?

Dr.: Shaw: The animus?

Dr.: Jung: If there were a positive animus it might help, but usually the animus is running along with the collective unconscious.

Mrs. Crowley: Would she not consult her dreams?

Dr. Jung: Yes, but the object here is not so much to have dreams as to do something about the situation.

She is trying to reflect about it, and she comes to a certain conclusion.

Dr. Shaw: She must have a shelter, she must get away where she can meditate.

Dr. Barker: She may find a niche.

Mr. Allemann: A cave in the rock.

Dr. Harding: She might cry with the psalmist: "Lead me to the rock that is higher than I."

Dr. Jung: Yes, we have already met such a rock in the vision, and what did we say about it?

You see, it is an overwhelming situation; perhaps the only thing to do is to cling to a passing log and try to keep afloat.

One is pretty desperate. Now what do people do in such conditions?

Miss Hannah: She would try to find the Self of which she is the object.

Dr. Barker: People usually pray.

Dr. Jung: There you have it. She says: "I wanted to pray. Then I knew that I could only pray to my star."

The star is a symbol of her uniqueness.

As stars are unique units in the heavens, so individuals are in a way stars, they are unique units.

The innermost substance is a microcosm, as every star is a microcosm.

The earth is a microcosm in the great cosmos of the stars and we are ourselves microcosms upon the earth.

Each of us, every living being, is a small earth, one could say, because we are in intimate connection with the earth, we are partially earth, we are conscious of our earthly body, for instance.

The star symbol means the center of a mandala, and the meditation on the Self or the meditation on the mandala is prayer; in many different religions that concentration upon a point outside of oneself, not identical with oneself, is called prayer.

One could not say that the ego was the microcosm because the ego is only the center or the focus of the individual consciousness, and consciousness reaches only as far as the conscious material reaches.

It doesn't even cover the very important functions of the digestion, or the heart; for instance, there are enormous spaces of the psyche that lie beyond the conscious sphere.

So the totality of all that is not the ego-the ego is merely one part that belongs to a totality-the sum total is called the Self.

The center of that totality does not necessarily coincide with the ego system, just as the center of our galaxy of stars does not coincide with our sun, and the center of our solar system does not coincide with the earth; we cannot assume that our earth is the center of the universe.

It was discovered long ago that the earth is in the periphery of something bigger, it is an appendix of the sun, and even the sun is an appendix of a larger system, a galaxy of unknown extent.

We cannot think of our earth as a sun, nothing is revolving round us except perhaps the moon; the ego is a little system like the earth with the moon, but it is by no means the center of the universe.

The Self is the center of the totality of the psyche in as far as we can measure it or have an intuition about it, or in as far as we have dreams about it, and surely beyond, for we cannot assume that we are informed through our dreams of everything that is happening in our psyche.

We cannot even be certain that it is our own psyche; it might be, but there are many things in our unconscious, and we are by no means sure whether they really belong to us or to somebody else.

It is quite sure that we are somewhere swimming in the same river with everybody else, and that certain contents are flowing and drifting in between individuals, so sometimes they are in me and sometimes they are in another.

Therefore in a desperate situation like this, the religious reaction is absolutely to the point; this woman must have something to cling to that lifts her out of the rush of the waters; otherwise she will be carried away.

If she wants to stop, to become reflective, if she wants to realize her inner vision, she must have a point d ’appui; she must have a point outside of the earth, where she can put in her lever.

And that is the Self, often symbolized as a star, the real center of the mandala.

Now she goes on: "I took it" (the star) "forth from my breast and laid it on the ground and knelt before it."

Here we learn that the star has been in her breast. And with what was it identical there?

Mrs. Baumann: It is the flame in anahata.

Dr. Jung: Yes, and the flame in the Tantric yoga is the vision of Ishvara, it is the germ of the supreme principle, of Shiva himself, the god, but in his most individual form; the individual light spark would be the star.

There are other synonyms in other religious systems.

In the Vedic hymns, for instance, this center is not called Shiva but Hiranyagharbha, which means the golden germ.

It is also called the golden child, and the golden egg.

Of course compared to the sun, it is a star; the morning star often has the meaning of this star.

Now what does it mean that she takes the star out of her breast and lays it on the ground.

How can one take the Self out of one’s breast and kneel before it as if it were an idol?

Mrs. Crowley: It is in order to see it-as if she could become a kind of object outside of herself.

Dr: Jung: Yes, she objectifies that idea or intuition of the Self in a visible form and makes an idol of it.

That seems to us almost heathenish, for we labor under the impression that we should not make images of sacred things, of the idea of God, for instance, because it would be idolatry.

Apparently her unconscious is in favor of it, however; it is here represented that she is even worshipping that intuition of the Self, as an objectified form. Now why should that be concretized?

Remark: She should meditate upon it, betrachten.

Dr: Jung: Yes, but first it must be objectified, concretized, and then follows Betrachtung, contemplation.

The word contemplation does not quite give the sense of the German betrachten, however, which means filling the thing with psychical stuff, making it full so that it carries.

That phase of contemplation follows, but we are concerned now with the objectification, the fact that she puts the symbol outside of herself.

What does that mean psychologically?

Dr: Harding: She disidentifies with it.

Dr: Jung: Exactly.

As long as you carry that symbol in your heart you are identical.

You can always say, I am that, it is inside myself, that is my intuition, so there is danger of its being identified with the ego, and then inflation invariably follows.

In rising from manipura, the fire region, to anahata, there is great danger of inflation because anahata is the air center.

There you approach the sphere of the gods, you are almost like a god of creation, breathing life into things and saying "I will."

Manipura does what it will with you, you are carried, but in anahata you can choose, you can take this way or that way.

So you are godlike, knowing the difference between good and evil because you have understanding.

Always before, the gods produced thoughts and feelings, the breath of life, you got it from them, but now you are the producer yourself.

It was a great discovery, a tremendous achievement of consciousness, that man could say, I think, I feel, I will do certain things, as it is a great discovery to a child when it first discovers that it can carry out a plan.

Therefore the danger in anahata of getting a tremendous inflation, of being filled with that wind.

You see, the wind which was blowing had been inside of gas bags, but now they are pricked and out comes the great wind; it must come from somewhere, it must come from an inflation.

The people before the war, the gas bags with prestige, have been pricked, and all the winds together make a tremendous storm.

But if you take the cause of the inflation out of your own system, that creative feeling when you say, "I will," it then becomes the wind of anahata.

The creed of the nineteenth century was: Where there is a will there is a way.

But that is what God says, and when it is his will, there is surely a way, for what he thinks or speaks, comes about, he makes ways.

You see, any ordinary human being who identifies with the creator thinks as if he were the creator, but if he succeeds in objectifying the creator as different from himself, then he himself, the gas bag, collapses; then he returns to human proportions and realizes that he is not the creator.

So in this moment of utter helplessness, when she is swept along by the wind, our patient understands that this is not her own choice nor her own doing, that she is in the power of an unknown will with an unknown design, and she makes an image of it, and even gives a name to it.

She calls it her star, her guiding principle that is leading her through the darkness and over the vast seas, and she worships that center.

Now we come to the contemplation, filling or giving life to a thing through contemplation.

Through meditation, Betrachtung, or adoration, she gives life to the guiding principle outside of herself.

That is prayer, through prayer you give life to the god, you make him strong.

This is an exceedingly primitive idea, but it has been the idea of mankind forever, that through offerings, or the sacrifice of animals or fruits, or through the moral sacrifice of self-abnegation or humiliation in prayer, strength is given to the god.

The original idea was that it fed god.

You see such an explanation has nothing to do with the fact, in the sense that it could explain away the truth of the fact; it is simply a new interpretation of the same old fact.

Thousands of years ago the god was fed with the sacrificed sheep because people then thought that the god liked to eat mutton.

Later on they said that god liked the smell of burned meat, and not exactly to drink wine, but the smell of wine that arose with the smoke; they thought the god lived by the odor, the mere smell of things.

And still later our own god wanted our sacrifice in the form of prayer, our souls were the food that we submitted to him.

We don't use that terminology any longer because we have developed an idea of the divine principle which is far beyond the idea of feeding; it is just the other way round, we eat God in the communion, we eat the Host in which God dwells, and in that way we participate in the divine substance.

We return thus to exceedingly archaic ideas of cannibalism, and to old Egyptian ideas.

The Pharaoh was supposed to eat the small gods for breakfast, the middle gods for luncheon, and for dinner the great gods.

In other words, he drew all the gods into himself.

This Egyptian idea is at the base of the ideology and the symbolism of the communion.

But all these human attempts to find formulations have, as I said, nothing to do with the fact; in spite of all explanations or formulations, the fact remains that there is such a thing as exteriorization.

It is as if there were· a thing outside in matter that is not you, not ego; it is nonego, and you can put something into it by concentration, meditation by the right thought and the right deed, as the Buddhist says.

You can submit to it, it is a guiding function, whatever it is. That is the truth.

It does not matter what you call it, that is simply a fact, it is possible, it works.

An.cl that is what this woman tries quite naively; she symbolizes this act of devotion-or call it helpful magic-by the action of making an idol and putting it objectively before her eyes.

Now that is simply a formulation of the process, and the process is so real that if she could realize her vision and her actual situation, she would most certainly put that image before her eyes in reality; she would naively paint a star and she would contemplate it and concentrate upon it, not with the assumption that she is filling that piece of paper with the star painted on it with her magic libido, as a primitive would assume, to her it would simply symbolize her submission.

For to descend to such a primitive level would really mean submission to a modern man; that he should perform the same action that a primitive man would perform, make a miserable little idol, knowing all the time it was no idol, that it was a piece of paper and some paint, an idea out of his own head, would mean great self-abnegation.

He may say he has to do it for Dr. Jung, that it is a part of his analysis, but a voice from within tells him, nevertheless, that it is exactly what a primitive would do, and that he is perfectly ridiculous to do it.

It is like the man who barked in the moonshine: he thought he was safe in doing it because he would know that he was not crazy, but then he did bark in the moonshine and he was crazy.

Mr. Allemann: Is this not like the Christian saying, that you have to become like children in order to go to heaven?

Dr. Jung: Exactly, it is that submission, that childlikeness, which is simply another term for primitiveness.

You see, any modern man who did such a thing in reality would either be an artist, or a fool, or it would mean self-sacrifice, a sacrifice of all inflation, a return to the most primitive conditions.

It is a purely ritual act, but with no church that sanctifies or codifies it; it is an uncodified ritual, with all the original merit.

For such an action has psychological merit.

The first act, then, is the unveiling of the idol, and then follows the phase of contemplation or adoration.

This woman was concentrating upon the star and she says: "I saw jagged red and black bands all around it, moving into it and seeking to cut it into pieces."

When one concentrates upon an idol, and is quite devout in the action, one exteriorizes such an amount of living force into it that it begins to move.

In antiquity, when they prayed to the statue of the god, they touched its feet perhaps, or they sometimes had steps leading up to the ear of the statue, where they whispered the prayer, making it as living as possible; through the devotion, it was said, they called the god in the statue, and he would then answer their prayers by winking or nodding his head.

Those people saw the statue move, and they took it as a miraculous answer.

That is the origin of the word numen, which really means winking at someone, it is a hint, as when the god shakes or nods his head to one; and numeinosus is almost a technical term, meaning a thing that is full of mana, of its own spontaneous, autonomous life, a thing that has power; therefore numen also means the power in the statue or the god.

But it would be the mana one has put into it through adoration or devotion, through sacrifice to the divine being in the statue.

Such things happen in reality.

There are plenty of similar legends from the Middle Ages where the mother of God or Christ nodded the head or blinked the eyes or spoke to the worshipper.

All those were real events insofar as people in the act of religious devotion concentrated upon the image to the extent that it took all their life into itself and so was able to move.

That is called a hallucination or illusion in the sthula aspect; in the sukshma aspect it means that the life force or libido is concentrated, and exteriorized into that unknown non-ego so that it begins to act, to work.

Now our patient sees in her vision the idol, her star, almost cut into pieces by red and black bands.

This is obviously a disturbance which comes from without.

What do these black and red bands mean?

Mrs. Baumann: It reminds one of the black sun with the red arms, it is the same color.

Dr.: Jung: Yes, and what did that mean?

Mrs. Crowley: It meant panic and destruction before.

Dr. Jung: But what has that to do with the star?

The star should be just the opposite, it should balance or counteract that.

Dr. Harding: It is the impact of the forces that were in the crowd before.

Dr. Jung: Yes, and coming out of the crowd, she is imbued with the forces working in that current; so when she contemplates the star, those destructive forces flow into it quite automatically and threaten to destroy the idol.

The collective movement is opposed to the concretization of the idea, the idea must be destroyed; otherwise the movement is no longer unconscious.

Nature cannot stand ideas, she is hostile to consciousness, because it disturbs the great unconsciousness in which things glide along smoothly; consciousness comes along and illuminates the darkness and upsets that smooth gliding movement of nature, so the powers of such a movement are all against illumination.

Therefore people in this situation have no time to listen or reflect, they are too much caught by it.

And they don’t want to know what they are doing because of the fear of hearing something disagreeable; nobody wants to know that they are in a movement which is going straight to hell.

They are afraid of the interpretation that might be put upon it, or that their eyes might be opened to a danger which they prefer not to see.

The first effect, then, is that all those destructive forces flow into the image and threaten it with destruction, as if she said to herself, "Oh well, in that turmoil, what does it mean after all? It is nonsense, it does not work."

You will find all these reactions beautifully described in religious books.

But we see that this influx of destructive forces now has a positive effect.

She says: Then I saw a new pale blue star grow out from the circle and hold in check the red and black teeth. The circle grew stronger and more distinct.

The jagged bands are now teeth.

And here we have the construction of the mandala again, which is particularly needed at this place.

Those points which threatened the star are now demoniacal jaws, against which she, or her star, is protected by the magic circle, which is growing stronger and more distinct.

This shows that the influx of the destructive powers has been checked by that vision; in other words, it shows that this principle holds water, it is not an illusion, it works.

The greater the danger, the stronger the onslaught of the destructive powers, the more this principle justifies its existence and also grows stronger.

All that is happening in a sort of semiconsciousness, it is not realized by the patient; it is like a movie passing before her eyes, and so things develop in a very natural and law-abiding way.

She does not interfere, she just watches it more or less. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 1148-1164

A sickness disturbs you, your sleep is light. What are you suffering from? (2021-12-08 06:34)

1. I. 1923.

My soul, help me and tell me, did you see him?

S. Yes, I saw him in a new and unexpected form. Did I not say he hastened away to the mountains?

From there he comes in the form of a boy at puberty, whose first growth of beard had yet to appear.

A sickness torments him, his back hurts and he seeks help. Shyness won't let him speak, so you should speak to him first.

[I]. listen, my son, you have taken the form of my son, truly I saw it in a dream. Your eye is full of unconsciousness.

A sickness disturbs you, your sleep is light. What are you suffering from?

He: I suffer from my back. A rash has seized my skin; it burns me and the pain takes sleep from me.

Give me a salve, an ointment, to stop the burning.

[I]. Your sickness is peculiar, my son. How can I give you an ointment if I don't know when and how your sickness arose?

Tell me, how did your sickness begin?

He. It seems to me that it began a few days ago. A dream must have brought it on. A bad dream, a dream of the night, dreamt around midnight.

[I]. What did the evil dream say, and how did it make you sick?

He: I dreamt of hunting with great hounds,
A wolf fur from mangy wolves hung on my shoulder.
I held a spear in my hand,
A sword with a wide blade hung on my belt.
I hastened into the mountains, to the cloud forest,
Where bears live, bears with cubs,
I wanted to bring a young one to me to play with,
They are beautiful, woolly, funny, I wanted to lead it on the leash.
Then came the sickness from the mangy wolf fur.
I didn't know that the wolf was mangy, no one told me.
How will you heal my illness?

[I]. Your sickness has come from the dream.
An evil dream has brought sickness to you.
You wore a mangy wolf fur in a dream,
When you wanted to hunt bears with hounds,
When you wanted to pick up a young one for sport.
Now listen, I will interpret to you what happened: [r17/rr8]
It was a spirit wolf that your father slew.
A spirit wolf, with poisonous sickness living in its skin.
It wasn't a yellow, ordinary wolf,

Who howls in the snow forests and roams hungrily in the winter night.
It was a spirit wolf, and these bring sickness to men.
It happens from revenge for their death, since they always want to live.
They hunger until they find men and only human flesh feeds them.
Their mange comes from this.

He: My thanks! You took away the burning by chanting the sickness.
Yet tell me, how can a dream bring me sickness?
I didn't wear the wolf fur on my physical body,
It came only at night, it was a dream image.
How can a dream image make me sick?

[I]. My son,
No ordinary dream has seized you.
You weren't sleeping in your arms while you saw a nocturnal image.
You yourself went to the mountain with lance and sword.
Covered yourself with the mangy wolf fur.
Scared wanderers and animals with whistling and yelling.
Slung a real hide on your shoulder,
You were your own father, the red-beard, the hunter of wolves and men.
Sickness came to you from this, my boy.
You wore the skin of your father.

He: Yes, I saw you, doctor, you spoke to me.
Clever words came from your mouth and reached my ear.
What did you utter: wisdom? How could I forget!
Appearance itself has carried me. It was no dream.
Never, wise man, will I again wear the hide of the wolf.
I have come to know how one is tied to the other.
Because I put on the skin of my father,
Because I hung the hide of the wolf on my shoulder,
Because I scared wanderers and animals with whistling and yelling, Illness came stealthily from behind.
Thank you, you have chanted my illness,
The skin is smooth, all burning gone.
You spoke of wisdom? I have become wiser. The Black Books, Vol. VII, Page 230-231

1939 26 MAY Lecture 5 Psychology and Meditation Yoga (2021-12-09 05:18)

[paypal _donation _button border="5"]

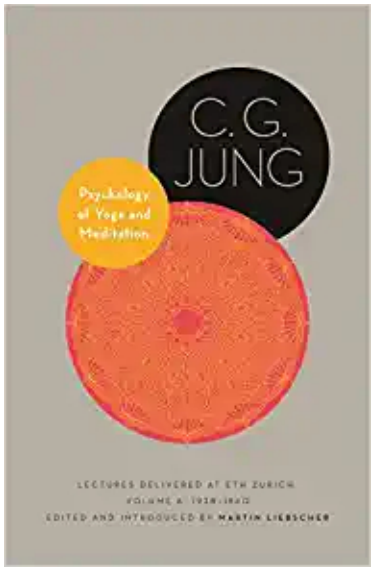

[1]Psychology of Yoga and Meditation

1939 26 MAY Lecture 5 Psychology and Meditation Yoga

We began with a discussion of individual lines in Patañjali's Yoga Sûtra.

In them I tried to highlight the line of reasoning that we had already encountered in the symbolic series, but which is approached from a certain different perspective, namely from the standpoint of the so-called sâmkhya (or also Upanishad) philosophy.

This chiefly concerns the idea of the Self, the question of the Self's relationship to consciousness, and the concept of that ultimate state, which I have described to you as the dissolution of consciousness.

The line I read out to you last time concerns the question of technique, the psychological technique of dissolving the Self from the psychic systems, mainly from consciousness.

I want to read this section to you again.  We will dissect it into parts.  It is exceptionally difficult:

Worldly experience is caused by a failure to differentiate between the lucid quality [sattva-guna] of nature [prakriti] and the spirit [purusha].

From perfect discipline of the distinction between spirit as the subject of itself and the lucid quality of nature as a dependent object, one gains knowledge of the spirit. [YS 3.35, p. 68]

If the concepts one has of sattvam and purusha are not differentiated, then a certain psychic state arises out of this, which Deussen translates as the “world’s pleasure” and Hauer as “eating the world.”

Before we can understand this line, we must know what is meant by the terms sattvam and purusha.

I wrote up for you last time the three gunas to which sattvam belongs.

Deussen uses the term “factor,” while Garbe, who is particularly at home in Sanskrit literature, uses the expression “constituents.”

In fact, it is impossible to properly translate the expression guna. I prefer not to translate it at all.

The three gunas are: sattvam, rajas, and tamas. Sattvam has the meaning of brightness, light, directed upwards; thus a state.

Tamas is the opposite: the dark, darkness, heavy, also a state. These are obviously opposites.

Rajas is in-between, being dissatisfaction, energizing, because energy resides in dissatisfaction. This is something dynamic.

The dynamic emerges from opposites.

There are opposites, and wherever those are present, there is energy, the unifying process.

Wherever hard and soft, cold and warm, low and high collide, energy is the result, a propulsive force.

This is a compensatory process.

I believe that it is very difficult to give a fitting translation without psychological understanding.

I can use the term “constituents” because you will repeatedly encounter it in the literature.

In translations of the Bhagavad-Gîtâ only the word guna is used.

There, in Krishna’s teaching, we learn what liberation from the gunas means.

Our text says that one must discriminate between the concept of the sattvam and purusha—i.e., what is bright, light, easy—from the Self. In his text Yoga als Heilweg [Yoga as a path of healing], Hauer translates sattvam as “luminous world substance.”

So, more than substance, a sort of ether. Therefore sattvam is translated as ethereal body, but only in a figurative sense.

Here the idea is that normally one cannot discriminate between this luminous substance and the purusha.

Purusha is a very ancient description for what Deussen describes as the “subject of knowledge, liberated from everything objective.”

I am not certain whether this expression is appropriate, that is, I have my doubts about it.

Because it expresses logically something absolutely alien to the spirit of the East.

The Eastern spirit does not engage in logic, it is perceptual and intuitive.

Purusha is better rendered as primal man, man of light, phôteinós or luminosum. That would be closer to it.

We have a number of similar ideas in the West: the mystical Christ is a purusha, or Christ as the second Adam, an ancient Christian proposition—that is purusha: Adam is in every man in his primary form as a sensory phenomenon, and appears in a secondary form as a man of light, in the so-called redemptive form.

In this line Patañjali is attempting to formulate the fact that while one does not differentiate between sattvam and the concept of the purusha, all the same one must make this differentiation. Which raises the important question: what is sattvam?

How can we understand this psychologically?

To do so, we must understand more precisely what this sattvam represents in Indian philosophy.

I am adding a further concept to all this: aside from the purusha, the primal man or man of light, there is a further, feminine principle: the so-called prakriti.

This is nature or matter, the material phenomenon, also described as Shakti in another context.

This is materia, the mater natura. In Tibetan and Tantric mythology, Shakti is always represented in an intimate embrace with Shiva, the creator of the world, also corresponding to the purusha.

The purusha is always said to be combined with the prakriti, so they are together like a drop of water upon a lotus leaf, where it famously retains its round form and does not moisten the lotus leaf.

In this case it is not one with the phenomenon but is quite outside of it.

When the purusha is combined with the prakriti, which is always the case, it serves the sattvam as a lamp in the darkness.

If it comes down into matter, it is sort of in its own darkening.

In Manichean thought, this means the man of light being drawn down into the demonic abyss of the world.

It is like the descent of Nous who is desired by Physis. Nous gazes down into the darkness and glimpses his reflection.

Attracted by this, the loving arms of Physis reach him, entwining him and pulling him down.

It cannot be ruled out that these gnostic ideas were associated with India, as there was some traffic with the Near East from ancient times.

It was not only material goods but also spiritual ones that made their way to the West via the trade routes across the Red Sea.

Hence the various similarities in Indian and Greek mythology, e.g., with Pythagoras or Apollonius of Tyana, who is supposed to have made a great journey to India to explore the mysteries there.

These developments of spiritual connections are probably historical.

So when the purusha has come down into the darkness of the prakriti and then serves as a lamp to the sattvam, this is obviously a description of the unrecognized Self within man, who employs consciousness in order to orient himself in the darkness of his world.

So we can say that this sattvam is a luminous psychic substance. It is the dim light of human consciousness.

It functions in a similar way as the cittam in the later parts of the Yoga Sûtram.

This concept is mostly translated as consciousness, corresponding to what we would translate as an active state of consciousness.

This is not only passive awareness but an active achievement that causes us to grow tired and that we must interrupt from time to time with sleep because it is exhausting work to remain conscious.

That is why most people are not always completely conscious, in order to conserve energy.

Primitives must be consciously unconscious, having to sit still for hours in order not to think, although they do not sleep.

So when the purusha, this man of light, is located in the prakriti, it is not unitary but multiple.

When it enters into material phenomena it splits into very many different figures.

So in one text it is called the “twenty-fifth.” Again, this is extremely peculiar.

The description simply says:

the purusha is in the state of interwovenness with materia. Then he is the twenty-fifth, that is, he is one of twenty-five likenesses.

As one who is bound, he is called the twenty-fifth, but as the twenty-sixth, he is free and is one.

When he is freed from the manifold state, he returns to his original unity and is simply always the unity of the many, whether he is in the bound state or not.

The unity is then simply latent, that is, it depends on our perspective as to whether we regard the purusha as a multiplicity or as a unity.

It is the one Self in every individual where this Self is apparently distinct.

This multiplicity is portrayed in a Chinese text: The yogi sits in meditation [dhyâna] and five figures arise like smoke out of his head, who in turn also split into another five figures.

This is the knowledge of the splitting of the purusha into many figures.

The unity of the purusha is an intuition in Eastern meditation about the nature of man.

It is understood that all are only one and that the Self of man, despite all differences, is only ever the one.

We find this idea in the philosophy of the Upanishads in the concept of the âtman.

This is the Self of the personality.

The person (purusha), not larger than a thumb, dwelling within, always dwelling in the heart of man, is perceived by the heart, the thought, the mind; they who know it become immortal.

The person (purusha) with a thousand heads, a thousand eyes, a thousand feet, having compassed the earth on every side, extends beyond it by ten fingers’ breadth.

At the same time, it is simply the general being of the world.

So the purusha is also the individual being, but at the same time the mahâ-purusha, i.e., the great soul of the world, exactly like the âtman.

The idea of sâmkhya philosophy is that the purusha is always connected to matter.

This state is described as samyoga (being yoked together, connected, fettered, bound).

Without this connection with the purusha, the prakriti is absolutely inactive.

It unfolds under the influence of, and the causal connection with, the purusha, the man of light. Out of this arises the so-called samsâra.

This is the result of births, the cycle of existences in which the prakriti unfolds.

The purpose of this unfolding in samsâra is to transmit self-knowledge to the purusha through the fullness of phenomena.

This is why the prakriti is also portrayed as a female dancer who reflects the fullness of the world, and dances before the purusha so that the purusha can acquire self-awareness out of this fullness.

Despite its necessary unconnectedness, the prakriti is linked with the purusha by a bridge.

The idea of the bridge is probably a concession to understanding.

One could of course not imagine this enormous paradox of combined disparateness.

It is incredibly difficult for people to think paradoxically. But such ideas are always necessarily paradoxical.

That is why one seeks mediating ideas that mitigate this paradox, and create a bridge between the irreconcilable opposites of the prakriti and the purusha.

The connecting link is now thought of as the subtle body, a finely ethereal body, which the purusha forms with the elements of the prakriti around the sattvam.

This linking body is described as lingam. The word is also used for phallic symbols and actually means appendage, marker, label.

Any sort of marker that describes something, that is lingam.

A special description is then linga-deha, i.e., the classic description for the subtle body, that is, the symbol of the inconceivable purusha plus prakriti, which is then pure and substantially concrete.

Between them stands the lingam as bridge within this psychic body, a half-substantial and half-spiritual phenomenon.

Such is the ancient division harmonic with the Eastern way of seeing, and familiar to us in the West as well: prakriti, which is the body, purusha, which is the spirit; and linga-deha, the subtle body or the psyche, inclusive of consciousness.

The concept of the purusha is related to all central Brahmanic ideas.

So, in many places the purusha is identical with the concept of the Brahman, of the absolute being.

Here is how one of the Upanishads puts it:

Now that golden person, who is seen within the sun, with golden beard and golden hair, golden altogether to the very tips of his nails, Whose eyes are like blue lotus's, his name is ut, for he has risen [udita] above all evil. He who knows this also rises above all evil.

Rik and Sâman are his joints, and therefore he is udgîtha.

And therefore he who praises him [the ut] is called the Ud-gâtri [the out-singer].

He [the golden person, called ut] is lord of the worlds beyond that [sun], and of all the wishes of the Devas [inhabiting those worlds].

The sun is symbol for Brahman. It is a typical perspective that the gods are also seen as prakriti.

Man, perceived in the innermost eye, rules over the gods:

Now the person who is seen in the eye, he is Rik, he is Sâman, Uktha, Yagus, Brahman.

The form of that person [in the eye] is the same as the form of the other person [in the sun], the joints of the one [Rik and Sâman] are the joints of the other, the name of the one [ut] is the name of the other.

He is lord of the worlds below that [the self in the eye], and of all the wishes of men.

Therefore all who sing to the vînâ [lyre], sing him, and from him also they obtain wealth.

This constitutes a reversal. First, in the innermost of the sun, and now in the innermost of the eye.

Reflected in the so-called pupilla, you see the small human form.

The observer sees himself in the eye, in the pupil, of the other.

Pupilla is a diminutive and simply means "little doll," thus a small human figure seen in the eye.

This used to be naively conceived of as a soul image.

Thus, the personal and suprapersonal Brahman is both the soul of the world and the individual soul.

In another text, the purusha is compared with Prajâpati: on the one hand, he is the wheel of the world order in heaven, where the days and nights stand as sons, and on the other hand is the lower sphere, where he is the world-illuminating sacrificial fire.

He is the year and the sacrifice at the same time.

In Vedic thought the cosmic celestial world order is reflected in the earthly ritual world order, and specifically in the order of the sacrifice.

In our Western religious practices, we also have the affiliation of time qualities with particular festivals.

Originally these were nature rites oriented on what happens in the heavens.

People used to live in an absolute participation mystique: for example, the Mexican Pueblos are still convinced today that the sun cannot rise if they do not perform rites to facilitate that.

The leader of a tribe once wrote that Americans should cease their destructiveness because otherwise they would find that in ten years the sun would no longer rise.

For they, the sons of the sun, are responsible for the rising of the sun.

It is the same with Rostand's Chantecler, who believed that the sun would rise only because he crowed.

Someone made a bet with him that the sun would still rise, but in the last moment he crowed again, and the question was not settled.

However, this is not a ridiculous notion but a very clear mythical residue of that time when our consciousness was still absolutely captivated by objects and incapable of elevating itself in any way above objective events, where man found himself in a participation mystique and was unconsciously still identified with the whole of nature, as Lévy-Bruhl said, because that inhered in the quality of time.

With such incorporation of time into nature, one could do only one thing and nothing else.

This idea underlies the whole of astrology.

In the healing arts one has it in sympathetic cures and methods, and in the natural philosophy of the Middle Ages it was the correspondentia: as above, so below.

Man is himself a cosmos: he is the microcosm and the world is the macrocosm.

So the whole of human experience was seen in man's own passage of time, in his most routine actions as an expression of the course of nature.

Absolute identification with the course of nature: such was the experience that people of this time discovered and then incorporated into ritual.

This primal state was the ordered, lawful state, and if man were to cease living and acting in accordance with nature, or stop being born and dying, then nature would be chaotic.

At the moment where consciousness separated from the natural course of events, disorder came into the world; even though now we still imagine that we possess far more order, this is order created by people, not by nature.

So the idea of the purusha in the form of Prajâpati is likewise the year, or time itself and the ritual order of life:

Prajâpati bethought himself, “Verily, I have created here a counterpart of myself, to wit, the year”; whence they say, “Prajâpati is the year;” for he created it to be a counterpart of himself:

Prajâpati pondered: verily I have created the year as the image of myself.

And in that he gave his own Self to the gods, he created the sacrifice as the image of himself.

Having given himself up to the gods, he created that counterpart of himself, to wit, the sacrifice: whence people say, “The sacrifice is Prajâpati”; for he created it as a counterpart of himself.

He himself is time, therefore Prajâpati also bears the name time.

Through the operation of sacrifice and through Prajâpati’s self-surrender to the gods, he created the sacrifice as an image of himself.

And now: the gods belong to phenomena, to mâyâ.

Because he has surrendered himself to phenomena, i.e., to the world, therewith he created the sacrificial fire, the luminous, illuminating sacrificial fire upon the earth.

This is purusha. In the ritual action lies the action of primitive man.

You find this with quite primitive people such as the Palaeolithic aboriginal people of Australia.

There, the aboriginal peoples from primordial time are great-grandfathers who created the whole of nature, from whom the trees, plants, and animals originate that made the world.

These ancestors, described by Lévy Bruhl as archetypes, are reiterated in the ritual lives of these tribes. year a certain ceremony must be conducted so that the grass grows, the streams flow, so that the rains come.

And it is their view that if these ritual actions are not carried out, the cosmic order would cease.

Then the grass would no longer grow, no more rain would fall, man is no longer connected with primordial time.

He is now only in his own time but cut off from primordial time.

This primordial time is the time that existed before time. It is the time that is always there when we have time.

It is eternal time, which runs alongside our time.

The word for this is altjiranga mitjina.

Aira is the dream, the unconscious; it is also the place beyond, in which the ancestors, the primeval men live.

Prajâpati is in fact a time that has world-creating significance.

If we want to express this in a modern way, then it is Bergson's durée créatrice.

This is in fact the only intuition in the whole of Bergson's philosophy, and with it he discovered what Proclus had already said: wherever there is creation, there is also time.

The god of the Neoplatonists was called Chronos. He was a god of fire, light, and time.

Equally, he was the first cause of all things, therefore the creator of the world, the demiurge. It is the same in gnosticism.

There, the creator of the world has the name Abraxas.

If we insert the numeric value of the letters of the word "Abraxas" in Greek, is the result: the creative cycle, the course of the years.

This idea also plays a great role in the Mithraic mysteries.

The Mithraic temple on the Saalburg has an Aion, which is the unendingly long duration.

This comes from the Persian: Zurvan Akarâna. Aion was represented as a dragon with a lion's head.

This idea of the purusha reaches back into the very beginnings of human thought and represents an identification with nature which has long since become foreign to us. Carl Jung, Psychology and Yoga Meditation, Page 219-228

1939 2 JUNE Lecture 6 Psychology and Yoga Meditation

I completely forgot to say at the beginning of this lecture that if you have any questions you'd like to ask me, please feel free to do this in the form of a letter.

Or give me a note with your "well-formulated question." I will do my best to reply to you.

Last time we spoke about the purusha and I cited all sorts of parallels to show you in what contexts this concept occurs in Indian philosophy.

I emphasized that it is first identified with the Brahman, thus with the ultimate of all world beings, and then with the Prajâpati, the creator of the world, who is simultaneously time, in fact he is Bergson's durée créatrice.

He is the year; he is the womb of time, out which all being arises.

Then he is the sacrifice, the fire, that which has created himself as a likeness of himself.

You can already see there the connections with Western Christian ideas.

This purusha has parallels with the mystical ideas about Christ that evolved in the West. I mentioned to you the parallels with Neo-Platonic philosophy where the actual creator god is Chronos, or the time-god, who is simultaneously the god of fire, of creative fire, and of light.

He demonstrates the symbolic attributes that are typical of these gods.

Today we want to return to the text of the Yoga Sûtra once again.

With our hard-won ideas of purusha and sattvam, we now want to try to get closer to the meaning of the complicated words of Patañjali.

So we must consider the following factors:

Purusha: Unity

Gunas Sattvam Rajas Tamas Prakriti manifold world of phenomena

So, on the one hand, we have purusha, on the other prakriti.

This is the world of material phenomena, the manifold phenomenal world.

Purusha is the unitary, always conjoined with the prakriti, the masculine conjoined with the feminine, but never mixed.

Through the togetherness of purusha and prakriti, a living psychic being emerges that has certain characteristics, the so-called gunas:

Sattvam = all that is luminous, light, rising up Rajas = compelling, passion

Tamas = dark, darkness, heavy

This creates a type of energy.

These are opposites, between which energy manifests, that is, the living affairs of the world are an energetic process.

These are characteristics that the psyche formulated out of the presence of pairs of opposites. Out of these opposites all actions arise.

If hot and cold do not come together, no process takes place. If the world had only light, it could not exist.

Darkness on its own does not exist, and if there were only cold, the same would be true.

These are psychological facts that man has projected into things since time immemorial. That is how we conceive of the world.

This is what propels us.

A moral conflict, for example, consists of a pair of opposites that compels us to a certain ethical behavior: on the one hand is desire and on the other hand, a certain conscience.

If these contradictions did not exist, nothing would happen. One would become inactive.

All compelling moments in human life are therefore moments of conflict. Everything that moves within us arises out of these conflicts.

By dint of these characteristics, purusha and prakriti are conjoined.

However, this begs the question as to why the text mentions only sattvam, but not tamas and rajas?

I will read you both translations once again.

Deussen translates it thus: The non-differentiation between the representations of sattvam (as proponent of the prakriti) and of the purusha, which are both absolutely distinct, is pleasure [and suffering]: … [YSD 3.35, p. 532]515

Hauer translates it as: “Man-in-himself” and the “luminous world substance” which forms the organ of the mind are eternally unalloyed.

“consumption of the world” by the “man-in-himself” is made possible by the fact that “luminous world substance” and “man-in-himself” are not differentiated in the conscious mind. [YSH, 3.35, p.108]

The meanings are the same, but one cannot see this straightforwardly. Hauer translates it far more literally.

He also translates the word purusha and the concept of pleasure in a more literal way: it is in fact the devouring, the engorgement of the world, taking the world into oneself, the consumption of the world.

And he translates sattvam as luminous world substance, this is literal: the light side of world matter.

Prakriti is the material phenomenon of the world, and sattvam is its positive aspect, its light aspect.

But since these are psychic phenomena, then it says, it is simply the light part of our psyche, namely our consciousness.

The other is unconscious.

Tamas is unconscious, for it is darkness. Rajas is energy, described in modern times as libido. Mostly also unconscious.

We do not know from where an impulse, a compulsion suddenly appears.

The source of the drives resides in darkness. So one could, with Hauer, translate sattvam as consciousness.

Therefore if one does not differentiate the purusha from sattvam, then purusha is bound through the sattvam to the prakriti, to the world of phenomena.

Then he’ll eat the dust, to quote Goethe.

And this consumption of the world is the source of suffering, from which yoga promises to free man.

Yoga therefore demands that the differentiation should be made between purusha and sattvam and that one recognizes that sattvam comes from prakriti.

Psychologically, this means that one should differentiate between purusha and sattvam, in other words, between Self and I, because otherwise a connection with prakriti, the world, enters in which also devours one, as one devours it.

For the more one eats of the world, the more the world eats one.

So the non-differentiation of sattvam and purusha means the same as the eating of the world, which is yet the source of suffering.

Now he continues (after Deussen): …—knowledge of the purusha is achieved by the application of total discipline upon one's own interest [i.e., the purusha] which is distinct from the other's interest [i.e., the prakriti]. [YSD 3.35, pp. 532–533]518

Hauer renders this: One acquires knowledge of the "man-in-himself" through application of total restraint for the purpose of this consumption for the "other" and one's own distinct purpose. [YSH 3.35, p.108]519

The meaning of both translations is that one uses yoga for mastery, yoking, containment of the drives, of the kleshas, so that the other's interest in the prakriti is separated from one's own interest in the purusha. In other words: knowledge of the purusha arises through the containment of the energies of the drives manifesting in the world.

Here I'll give you some parallels that demonstrate this: the contrast between tamas and sattvam is the primal pair of opposites.

The texts mostly speak only of the differentiation of the gunas, e.g., Krishna's admonition to Arjuna from the Bhagavadgîtâ:

The Vedas speak of three Gunas: nevertheless, O Arjuna be thou indifferent concerning the three Gunas, indifferent towards the opposites (nirdvanda), ever steadfast in courage.

There is a technical term in the philosophy of yoga for describing this freedom from the opposites. This is the expression nirdvandva.

In an old text, the Book of Manu, it says that the creator of the world created the opposites in order to bring about differentiation:

Moreover, in order to distinguish actions, he separated merit from demerit, and he caused the creature to be affected by the pairs [of opposites], such as pain and pleasure.

In the Kulluka commentary, further pairs of opposites are named: desire and anger, love and hate, hunger and thirst, sorrow and delusion, honor and disgrace.

"Beneath the pairs of opposites must this world suffer without ceasing."

Now it is an essential ethical task not to be influenced by the opposites, but to rise above them, because liberation from the opposites leads to redemption. In the spirit of the Yoga Sûtram, it means that if one separates from the sattvam, one comes to the purusha and finds redemption in the being of the world.

I repeat this from the Book of Manu:

When by the disposition [of his heart] he becomes indifferent to all objects, he obtains eternal happiness both in this world and after death.

He who has in this manner gradually given up all attachments and is freed from all pain [of opposites], reposes in Brahman alone.

And, in a Kaushîtakî-Brâhmana-Upanishad, it is written of the one who knows about this:

… and there shakes off his good and evil deeds.

His beloved relatives obtain the good, his unbeloved relatives the evil he has done.

And as a man, driving in a chariot, might look at the two wheels (without being touched by them), thus he will look at day and night, thus at good and evil deeds, and at all pairs. Being freed from good and freed from evil he, the knower of Brahman, moves towards Brahman.

Another passage from the Tejobindu-Upanishad reads:

Whosoever overcometh desire and anger, the cleaving to the world and the lust of the senses; whoso maketh himself free from the opposites, and relinquisheth the feeling of self (above all self-seeking), that one is released from expectation.

And in the Mahâbhârata, Pandu, who wishes to be a hermit, says:

Clothed with dust, housed under the open sky, I will take my lodging at the root of a tree, surrendering all things loved as well as unloved, tasting neither grief nor pleasure, forfeiting blame and praise alike, neither cherishing hope nor offering respect, free from the opposites (nirdvanda), with neither fortune nor belongings.

Hence we see the universal idea, which still exists today in India.

The question is, what does this actually mean psychologically?

Through the containment of the drives the outflow is suppressed, the eye is turned away from the world.

One differentiates oneself from one’s own desire for the world by liberating oneself from the attachment to and relationship with the world.

It is through this withdrawal that by necessity what is authentic appears, namely one’s own will and its contents, and for the Indian that is the purusha.

It is at this point that we in the West immediately fall for the delusion that by one’s own will nothing other is meant than the I.

For we imagine that whoever removes himself from the world remains in his I.

To an Indian mind, however, he does not remain in his I but he comes into the purusha and he becomes what he always has been: the purusha.

Such an assertion as is made by Indian thinkers is possible only on the basis of the specific Indian psychology, which is different from ours.

We must not imagine that we can simply grasp the nature of Indian psychology with our consciousness. Impossible.

The essential difference resides in the structure of consciousness: Western consciousness is an absolutely egoic, definite consciousness, which is different in many respects, especially as regards the intensity of Eastern consciousness.

These people do not need very much in order to pass from a quasi-conscious state into an unconscious one.

That would require a real struggle and a great effort from us.

It is much more a propensity of the East, it comes more naturally to them.

For it is a matter of daily exercise in which they retreat and go into a corner to do yoga and meditate, that is, they get into a void state of consciousness, which has an exceptionally favorable effect on their consciousness.

You find the same in China or Japan. There's something to it.

Some Western people would benefit from this and would be better off doing this than going to the movies.

Our neurasthenia stems from the hectic hustle in which we do not come to ourselves.

This void that manifests: this is the purusha; it is the emptying out of the I.

Of course, in the West we don't have any such parallels with this sort of phenomenon in our modern philosophy. In the East, yoga is not exactly what we would describe as a religious matter.

An Indian would laugh at us if yoga were considered a religious act.

It is completely banal and quite as ordinary as brushing our teeth is with us; it is not exaggerated or even hysterical.

With us, it is commonly rather unusual people who bother about these things, but there it is a science.

The whole mysterious fuss over yoga in the West is seen as ridiculous in the East.

These people are trained through education and habit to transport themselves into the void through corresponding education, breathing exercises, sitting exercises.

When we do these things they are simply meaningless acrobatic contortions.

One must take it like breathing exercises, as a technical matter.

It has nothing to do with religious preaching. All these hatha yoga exercises are means of achieving the state of emptiness.

It is the sinking into what we describe as an unconscious state, but which in the East is described as a higher consciousness.

Purusha is a super-consciousness. This is why it is almost impossible to translate the term “unconscious” into Hindi.

There is a term: bodhi, i.e., enlightenment, a higher or super-consciousness, an extended superhuman consciousness, namely the consciousness of purusha.

Now here in the West we have some medieval parallels with this concept, namely in Meister Eckhart.

In his meditation “On the Abandonment of Things” he says:

People say: “O Lord, how much I wish that I stood as well with God, that I had as much devotion and peace in God as others have, I wish that it were so with me!” Or, “I should like to be poor,” or else, “Things will never go right for me till I am in this place or that, or till I act one way or another. I must go and live in a strange land, or in a hermitage, or in a cloister.”

In fact, this is all about yourself, and nothing else at all.

This is just self-will, only you do not know it or it does not seem so to you.

There is never any trouble that starts in you that does not come from your own will, whether people see this or not.

One’s own will, this self-seeking to which Meister Eckhart refers, this is Western language; to be precise, this is the I, certainly not the purusha, but the self-seeking of Western consciousness.

We can think what we like, that a man ought to shun one thing or pursue another—places and people and ways of life and environments and undertakings—that is not the trouble, such ways of life or such matters are not what impedes you.

It is what you are in these things that causes the trouble, because in them you do not govern yourself as you should.

Therefore, make a start with yourself, and abandon yourself. These matters are prakriti.

The I-consciousness that one should abandon is sattvam.

Truly, if you do not begin by getting away from yourself, and abandon yourself, wherever you run to, you will find obstacles and trouble wherever it may be.

People who seek peace in external things—be it in places or ways of life or people or activities or solitude or poverty or degradation—however great such things may be or whatever it may be, still it is all nothing and gives no peace.

People who seek in that way are doing it all wrong; the further they wander, the less will they find what they are seeking.

They go around like someone who has lost his way; the further he goes, the more lost he is.

Then what ought he to do? He ought to begin by forsaking himself, because then he has forsaken everything. This is self-abandonment.

If I abandon sattvam I have also abandoned all things with it (prakriti).

If I succeed in differentiating between the egoic consciousness within me, which is naturally always bound to objects, and the objects themselves, then it is possible to reach the purusha.

Truly, if a man renounced a kingdom or the whole world but held on to himself, he would not have renounced anything.

What is more, if a man renounces himself, whatever else he retains, riches or honors or whatever it may be, he has forsaken everything.

About what Saint Peter said: “See, Lord, we have forsaken everything” (Mt. 19:27)—and all that he had forsaken was just a net and his little boat—there is a saint who says: “If anyone willingly gives up something little, that is not all which he has given up, but he has forsaken everything which worldly men can gain and what they can even long for; for whoever has renounced his own will and himself has renounced everything, as truly as if he had possessed it as his own, to dispose of as he would.”

For what you choose not to long for, you have wholly forsaken and renounced for the love of God.

One has abandoned it for God’s sake, that is, for the sake of the purusha.

That is why our Lord said: “Blessed are the poor in spirit!” (Mt. 5:3), that is, in the will.

And no one ought to be in doubt about this; if there were a better form of living, our Lord would have said so, as he also said: “Whoever wishes to come after me, let him deny himself” (Mt. 16:24), as a beginning; everything depends on that.

Take a look at yourself, deny yourself. That is the best of all.

You should know that there was never any man in this life who forsook so much that he could not still find more in himself to forsake.

There are few people who see this to be true and stick by it.

This is indeed a fair exchange and an honest deal:

By as much as you go out in forsaking all things, by so much, neither less not more, does God go in, with all that is his, as you entirely forsake everything that is yours.

Undertake this, and let it cost you everything you can afford. There you will find true peace, and nowhere else.

So this contemplation is a direct parallel with this Yoga Sûtram.

But it is in a Western sense parallel with our exceptionally egoic consciousness.

The West is combined in a way with the prakriti, which was never the case in the East.

When compared with our consciousness, Eastern consciousness is darker. We would say that of course.

An Eastern man would certainly not say that, for when compared with what he is conscious of, we are in the dark.

Meister Eckhart has another term related to this: the concept of detachment.

This is directly a differentiation between purusha and sattvam. In a very illuminating sentence, he says in his meditation about detachment:

I have read many writings of heathen philosophers and sages, of the old covenant and of the new, and have sought earnestly and with diligence which is the best and highest virtue whereby a man may knit himself most narrowly to God and wherein he is most like to his exemplar, as he was in God, wherein was no difference between himself and God, ere God created creature.

And having approfounded all these scriptures to the best of my ability, I find it is none other than absolute detachment from all creatures.

As our Lord said to Martha, “unum est necessarium,” which is as good as saying, He who would be serene and pure needs but one thing, detachment.

Our doctors sing love’s praises, as did St. Paul, who said, “Whatsoever things I do and have not charity I am nothing.”

But I extol detachment above any love.

First, because at best love constrains me to love God.

Now it is far better my constraining God to me than for me to be constrained to God.

My eternal happiness depends on God and me becoming one; …537

This the union with the purusha.

[…] but God is apter to adapt himself to me and can easier communicate with me than I can communicate with God.

Detachment forces God to come to me, and this is shown as follows. Everything is fain to be in its natural state.

But God's own natural state is unity and purity and these come from detachment.

Hence God is bound to give himself to a heart detached.—Secondly, I rank detachment above love because love constrains me to suffer all things for God's sake: detachment constrains me to admit nothing but God.

Now it is far better to tolerate nothing but God than to suffer all things for God's sake.

For in suffering one has regard to creatures, …

This is the prakriti. … whence the suffering comes, but detachment is immune from creature.

Further, that detachment admits of none but God I demonstrate in this wise: anything received must be received in aught.

But detachment is so nearly naught that there is nothing rare enough to stay in this detachment, except God.

He is so simple, so ethereal, that he can sojourn in the solitary heart. Detachment then admits of God alone.

That which is received is received and grasped by its receiver according to the mode of the receiver; and so anything conceived is known and understood according to the mind of him who understands and not according to its innate conceivability.

And humility the masters laud beyond most other virtues.

I rank detachment before any meekness and for the following reasons.

Meekness can be without detachment but complete detachment is impossible without humility.

Perfect humility is a matter of selfnaughting; but detachment so narrowly approximates to naught that no room remains for aught betwixt zero and absolute detachment.

This is the void or shûnyatâ. Wherefore without humility is no complete detachment.

Withal two virtues are always better than one.—Another reason why I put detachment higher than humility is this: humility means abasing self before all creatures and in that same abasement one goes out of oneself to creatures.

But then man is trapped once again in the prakriti through humility. But detachment abideth in itself.

Now no going out however excellent, but staying in is better still.

As the prophet hath it, “omnis gloria filiae regis ab intus,” the king’s daughter is all glorious within.

Perfect detachment is without regard, without either lowliness or loftiness to creatures: it has no mind to be below nor yet to be above; it is minded to be master of itself, loving none and hating none, having neither likeness or unlikeness, neither this nor that, to any creature; the only thing it fain would be is same.

But to be either this or that it does not want at all. He who is this or that is aught; […]541

So as you see this is prakriti. […] but detachment is altogether naught. It leaves things unmolested.

Here someone may object, But surely in our Lady all the virtues flourished in perfection and among them absolute detachment.

Now granting that detachment is better than humility, why did our Lady glory in her lowliness instead of her detachment, saying, “quia respexit dominus humilitatem ancillae suae”: “He regarded the lowliness of his handmaiden?”

I answer that, in God there is detachment and humility as well, so far as virtues can be attributed to God.

Know, it was his loving meekness that made God stoop to enter human nature while it remained within itself as motionless, what time he was made man, as it was while he created the heavens and the earth, as I shall show you later.

This describes the mixing and at the same time the detachment from the purusha, the droplet on the lotus leaf.

In this way God entered into creation without being affected by it in his innermost.

And seeing that Our Lord when he chose to be made man did persist in his motionless detachment, by the same token did our Lady know that he expected her to do the same, albeit for the nonce he had regarded expressly to her lowliness and not to her detachment.

So remaining unmoved in her detachment she yet gloried in her lowliness and not in her detachment.

Had she but once remembered her detachment to say, “He regarded my detachment,” her detachment would by that have been disturbed and would not have been absolute and perfect since a going forth has taken place.

Any event, however insignificant, will always cause some troubling of detachment.

There you have the explanation of our Lady’s glorying in her lowliness instead of her detachment. Quoth the prophet, “audiam, quid loquatur in me dominus deus,” “I will be still and listen to what my God may be saying within me,” as though to say, if God would parley with me then he must come in for I will not go out. It is Boëthius who exclaims, “Ye men, why do ye look without for that which is within you?” Carl Jung, Psychology and Yoga Meditation, Page 229-240

This evening I slept a bit at 6 o’clock.

Before sleeping I suddenly saw the face of my father, very vividly. He smiled and seemed to be in a very good mood.

At II o’clock at night on the same day before sleeping I saw my mother, somewhat as I saw her in the coffin, floating upward out of the darkness, her head slightly bent back, her eyes closed, as if sleeping or in a swoon, but living inside.

My father stood right next to her, smiling, in another state, he looked at her smilingly.

1922 8/9 January 1923 I dreamt that my father had returned from a long journey.

I thought, now for once he can come into my house and see my family, whom he never knew.

But he wanted to consult me concerning his marriage and I had to explain to him the psychological relationship in marriage.

S. Much is going on. Disorder has arisen through the death of your mother. Her spirit spurred us to create.

[I]. Why am I so unbearably tired?

S. Because the burden is difficult.

[1]Psychology of Yoga and Meditation

1939 23 JUNE Lecture 9 Psychology and Yoga Meditation

Some questions have come in.

The first question I received asks where one can look up the Upanishads.

The best and most comprehensive translation is really Deussen’s.

I brought the large copy with me to show you.

One question concerned the citation references, and I will give the information to the person asking if they will please speak with me after the lecture.

The other question relates to the difference between the Eastern and Western attitudes of mind.

I have only touched on this question and won’t address it in detail.

That would be a chapter in its own right, but one that remains quite unresolved.

The ultimate differences still escape us, for one would have to know both the East and the West intimately.

However, very few can now compare Eastern and Western psychologies, when there is such widespread ignorance of psychological matters.

I myself was not there for long enough to present anything exhaustive to you.

All I have are certain impressions; I can’t answer this question in any depth.

I simply want to observe that we must register the fact that a difference exists.

The Eastern attitude of mind simply diverges from the Western one, and it would be quite another task to establish precisely the nature of the difference.

There we hit upon great difficulties.

I have mentioned some of them, but I prefer to present the materials to you.

I presented certain aspects of the Eastern attitude of mind last semester.

This semester we will take up the West, and I shall explore an especially typical item with you.

Then, if you compare it with the impressions you formed about the East, you will already have formed a picture of this extraordinary distinctiveness, so that you can draw your own conclusions.

I have been asked what, then, is the specific cause of the West’s having a completely different attitude from the East.

That is very hard to say; I can only speculate about it.

But I make no bones about it; I can say what I know with some justification, but I must not indulge in too many hypotheses.

In India, we are dealing with an ancient culture.

The excavations of Mohendjo Daro and Harappa demonstrate this.

Over the last few years these two ancient sites, which date back to the third and fourth millennia BC, have been excavated by the British.

This is an uncommonly advanced civilization, and typically Indian.

They have found cylinder seals there, depicting divine figures, e.g., Shiva, which one had long assumed had made their way into India via the Aryan invasion; or people in yoga positions, leading to the conclusion that yoga is immeasurably ancient.

The same applies to the major Indian gods, which of course evolved after the Aryan invasion.

Possibly, new gods were added to them, but, whatever, the Aryan invasion did not signify for India what has long been assumed.

The invading tribes were probably barbarian and were assimilated into the pre-existing Dravidic civilization, which, for its part, had also contributed to this long cultural formation.

In any case, this did not interrupt India's spiritual development, which would be unlikely in this incredibly large continent.

The same holds for China.

Whatever makes its way into the country is assimilated over centuries, and eventually there are 400 million Chinese, and then it partly vanishes, and it's the same in India.

Over and over again, another Delhi evolves.

Upon the five ruins of the past, over and over again new Delhis emerged and new cities were founded.

The English founded New Delhi.

We shouldn't be surprised if, in 500 years, the ruins of the Congress building and the Viceroy's Palace were venerated as relics of ancient English civilization, just as the Mogul ruins are today.

India has an incredible continuity.

Its gods and the basic philosophy of yoga are maybe 6000 years old, and the Hindu religion as we know it today carries within itself the roots of a primeval, primitive religion.

It has truly grown up out of its roots.

This is the classic difference between the East and the West.

By the West, I mean the part of Europe in which we live.

These are the Germanic peoples who were still absolute barbarians around 1500 years ago.

They had a civilization, not a primitive one, but quite barbaric.

Even when they began to have contact with the Romans, they were still completely barbaric.

As you know, through this encounter with high Roman culture, Christianity spread throughout the Germanic territories and fundamentally modified a primitive polytheism that, not yet theistic but still in the stage of demonism, was obliterated by it except for a few traces.

That never happened in India.

An Indian god has never been obliterated, but instead, from the very beginning religion evolved peacefully and sequentially.

It emerged out of the primitive stage.

The direction of travel went from demonism and polytheism over into a more highly evolved type of monotheism, which then moved into a philosophical perspective as shown by the Brahman, purusha, Prajâpati, âtman.

These stages all exist in India alongside each other.

Just as tribes of people exist in India who still wear no clothes but alongside them are highly differentiated, cultured people.

The whole of nature has grown along with the Indian. They have developed and differentiated themselves.

For us in the West, however, Christianity spread through Rome's political power, and as the religion of the conquerors it was obviously and immediately mimicked by the simpler tribes, minus any psychological preparation for it that would let them accept and understand it.

That is why we have the so-called Dark Ages after the fall of the Roman Empire, during which Germanic Christianity was hardly visible, apart from certain external forms.

Perhaps, for example, you know the history of the St. Gallen cloister.

At the time of Ekkehard or Notker, a relatively high culture prevailed there.

They could write Latin, knew Greek, but after 200 years not even the abbots could write any more.

They only bore the sword.

The whole native spiritual development and its predisposition to polytheism was simply interrupted in the Germanic soul, and even obliterated to its very root, and then Christianity was grafted upon this root.

And this caused a few convulsions because it was not a natural process and was not accepted out of conviction.

One did not accept Christianity out of an inner understanding, but because it was the religion of the Roman legionnaires.

Just as today in Africa where the district commissioner's machine gun is identified with the teaching of the missionaries.

One dared not speak of spirits, demons, and amulets with them because that did not concur with the language of the missionaries.

But the missionary is identified with the rifle that the district commissioner has at his disposal, and one must believe it or be shot.

It was the same in Britain.

We have evidence that it yielded to Christianity because it had a terror of the Roman military. Just as is happening today in Africa.

But as I saw with my own eyes, these missionary pupils understand absolutely nothing of Christianity.

This is all for show and counterfeit.

Probably sometimes there are exceptions, but the effect by and large is dubious.

I saw something similar with the Pueblo Indians.

Some tribes have been Christian for three hundred years.

They are baptized Christians bearing Christian names alongside the Pueblo Indian ones.

When they baptize a child they do it according to Catholic rites.

The priest comes every two months there.

The mass is said. They find this wonderful, and when I asked them: "What do you make of this?," they answered that he speaks about a certain Jesus: "We don't understand this, but it is very beautiful."

When someone is buried it is done according to Catholic rites with proper blessings, and then the Indian rites are carried out and then they are correctly sent off.

And then we find the snake dances in church, and thus the church is drawn into the Indian rituals.

That is how they understand Christianity.

Christianity is in fact the ripe blossom of Hellenic syncretism.

That is where its roots are to be found, but they are never mentioned in this context.

And so this highly differentiated religion is now unloaded onto a barbarian tribe, and they are supposed to believe in it.

They can do nothing but accept it, yet they cannot understand it.

That is what happened to the Germanic people.

They submitted to this truth through colossal effort and self-discipline, but with a colossal resentment that has endured for centuries.

Now we are seeing the fruits, now the resentment is coming into the light of day, to tear down the church in every Protestant country, as this is likely what is in the psyche to do.

For example, in the Nordic countries, which are completely Protestant: if they had lost the war like the Germans, the moment would have already arrived for them when they would leap out of the church.

What is ancient for them is still there, such as the runic stones and megalithic tombs.

If the Nordic countries had been subjected to the same social crisis as Germany, you would have seen much the same thing happen.

On the whole, the Reformation was precipitated by such unrest.

The people did not feel comfortable in the Pax Romana of the Church.

They want something else, something more.

Protestantism split into four hundred denominations, movements, with no trace of unity.

You can hardly speak of a Protestant church today.

It has no center, one person preaches this, the other that, everyone preaches whatever they want.

This is caused by an inner unrest, but it is out of this that renewal emerges.

This is no accident, and I am not saying that itcought to go this way or that way, I am only confirming facts.

That is why, when something goes awry in this Europe of ours, it is the Protestant countries which bring it to light.

They return to barbarism because their resentment against the Christianity that was superimposed on them is still warm in the background.

From this psychological situation, you can understand what the characteristics of the West are. For us, the whole religious question is never a natural process, it does not grow naturally, but one must make an incredible effort.

When a young man says to his spiritual adviser: "I can't believe this or that," and he says, "You must believe," then I ask myself: How can one say such a thing?

I can believe because I know something, but if I do not know something, then I simply cannot believe it.

Faith is a grace I have never had. Either I know something, or I don't know it.

A religious fact must be an experience; belief is not an experience.

One can believe everything if it is given to one to do so. In fact, faith is only a makeshift.

The word "faith" in Greek is "pistis," namely, to be faithful to something, reliability, loyal action.

One has "pistis" to something that one has experienced.

When Paul had his vision of Christ on the road to Damascus, he stood by it firmly, and he had to champion it.

If, however, Christ had not appeared to him and he had believed it all the same, then he could have had no "pistis."

E ither it is lived experience, or it is absolutely nothing. I stand for the perspective of lived experience.

This is radical, but the only ones who can believe are the ones who have the charism of faith.

That is our situation. Perhaps competent people can create it for themselves.

Because it certainly isn't bestowed upon one. This is why one must strive.

You will see these strivings in my further explorations of the Exercitia Spiritualia.

There you will see what kind of preposterous moral effort it takes to produce a religious attitude.

In the East, this is nature. Like flowers and animals. They obey the law of God as flowers do.

Religion is everything, except an effort, and if it is an effort it is natural.

When one observes a yogi doing his religious gymnastics or some sort of devotional practice in the inner temple, there is no struggle to believe nor any moral conflict in it.

It is done naturally, he stretches out like a cat.

People make the most unnatural of things completely natural; you see this all over the East.

That is why religion there has something colorful, natural, and joyful about it.

With us on the other hand, it is a terribly sad affair. Just think—the church is teeming with graves.

One prays at the house of the spirits. Everything is black, whereas there, everything is fresh and in the most amazing colors.

The walls of the temple are painted red and white like the awning of a refreshment room.

Enchanting things take place there; charming girls dance in the center of the temple.

Music is played. All worldliness and sensuality is included in religious practice, completely different from what we do.

For us, a part of natural development has been sawn off.

In my opinion, this is one of the most important reasons for our peculiar Western mentality, which one simply doesn't encounter anywhere else.

It is possible that today's negroes will show a similar resentment since, due to the influence of the West, they are now completely alienated from their roots.

For example, with the American negroes, if they have succeeded in taking on the Christian religion, then out of this will grow African resentments wherever negroes are actually among their own kind.

That is also the case with the voodoo cult in Haiti, a true fetish cult about which some interesting books have been written.

These are entirely necessary regressions.

By the way, when they have truly accepted it, Christianity in the Black churches is quite sincere and profound, and incredibly lively in character.

The Negro spirituals are marvelous religious hymns, which are perhaps the liveliest religious expression known to us.

This singing is the sign of the tension between, on the one hand, the demands of a higher culture to which they are unequal, and on the other hand a complete primitivity.

These are the essential differences.

In the West, we find the same naturalness and flowering of the religious spirit as in the East among the Pueblo Indians in Arizona and New Mexico.

Their attitude is quite similar to that of the Far East.

But there is also an uninterrupted continuity of spiritual development among the primitives who still have their rituals and for whom the Christian watershed has not yet prevailed within the existing tribes.

If this did occur, the same problem of alienation from one's roots would emerge from it.

That is, if these tribes even have the time to undergo this development.

In America they have mostly died out from the effort—something that did not happen to the Germans with their fabled fertility. Carl Jung, Psychology and Yoga Meditation, Page 254-262

[1]Psychology of Yoga and Meditation

9 JUNE 1939 Lecture 7 Psychology Meditation and Yoga

In the last lecture we considered the idea of seclusion according to Meister Eckhart's understanding.

As you will have seen in the texts, for him it concerns a differentiation, a distinction between oneself and what the East describes as prakriti, namely, the being of the world or material phenomena.

For Eckhart, the abandonment of things and the abandonment of oneself are, in fact, synonymous.

For he understands that the I is connected to things in an indivisible and most intimate way, and if one separates from things, one also separates from oneself.

This is one of the forms which the problem of the purusha and sattvam has assumed in the West.

With this, we can conclude the lines we took from the Yoga Sûtra and discussed.

I would like to remind you once again what purusha means for the Indian.

We already have some utterances from the Upanishads, dating back to a very ancient time, which illuminate the nature of the purusha particularly in its form as Brahman. You know that the purusha is identical to him.

This is what an Upanishad text says: He who is this (Brahman) in man, and he who is that (Brahman) in the sun, both are one.

This text refers to the man whom one sees in the sun.

This, and the figure of the small man one sees in the pupil of the eye, are one and the same.

I borrow the prayer of a dying man from the Brihadâranyaka Upanishad:

The face of the True [the Brahman] is covered with a golden disk. Open that, O Pûshan [Sâvitrî, sun], that we may see the nature of the True. O Pûshan, only seer, Yama [judge], Sûrya [sun], son of Pragâpati, spread thy rays and gather them.

The light which is thy fairest form, I see it. I am what he is [viz. the person in the sun.]

From another, the Khândogya Upanishad:

Now the light which shines above this heaven, higher than all, higher than everything, in the highest world, beyond which there are no other worlds, that is the same light which is within man.

And of this we have this visible proof: Namely when we thus perceive by touch the warmth here in the body.

At another point it says:

–even as a grain of rice, or a grain of barley, or a grain of millet, or the smallest granule of millet, so is this golden Purusha in the heart; even as a smokeless light, it is greater than the sky, greater than the ether, greater than the earth, greater than all existing things;—that self of the spirit [breath] is my self: on passing away from hence I shall obtain that self.

From these points in the text you can see how this purusha was understood in the classical Indian period.

As you will understand, we have Western parallels with these concepts, which show an identification of the human with the universal being, and once again we find them in Meister Eckhart.

I'd like to quote a point from one of his sermons:

… by this kingdom of God we understand the soul, for the soul is of like nature with the Godhead. Hence all that has been said here of the kingdom of God, how God is himself the kingdom, may be said with equal truth of the soul. St. John says: "All things were made by him."

This refers to the soul, for the soul is all things.

The soul is all things in that she is an image of God and as such she is also the kingdom of God; as God is essentially in himself without beginning so in the kingdom of the soul he is, as essence, without end. “God,” says one philosopher, “is in the soul in such a fashion that his whole Godhead hangs upon her.”

It is far better for God to be in the soul than for the soul to be in God.

The soul is not happy because she is in God, she is happy because God is in her.

This is certainly one of the points that was objectionable to the inquisitors, and also the reason why the texts were condemned in his day.

This condemnation of his writings took place after his death.

He died on the way to Avignon, where he had been summoned to defend himself.

So his writings disappeared for nearly six hundred years.

Here and there his texts would be found, but only fragments, on the rear side of documents or hidden among other papers.

Not until the middle of the nineteenth century was it possible to collect his writings and to publish them.

Until now there has only been the Pfeifferian manuscript in Middle High German and Latin.

A new edition is coming out.

We have the good fortune and honor to possess a manuscript of Eckhart’s in Switzerland, namely in Basle.

When anyone asks me, why do we pray or why do we fast or do our work withal, I say, so that God may be born in our souls.

What were the scriptures written for and why did God create the world and the angelic nature?

Simply that God might be born in the soul.

All cereal nature means wheat, all treasure nature means gold, all generation means man.

This is probably one of the most important points in Meister Eckhart’s writing. In a certain sense, he experienced a renaissance in the nineteenth century after sleeping for six hundred years.

We are beginning to understand him a little, not least because in the meantime we have incorporated within us the spiritual treasures of the East.

There is an extraordinary relationship between Eastern ideas and the ideas of Meister Eckhart, which is yet to be fathomed.

These ideas about the soul as the kingdom of God, these surely already existed in the early Christian period; they were certainly heretical and gnostic in nature, for in them primal man, Adam Kadmon, is sometimes depicted in the soul.

In the Codex Brucianus, a Coptic gnostic text, he is the inhabitant of a monad, and in the most recently discovered texts he is depicted as the kingdom of God.

Apart from Meister Eckhart, I'd like to draw your attention to another very remarkable medieval man, although from a later period: Angelus Silesius.

He had a peculiar destiny.

He was a Protestant and as such wrote the Cherubinic Wanderer.

There he presented his philosophy and theology in the form of short poems.

The thoughts expressed there are movingly simple and naïve, much as what you have already encountered in Meister Eckhart.

Silesius was essentially an original who created himself from himself and is not based upon historical sources.

I will quote some of his verses.

They correspond absolutely with what we have heard Meister Eckhart saying.

Without me, this I know, God cannot live one minute; I perish, and God must as soon give up God's spirit.

God would not make one worm without me; yet if I Don't help God to preserve it, it rots immediately.

I am as big as God, God is so small, like me.

God cannot be above me, I cannot below God be.

God is the fire in me and I in Him the shine; Are we not with each other, most inwardly entwined?

God loves me above all; if I love Him the same, I give Him just as much as I receive from him.

For me God's God and man, I'm man and God, indeed, For God.  I quench God's thirst, God helps me in my need.

God pleasures us. God is, for us, whate’er we would.

Woe if we don’t become, for God, that which we should.

God is what God is, I am what I am, you see?

Yet if you knew one well, you’d know both God and me.

I am not outside God, God is not outside me.

God is my jewel, I God’s light and radiancy.

I am vine in the Son, the Father plants, manures,

The Holy Ghost’s the fruit which out of me matures.

I am God’s child and son, and yet my child is He.

How can it ever happen that both these things should be?

Myself I must be sun, whose rays must paint the sea, The vast and unhued ocean of all divinity.

From these verses, being just a few examples, you can see the entire sensibility of this mystic.

He is expressing in Western medieval language what is, in fact, the essential idea of Eastern yoga.

Just how these ideas were able to emerge in the West under completely different conditions is a difficult question.

We will satisfy ourselves for now simply with the fact that this did in fact happen.

We turn now once again to the Yoga Sûtram.

I have chosen some lines that we can quickly deal with now. In the third Sûtram it says:

From perfect discipline of the receptive, intrinsic, egoistic, relational, and purposive functions of the sense organs, one attains mastery over them. [YS 3.47, p. 71]

The specific sense organs are the mechanisms through which we are persuaded of the reality of the world.

The sense of this sentence is clear, namely that this mastery, this holding back, which is applied to all possible psychological actions in yoga, effects a quiescence of our own psychic process and also a detachment of the psychic process of the external world.

Then there is no longer any intermingling with the affairs of the world.

Everything that occurs is entitled to its due share of attention and no more.

Our senses are continually running away from us, we stream out into people and things through the concupiscentia.

But practising general discipline, as recommended in this sentence, would free us from slavery to the object.

What is interesting about this sentence is the mention of the so-called sequence in time.

There is yet another sentence in which this sequence in time is emphasized:

From perfect discipline of moments and their sequence in time, one has the knowledge

born of discrimination. [YS 3.52, p. 72]

The yoga of Patañjali insists probably correctly on this mastery of the consciousness of time, for consciousness of time is an extraordinary expression of our dependency upon things and our being coalesced with them.

The more things we are concerned with, the greater the intensity of our awareness of time.

If you have a lot to do with very many things in a very short time, you get into a state of hurriedness.

You become conscious of yourself in the hectic series of events.

People in haste have to live with their watch in their hands.

The more one has to do, the more time-conscious one becomes.

One calculates when one becomes conscious of what one has to do.

They have this feeling to a much smaller degree in the East than we do in the West, the primitives even less so, who as a rule have no clue about how old they are and are un-aware of what time it is.

When one asks them how long it takes to get from one place to another, they say one or two or several hours.

Which can be anything between twenty and two.

Of course they know exactly how far it is, but without any notion of time.

What we call the value of time is unknown to them.

Only the diversity and the richness of civilization have made us conscious of time.

Insofar as India has a distinct culture and a rich animation of cultural life, which can develop only in a population of great density, India has also has acquired a concept of time, such that the Yoga Sûtram insists upon the concept of setting time aside, and on the necessity of mastering time.

One must be able to set time aside.

For as soon as you are conscious of time, you are conscious of the various demands on time.

This and this and this come along.

As a result, whoever must separate himself from the prakriti, must also separate himself from time, he must live as if he had centuries to squander, completely untroubled by the fact that the human lifespan is so brief.

That is like the primitive who sits whittling away at his canoe.

He has had been at it for so long that when he happily arrives at the bow, the stern has rotted away.

Yet the figures he carved were beautiful; he didn't need the benefit of what a canoe does.

The next sentence reads: From this one acquires quickness of mind, perception without the aid of the senses, and mastery over primordial matter. [YS 3.48, p. 71]

In common parlance: he speaks of a particularly speedy, fluent train of thought and mastery of the prakriti, of an independence from the sense organs that bind us to the things of the world.

Of course, that familiar idea that the yogi is capable of levitating in the air, can leave the body and somehow transport himself into another body, originates in such claims.

If you consider this matter psychologically, you see that this concerns a state of consciousness which, without external interference, smoothly runs on its own, independent of relationships with the environment and which therefore is not bound, which gives the yogi the feeling of mastery over things or, in fact, ensures increased influence upon things and people.

For the man who can liberate himself from these bonds to which we are all subject makes a particular impression on people, who are always subject to anyone who is not subject to what the rest of us are.

He is not bound, does not go around making fearful war-mongering speeches, looks within himself for clarity and order.

Patañjali continues with the application of universal discipline upon the sequence in time and its consequences:

From perfect discipline of moments and their sequence in time, one has the knowledge

born of discrimination. [YS 3.52, p. 72]

That is, if it is possible to stop the flow of time and to exist in such a way that one has centuries or millennia at one's disposal, then a higher awareness would arise, elevated above any infatuation with things.

This awareness, or constellations of these types of awareness, can of course be found abundantly in Indian philosophy:

Through discrimination one comprehends differences of origin, characteristic, or position that distinguish two seemingly similar things. [YS 3.53, p. 73]

Which are any pair of similars that, although one cannot distinguish them, nonetheless can be distinguished.

These are purusha and sattvam.

We saw then that the purusha could be described as the man within and that sattvam, though arising from prakriti, is a result of her connection with the purusha and the lightest thing, which she produces.

Or the difference between the purusha as the simple primal being and the sattvam, which is a derivative combination or a functional result of the collision of purusha with prakriti.

In other words, a differentiation of the Self and the I.

These differentiations are practiced in yoga with great intricacy in the form of meditations, and these exercises naturally have a goal.

This goal is described as kaivalyam, namely, solitude.

One who sees the distinction between the lucid quality of nature and the observer ceases to cultivate a personal reality. [YS 4.25, p. 80]

Here is a new term: cittam. Usually translated as consciousness.

It is one of the qualities or functions of the sattvam, and we already said of this that it could be translated as consciousness (luminous world substance).

That is why we can also translate cittam as consciousness. It is a parallel.

The one who recognizes the distinction between the purusha and the cittam no longer falls for the delusion of being the Self, or âtman.

There you can see that the purpose of the exercise is simply to effect this differentiation, in order to avoid the I-hypertrophy that is completely unavoidable when someone differentiates oneself from the world and action.

Such a technique puts off many people; they think it makes one egocentric, thinking only of oneself, as if everyone else can get lost.

But that view is merely superficial.

If someone devotes their attention to the purusha in the sense of the Yoga Sûtram, they do not fall for the I.

The I is only the phenomenon fronting for an unknowable something standing behind it.

The I is, as it were, only the face, the skin, the expression, the symptom of an unknowable being.

Such is the Indian way of thinking.

But of course if, as in Western consciousness, one has lost the belief in a Self, or one has never possessed it, then of course one falls for the I and attributes everything to the I.

Then all the evil consequences associated with this non-differentiation show up.

A boundless bloating arises because the I is no longer recognized as a phenomenon.

That is why one forms a definite idea opposed to these efforts, because the danger seems to be that if one concentrates upon oneself, it really comes down to magnifying the I.

We Westerners cannot grasp this matter of the Self.

For the last two hundred years we have been developing a forceful resistance to faith, but faith does not help us much here because we have invested the purusha entirely in Christ.

In our country, if someone professes the Self, he would have to come to Christ.

And so this Protestant idea, which has externalized the purusha, for us entails a misconception; the I by its very nature gets identified with the Self, and thus has been elevated too highly.

If this is recognized (à la Meister Eckhart) man drops down.

Until quite recently the church has viewed Meister Eckhart very negatively.

The text continues:

Then, deep in discrimination, thought gravitates toward freedom. [YS 4.26, p. 80]

If sattvam and purusha are explained as being alike, kaivalyam results, that is, if the cittam is differentiated from the Self, then the state of redemption, of kaivalyam, namely, detachment, can arise.

The image of the mountainside of redemption is very plastic and corresponds to a certain feeling.

When the I is identified with the Self, it is sort of elevated to a great height where it does not belong; if one sees the difference, then it sinks down.

Meister Eckhart would say: yes, you are terribly important, but abandon yourself nonetheless.

And then it flows down the mountain, and then the purusha is liberated.

This infinite knowledge means an end to the sequence of transformations in material things, their purpose now fulfilled. [YS 4.32, p. 82]

The purpose of the gunas is the carrying out of world events.

This purpose is achieved when cittam sinks back into the prakriti and purusha has returned to its original state.

Sequence corresponds to a series of moments perceivable at the end of a process of transformation. [YS 4.33, p. 83]

The rapid flow of moments has ceased, one has maybe learned to feel as if one had millennia to live.

But when kaivalyam is achieved, the entire sequence of time has become a whole.

There are no longer any moments, a complete separation from events is achieved, i.e., a state of eternity.

Patañjali continues, and this is the final sentence I want to read to you from the Yoga Sûtra:

Freedom is a reversal of the evolutionary course of material things, which are empty of meaning for the spirit; it is also the power of consciousness in a state of true identity. [YS 4.34, p. 83]

This sentence seeks to explain what happens to sattvam, which has flowed down the mountainside of redemption.

Namely these free gunas, qualities, principles, which contain the process of the world, now return to the original state.

A static, self-contained strength arises, and in place of the prakriti there is now the spirit, a pure intuition that is completely distinct from material being.

In brief outline, this is the main content of this Yoga Sûtram.

Naturally, when you study this text yourself you will see that there are infinitely more things within it that are difficult but also exceptionally weighty.

I'd like to conclude the series with one point from the Brihadâranyaka Upanishad.

On this there are these verses: The small, old path stretching far away has been found by me.

On it sages who know Brahman move on to the Svarga-loka [heaven], and thence higher on, as entirely free.

This is the path of yoga.

On that path they say that there is white, or blue, or yellow, or green, or red; …

These are the colors that we already encountered in the Buddhist texts. This means: wherever this path is, these colors are there also: blue, yellow, green, red.

These are the four elements that compose the newly incarnate Self, the purusha, and white is the unity.

In the Tibetan Book of the Dead, the Bardo Thödol, you also find these colors and there, too, the central light is the white light of the dharmakâya.

It is the white light of the body, of the perfect law.

… that path was found by Brahman, …You see, he identifies himself with Brahman. He does not say, I have found this path, but that Brahman has. He is identical with Brahman. … and on it goes whoever knows Brahman, and who has done good, and obtained splendor.

Whoever has found and understood the self that has entered into this patched-together hiding place, he indeed is the creator, for he is the maker of everything, his is the world, and he is the world itself.

While we are here, we may know this; if not, I am ignorant, and there is great destruction.

Those who know it, become immortal, but others suffer pain indeed.

If a man clearly beholds this self as God, and as the Lord of all that is and will be, then he is no more afraid.

He behind whom the year revolves with the days, him the gods worship as the light of lights, as immortal time.

This means that he has become eternity insofar as he no longer participates in the dance of the prakriti.

Whoever liberates himself from the dance of the prakriti has become the light.

Actually this text shows in a few words the whole meaning and purpose of yoga.

With this I want to conclude my discussion of Eastern yoga ideas.

Just one addendum regarding Chinese yoga, however.

It is not generally known that China also has a type of yoga.

This consists of two different parts: one has directly coalesced with alchemical philosophy, while the other later became Japanese Zen Buddhism.

This particular yoga I will not cover.

It is exceptionally difficult but uncommonly interesting.

Soon a translation of one of the texts from the Japanese Professor Suzuki from Tokyo will be published.

He has written specifically about Zen Buddhism.

Prof. Zimmer is undertaking the translation, and I will do the commentary.

But it is not yet published.

I’d like to say something else about this other yoga.

We have a really excellent example of a text, which Richard Wilhelm has published and translated.

It is a manuscript from the year 1000: The Secret of the Golden Flower.

For a long time this text was only passed down in an oral tradition, then later as a manuscript.

It was not printed until the eighteenth century. In 1920 a thousand copies were printed in Peking by a rich Chinese man, and that is how Wilhelm laid his hands on a copy.

He translated the text, and I commented on it.

This is an excellent example of a whole series of texts and sacred practices that are still valid in China, although to a decreasing degree.

For at the moment China must practice modern methods of war and has no time to meditate.

I will read to you something from the Golden Flower.

It is eminently Chinese and forms an important parallel to the Indian texts we have read.

You will see how different it feels and how laconic the style is.

Emptiness comes as the first of the three contemplations.

All things are looked upon as empty. Then follows delusion.

Although it is known that they are empty, things are not destroyed, but one attends to one's affairs in the midst of the emptiness.

But though one does not destroy things, neither does one pay attention to them; this is contemplation of the center.

While practicing contemplation of the empty, one also knows that one cannot destroy the ten thousand things, and still one does not notice them. In this way the three contemplations fall together.

But, after all, strength is in envisioning the empty.

Therefore, when one practices contemplation of emptiness, emptiness is certainly empty, but delusion is empty also, and the center is empty.

It needs a great strength to practice contemplation of delusion; then delusion is really delusion, but emptiness is also delusion, and the center is delusion too.

Being on the way of the center, one also creates images of the emptiness; they are not called empty but are called central.

One practices also contemplation of delusion, but one does not call it delusion, one calls it central.

As to what has to do with the center, more need not be said. Carl Jung, Psychology and Yoga Meditation, Page 241=252

Carl Jung: It was the mood of the land of the hereafter. (2021-12-12 04:28)

"This I learned in the Mysterium: to take seriously every unknown wanderer who personally inhabits the inner world, since they are real because they are effectual."

For Jung’s commentary on this entry, see LN, pp. 178- 83.

In the 1925 seminar, Jung recounted:

"I used the same technique of the descent, but this time I went much deeper.

The first time I should say I reached a depth of about one thousand feet, but this time it was a cosmic depth.

It was like going to the moon, or like the feeling of a descent into empty space.

First the picture was of a crater, or a ring chain of mountains, and my feeling association was that of one dead, as if oneself were a victim.

It was the mood of the land of the hereafter.

I could see two people, an old man with a white beard and a young girl who was very beautiful.

I assumed them to be real and listened to what they were saying.

The old man said he was Elijah and I was quite shocked, but she was even more upsetting because she was Salome.

I said to myself that there was a queer mixture: Salome and Elijah, but Elijah assured me that he and Salome had been together since eternity.

This also upset me. With them was a black serpent who had an affinity for me.

I stuck to Elijah as being the most reasonable of the lot, for he seemed to have a mind. I was exceedingly doubtful about Salome.

We had a long conversation but I did not understand it.

Of course I thought of the fact of my father being a clergyman as being the explanation of my having figures like this.

How about this old man then? Salome was not to be touched upon.

It was only much later that I found her association with Elijah quite natural.

Whenever you take journeys like this you find a young girl with an old man" (Introduction to Analytical Psychology, pp. 680 - 89).

Jung then refers to examples of this pattern in the work of Herman Melville, Gustav Meyrink, and Rider Haggard, in the Gnostic legend of Simon Magus (see Book 6, p. 217, n. 214), in Kundry and Klingsor from Wagner's Parsifal (see Book 4, pp. 218ff.), and in Francesco Colonna's Hypnerotomachio.

In Memories, he noted: "In myths the snake is a frequent counterpart of the hero.

There are numerous accounts of their affinity. ... Therefore the presence of the snake was an indication of a hero-myth" (p. 206).

Of Salome, he said:

"Salome is an anima figure. She is blind because she does not see the meaning of things.

Elijah is the figure of the wise old prophet and represents the factor of intelligence and knowledge; Salome, the erotic element.

One might say that the two figures are personifications of Logos and Eros.

But such a definition would be excessively intellectual.

It is more meaningful to let the figures be what they were for me at that time- namely, events and experiences" (introduction to Analytical Psychology. 96- 97).

In 1955- 56, Jung wrote:

"For purely psychological reasons I have elsewhere attempted to equate the masculine consciousness with the concept of Logos and the feminine with that of Eros.

By Logos I meant discrimination, judgment, insight, and by Eros I meant the placing into relation" (Mysterium Coniunctionis, CW 14, § 224). On Jung's reading of Elijah and Salome in terms of Logos and Eros , respectively, see LN, Appendix B, "Commentaries" (pp. 562ff.). The Red Books, Vol. II Page183, fn 183

15 NOVEMBER 1940 Lecture 2 Psychology and Yoga Meditation

Mahâsukha

Vihâra

Moon with lingam

Lotus (padma, yoni)

Sun

Moon

Lotus

Vajra

City

Meru

Last time we ended by discussing the synthesizing symbol series from the Shrî-chakrasambhâra tantra.

I want to repeat this one more time.

At the beginning of the synthesizing series of symbols stands the world mountain Meru.

On this mountain we have the symbol of the city, four-square, with eight towers and four colors: red, yellow, white, and green.

Above the city, at the next level, we have the vajra. In Tibet it is described as dorje.

It has four heads. I gave you a more detailed description last time.

Above the vajra there is another lotus, eight petalled, as a symbol of the consummation of wholeness.

As you know from the several times it has been mentioned, the lotus means the seat of divinity or the Buddha.

Above this comes the moon as a symbol of the spirit and above this the sun.

That stands for the essence of the physical, the quintessence of the body.

Upon this there is another lotus, this time signifying the feminine.

It is described as padma. padma means womb.

Then above this, the moon with the symbol of the lingam.

This actually symbolizes the unification of the masculine with the feminine: the moon is the symbol of the feminine, the lingam of the masculine.

Above this comes vihâra, the cloister.

This is a higher form of the city: a gathering of people who dwell in sacred community.

In this cloister there is a mandala.

In this magic circle there is an eight-petalled lotus, and in this lotus sits the yogi himself as Mahâsukha, as the lord of blessedness, which actually means: great blessedness, with four faces, representing the four elements themselves, also the four holy colors; with twelve hands, meaning the nidâna chain. This is the chain of causes, which ultimately culminate in the suffering of the world.

One cause leads to another.

Thus, a chain arises, out of whose eternal and immutable promulgation rises the totality of suffering, which is to be abolished by the Buddha.

The yogi as Mahâsukha has three eyes.

Now, concerning the meaning:

The first image produced in meditation is a mountain, meaning increase or raising, coming forward like a mountain, for example, protruding into the landscape: something rises like a mound out of the surface.

It is as if the earth has been piled up on every side, a heaping-up has taken place of what was previously dispersed.

This is a very simple symbol of what happens in such contemplation: namely, all of the attention that binds us to the world through desire and fear is gathered in by the yogi.

By separating himself from the whole environment, he ascends by heaping together into a mountain what was previously scattered over the whole world.

In this way he steps forth as a form, his inner being; his inner man becomes visible.

And in this way he achieves a boundary with the external world.

This is represented by the city which is especially emphasized by the enclosing wall.

This is the fortified place which is protected by walls of four layers to the outside in which all the people who were previously dispersed are now drawn together.

All the former diffuseness which belonged to the yogi due to his brokenness and fragmentation in the world is now heaped together here within in this wall and in the center of this marvelous fortress.

In fact this is not only a Buddhist idea, but also ancient Hindu: the city of the Brahman, the city of the world being.

Within this is the great treasure, depicted by the varja.

This fortress is like a treasure vault.

I mention this name because it also plays a considerable role in mediaeval mysticism, the so-called gazophylacium where treasure is stored. In this city, in the center.

You can imagine a Western parallel being the Heavenly Jerusalem, for example, also in the sky and also the destination of those liberated from the earth, the redeemed.

There the nations foregather.

There is also a hill or mountain in the center, upon which the ultimate symbol of Christianity ascends: Christ in the form of the mystical lamb.

Here in the center is the four-headed vajra.

This symbolizes concentrated energy, being energy that the yogi had previously poured out over the whole world in a diffuse state.

Every faculty has wrested this energy from him through sense impressions.

Everywhere they adhere to one with awe and desire.

That is the cause of suffering, of the eternal and indestructible operation of the nidâna chain, which leads unerringly to suffering and death.

Such is the energy that he has withdrawn and concentrated here into the fourfold vajra.

The term vajra has two meanings:

“diamond” and “thunderbolt.”

As a diamond, it is the supreme value, the greatest beauty, concentrated in a stone.

As a thunderbolt: a powerful magical force that can strike like lightning.

The thunderbolt is known as a missile of the gods, and this book, the Shrî-chakra-sambhâra tantra, also ends with a manual for the practice of magical powers that the yogi has accumulated in this state.

He is then like a highly charged Leyden jar that can suddenly radiate electrical discharges.

So all this was only a preparation—over this vajra now blossoms the lotus from this charged state.

This means the seat of the gods, or the birthplace of divinity or of the Buddha, who is conceived as being in that place.

The lotus blossoms out of this state of tension.

As the lotus grows from the watery depths and the muddy abyss, gradually emerging from the world of darkness into the world of light, its marvelous blossoms forming on the watery diaphane that touches another kingdom, in the same way the spiritual man comes into energy or tension when he has withdrawn from the world and can endure it without discharging tension through a new reference to the world, then this blossoming begins within him, like a botanical process.

Then the inner spiritual life begins to stir, to find expression, like a plant.

Hence these many symbols, which we also know in the West: the tree with its roots on top and its leaves below: the tree of yoga.

This is a typically Indian idea.

However, you can also find it with Ruysbroeck, our European Dutch mystic who certainly could not have known anything of Indian philosophy.

So then we have the idea of the rose, a hidden root that sprouts.

Christ is such a shoot, also secretly growing out of one single root.

Mary is the rose, the rosa mystica.

She is the vessel in which divinity was conceived and which gave it birth.

For us, the rose is the equivalent of the lotus. If you think of the last verses of the Divina Commedia you also find the rose as a collective form of all that is holy.

The culmination of all that is holy is found in that heavenly rose.

So the circle of the lotus expresses a totality, a culmination of the whole, and the lotus also contains the idea of transformation.

Namely, everything beneath it: vajra, city, and mountain all amount only to rising.

This mounting is like the stem growing from watery depths and unfolding as a blossom.

First of all, out of this lotus arises the moon.

Now the moon initially has a feminine meaning.

We find the same in many mystical contemplations of this type, a feminine symbol and thereafter a masculine one, produced through imagination for the purpose of conjunctio, the union.

The feminine and masculine are, then, symbols of paired opposites overall.

They are the opposites, and their union is the unio oppositorum, the coincidentia oppositorum, the union of opposites, and that is the precursor to the vision of God, in that He is a unio oppositorum as we will see with Ignatius.

So it is the same idea in the East.

The idea of the spiritual is also indicated by the moon.

In the Upanishads it says: “the moon is formed from its manas.”

Its stem also relates it to the word “mind.” The moon was formed from mind or spirit.

The moon represents the spiritual.

The sun, on the other hand, which follows here, corresponds to the masculine, therefore, for example, in alchemy you will see that the typical pairs of opposites, the epitome of opposites, are always portrayed as “sol et luna,” where the sun is always red and the moon white.

In China that is reversed, with white as the masculine and red the feminine.

Also there we find the same idea of conjunctio. In contrast to the moon, the sun represents not spirit but body, although not the coarse, material body, but the essence, the quintessence of the body, an extract of physicality.

One cannot reduce these concepts to something precise, but rather they are intuitive ideas—that the body is something coarse in its unfolding, and yet that in this unfolding an essence manifests itself, a principle, a life principle.

The primitives (including the Neolithic's) have many ideas about this matter of a life force.

If you go into the Middle Ages or to the neovitalists, the body is a manifestation of the life principle disguised in matter, an abstract life of the body, as an epitome of the physical or physical existence.

This is typically Eastern as far as we distinguished from the physical, but this is not the case in the East.

There, the body is always included in the transformation, and it achieves the highest transformation along with spirit.

The spirit no longer takes first place.

That is why the forms of perception in the East are so extraordinarily plastic, concrete, because the East abstains from extensive abstraction as much as possible so that the incredibly important body is not lost to it.

For meditation originates entirely in the body and not at all from spirit.

Above these two comes the lotus of union.

Here a padma appears in the strict sense of the feminine organ.

This leads to the place where the spirit appears paired with the masculine: the moon with the lingam as an expression of the henceforth completed conjunctio, the union of the opposites.

So, the world-opposites described as masculine and feminine have now finally conjoined.

No separation remains.

As a consequence in fact, the process of the world now ceases, because no more fertility occurs, no tension of opposites remains, so no potential energy is at hand.

Now a stability, an incorruptibility, has emerged, signifying eternal existence, which at the same time is closed to the world outside.

The Indians also conceive of the divinity of these principles, they are also personified there, for example, in tantrism—in a Hindu form, strongly influenced by Buddhism, a particular form of psychological union.

There the sun is masculine:

Shiva, creator and destroyer at the same time, and his feminine counterpart of Shakti, Parvati, his consort, who are always depicted in Tantrism, especially in Tibetan Tantrism, as eternally united, in actu.

Thus the highest level is completed.

The concentration comes to an end, and the city, which earlier signified a gathering together of people, has now gone over to the completed, transformed peace of the vihâra, the Buddhist cloister.

This is a spiritual city in which the community of the holy dwell, the perfected ones.

And the crowning is also on the other side of the holy community.

Unlike in Christianity, where the increase culminates in our sharing in the kingdom of God, and is transformed into the community of the saints.

Here it goes even further in that an ultimate fulfillment takes place in the mandala, in an unsurpassable magic circle, where this same person appears as the universal being himself.

The yogi has transformed into the world Buddha. He is the Mahâsukha, lord of blessedness.

He is here in the state of perfect knowledge, perfect awareness, and has three eyes.

The upright eye is the so-called âjna centre, the center of perfect knowledge.

With that, this meditation has reached its goal.

The yogi has arrived at the consciousness of himself as Buddha.

He has not become the Buddha; Buddha does not exist, he has passed into nirvâna.

In the West it is similar in mysticism: when someone identifies with Christ or God then his human being is lost, and he transforms into Christ, he goes over into the being of Christ and is no longer himself. In the East, on the other hand, this person has become the consciousness of himself as the Buddha.

He realizes in himself this Buddha-being, that he is in fact every Buddha.

This has its similarity in Hinduism, in the philosophy of the Upanishads, where the world being is called âtman and the yogi realizes that he is himself the âtman, therefore utterly in contrast to our Western concepts, despite many similarities.

This series naturally appears very foreign the first time you see it.

But there are similar ideas in Western mysticism, specifically in that form of mystical practice related to alchemy, and these same ideas are probable antecedents of our alchemy.

They originate in the school of Augustinian monks (or canons) of Saint Victor.

It was founded by Guillaume de Champeaux, the teacher of Abélard, who, in the eleventh century, near Paris, restored the small half-decaying cloister of Saint Victor of Marseille—the oldest monastery in Marseille, which was destroyed in the French Revolution in the most terrible manner.

(That is why it was later called “the great revolution”!)

Guillaume de Champeaux invited monks to come from the Marseille monastery with the relics of Saint Victor and set this older cella back in motion.

At first he wanted nothing to do with science. Indeed, at the outset he wanted to renounce all science.

He withdrew from the world very angry and offended; his pupil Abélard annoyed him terribly with disputes about universalism.

But he did not prevail, as his pupils soon took up science again.

They concerned themselves very much with nature, though in the main they were great mystics.

Three names became famous in the twelfth century: Hugh of St. Victor, Richard of St. Victor, and Adam of St. Victor, the famous sequences poet.

I’m sure you have already seen these medieval poems, these splendid, tender spiritual songs; they are by Adam of St. Victor. The figure who concerns us is Richard.

He left behind two important books with remarkable titles: Benjamin Minor and Benjamin Major.

The remarkable title refers to a verse from the psalms that reads: “ibi Benyamin adulescentulus in mentis excessu principes Iuda duces eorum principes Zabulon principes Nepthali.” “There also is little Benjamin in the state of ecstasy.”

This is the Vulgate text, which historically is absolutely incorrect; there is no such verse in the Old Testament; “in mentis excessu” is omitted from our Bible.

But this Vulgate text served Richard of St. Victor as a motto for his writing.

In this book he describes the “praeparatio animi ad contemplationem”

(“the preparation of the spirit for contemplation.”)

There he attempts something quite similar to what the Buddhists attempted in their way.

I want to read to you some literal translations from places in Richard of St. Victor, and you will then see for yourself what an extraordinary similarity there is in their construction.

He says:

The first and principal thing for the soul that strives to ascend to the height of knowledge must be the effort to know itself.

This could be the opening of the Shrî-chakra-sambhâra Tantra.

The great height of knowledge is to know the self perfectly.

The full knowledge of a rational spirit is a mountain great and high.

This mountain transcends the highest point of all mundane knowledges; from the height it looks down upon all philosophy, all knowledge of the world.

This is the elevation of the yogi.

What so excellent did Aristotle or Plato discover; what so excellent was such a crowd of philosophers able to discover?

Truly, without doubt, if they had been able by the keenness of their natural ability to ascend this mountain, if their efforts had sufficed for them to discover themselves, if they had known themselves fully, they would never worship idols, never bow the neck to a creature, never raise up the neck against the Creator.

Here those searching failed in the search.

Here, I say, they failed and were not able at all to ascend the mountain. “Let man ascend to a high heart, and God shall be exalted” (Ps. 63: 7, 8).O man, learn to know; learn to think about yourself and you have ascended to a high heart.

The more you advance daily in the knowledge of yourself, the more you always tend to higher things.

He who arrives at perfect knowledge of himself already takes possession of the summit of the mountain.

O how few are those who ascend this far, either because they do not know or because they are not able.

It is very rare to ascend this mountain but much rarer to stand on its summit and to stay there for a while.

However it is the rarest of all to live there and rest in the mind.

Here comes the idea of dwelling upon the summit of the mountain.

Here, again a text from the psalms: “Who shall ascend the mountain of the Lord, and who shall stand in His holy place?” Admiration of joy is that exclamation: “Lord, who shall dwell in your tabernacle, and who shall rest on your holy mountain?” (PS. 15:1)631 O how great and what kind of fortitude, to ascend and stand; O how much and what kind of beatitude, to dwell and rest! Who is fit for this work, who is worthy to receive it?

“Lord, who shall ascend; Lord, who shall stand on your holy mountain? Send forth your light and your truth; they have led me and brought me to your sacred mountain and into your tabernacle.” (Ps. 43:3)632

Or: on your dwelling, “tabernacula tua.” The title of the 78th chapter reads: “How much full knowledge of self is effective.”

I will read you some parts from it:

On the peak of this mountain Jesus is transfigured; …Here Christ corresponds to the Buddha, or to the yogi as Buddha. […] on it Moses is seen with Elijah and each is recognized without a sign; on it the voice of the father to the son is heard. Which of these is not marvelous? Which of these is not desirable? Do you wish to see Christ transfigured?

Ascend this mountain; learn to know yourself.

Do you wish to see Moses and Elijah and recognize them without any sign? Do you wish to understand the law and the prophets without a teacher, without an interpreter?

Ascend this mountain; learn to know yourself. Do you wish to hear the mystery of the father’s secrets?

Ascend this mountain; learn to know yourself. For he descended from heaven when he said: γνῶθι σεαυτόν that is, “Know yourself.”

Do you now see how much the ascent of this mountain is effective, how useful full knowledge of Self is?

This reads very differently, and one thinks it is an illness.

You must read the Schweizer Spiegel.

They had a nice article. Very educational!

The title of the 83rd chapter is: “That the mind is accustomed to remain in the inner-most parts perceives divine showings.”

When can the mind that does not raise itself up to consideration of itself fly up on the wings of contemplation to those things that are above it?

The Lord descends on this mountain; Moses ascends.

On this mountain the Lord taught, and Moses learned about the construction of the tabernacle.

What is understood by the tabernacle of the covenant except the state of perfection?

Perfect city and finally vihâra.

Therefore he who ascends the mountain, who gives heed diligently, who seeks for a very long time, who discovers at last what sort he is—it remains that he learns from divine showing what sort he ought to be, what sort of edifice of the mind he ought to prepare for God, and by what obediences he ought to appease God.

Therefore, when do you think a mind that is still spread out through various desires, that is dragged this way and that by various thoughts, will be worthy to receive this grace? If it is unable to gather itself into a unity, if it does not know how to enter into itself, when will it be able to ascend by contemplation to those things that are above itself?

The title of the eighth chapter reads, “How the mind that eagerly strives for contemplation of celestial things ought to gather itself within.”

Let one who eagerly strives for contemplation of celestial things, who sighs for knowledge of divine things, learn to assemble the dispersed Israelites; let him endeavor to restrain the wanderings of the mind; let him be accustomed to remain in the innermost part of himself and to forget everything exterior.

So: by no means outwardly.

But today one thinks that it has to be found outside.

Let him make a church, not only of desires but also of thoughts, in order that he may learn to love only true good and to think, unceasingly of it alone: “In the churches bless God” (Ps. 68, 27).

It is absolutely not the gathering of the saints or a prayer chamber, because this gathering is a consolidation worked out by the individual.

He gathers his dispersedness, not that of others.

For in this twofold church, namely of thoughts and desires, in this twofold concord of efforts and wills, Benjamin is carried away into the height, and the divinely inspired mind is raised to supernal things: “There is Benjamin a youth in ecstasy of mind.”

He identifies himself naturally with this Benjamin who is chosen through divine destiny.

Where, do you think, except in the churches? “In the churches bless God, the Lord of the fountains of Israel. There is Benjamin a youth in ecstasy of mind.” (Ps. 68: 27–28)

Nevertheless each one must first make of his thoughts and desires a synagogue rather than a church.

You know well that a synagogue means “congregation.” Church means “convocation.”

It is one thing to drive some things together in one place without the will or against the will; it is another to run together spontaneously by themselves at the nod of the one who commands.

Insensible and brute beings can be congregated but they cannot be convoked.

Yet even a concourse of rational things themselves must occur spontaneously at a nod in order rightly to be called a convocation.

Thus you see how much difference there is between a convocation and a congregation, between church and synagogue.

Therefore if you perceive beforehand that your desires are becoming devoted to exterior delights and that your thoughts are being occupied with them incessantly, then you ought with great care to compel them to go within so that for a while you may at least make of them a synagogue.

As often as we gather the wanderings of the mind into a unity and fix all the impulses of the heart in one desire of eternity, what are we doing other than making a synagogue from that internal household?

But when that throng of our desires and thoughts, after being attracted by a taste of that internal sweetness, has already learned to run together spontaneously at the nod of reason and to remain fixed in the innermost depths, then it can certainly be judged worthy of the name of the church.

Therefore let us learn to love only interior goods, let us learn to think often about them only, and without doubt we make churches such as we know that Benjamin loves.

This is the idea of the ecclesia spiritualis.

Everyone must practice the inner gathering in order to be a part of a church that is an ecclesia spiritualis and not an external one.

You see that these monks from St. Victor have a very particular way of thinking which comes close in many ways to the Devoti we have discussed.

On the other hand, they have a different relationship to knowledge overall, to awareness, in that it represents a sort of school of philosophy.

This consideration may lead us now to the typical Western method of meditation or yoga method that we have already discussed in earlier seminars, namely to the Exercita Spiritualia of Saint Ignatius. Carl Jung, Psychology and Depth Psychology, Page 277-290

[1]Psychology of Yoga and Meditation

19 MAY 1939 Lecture 4 Psychology and Yoga Meditation

Last Time we spoke about the symbol of the coniunctio, of the union of masculine and feminine.

As I already explained, we must understand this union on the one hand as the union of conscious and unconscious, for, in this case, consciousness is masculine and consequently the unconscious is feminine since it plays a compensatory role.

Of course, if yoga or medieval hermetic philosophy had been conceived by a woman, then consciousness would be feminine and the unconscious masculine.

In this case, the symbolism would of course be reversed.

But since the whole of ancient mythology and religious symbolism were created by men, then Eastern or Western medieval philosophies are masculine, created by men, who took for granted their own psychic disposition.

Projection takes place quite naively.

But if women were to create such a philosophy they would project their own psychic situation into it, and we would have a completely different symbolism, and even if it were not entirely distinct, it would still be interpreted differently.

I am warning my female audience members so that they don't simply identify with this without further ado, for emphasizing the head is not to be recommended for ladies.

However, the union is also a critical exploration of the differences between the sexes.

Consciousness is a given for the yogi, but the unconscious is simply unconscious to him.

Even though it undeniably exists, he cannot experience it directly within himself. One can only ever experience it through projection.

Whatever is unconscious to me yet is still present, I always see in others.

If I have a beam in my own eye, then I see at the very least the mote in the other's eye and call it a beam.

Or I have a certain opinion of how a woman should be, or how feminine psychology should be interpreted. Where do I get this knowledge from?

Only from myself. It doesn't need to be based on any particular experience. It's already present.

I quite simply project this, in the very moment I begin to interpret.

That's how the (to me) unconscious feminine shows up in the female counterpart.

Consequently this exploration breaks into two parts: first there is the engagement with the projected content unerringly found in a female being.

And second it is extended into other female beings. This is the materia, from mater, the mother, mother earth.

The mother is the first carrier of this symbol of the feminine, which I describe as anima.

Thus, the first projection naturally appears in the mother and later is extended onto matter, hence the name materia.

This is the same as what the East calls mâyâ.

Generally it is translated as illusion or delusion but comes from the root “ma,” i.e., to build, hence mâyâ is the building material.

Whatever I can touch and perceive is mâyâ.

It is a real illusion, an illusion that has become actual.

So Tantric yoga calls this stuff of the world the distinctiveness of God’s thoughts.

The East thinks from inside out, not from outside in as we do.

We go from apparent reality and think about what is a given, but in so doing we fail to consider even once that even the boldest physicists have not yet discovered what sort of dark things this matter is made from.

The expression materia points to the fact that the unknown, the unconscious, was projected onto this material, and hence the medieval natural philosophers tried to fathom the secret of the unconscious from the way matter behaved.

Hence chemistry has many expressions such as sublimation or affinity.

These are in fact psychic measures. Affinity is elective and is projected into matter.

The process of sublimation is a process of evaporation where a solid or fluid component is converted into a volatile substance.

Freud unwittingly borrowed this description from chemistry.

As you see, these expressions can also be applied psychologically because they were originally carried over from the psyche unconsciously.

Thus, looked at rationally, this alchemical idea of seeking the secret of the unconscious in matter is utter nonsense, but from a psychological standpoint is quite meaningful.

The alchemists were seeking the secret of the unconscious in the materia, in mother.

They took the next step into the realm where one could now discuss psychology. Then the materia turned back into mother.

She is simply the first carrier of the symbol of the unconscious, of the feminine unconscious.

That is why we also find symbols of incest in alchemy, that brothers or sisters or sons commit incest with their mothers, because this process represents the coniunctio between conscious and unconscious.

You also find the same idea again in Freudian psychology, where Freud made a myth out of it, a mythological idea: the idea of primal incest.

The bringing together of conscious and unconscious is of course an absolutely understandable matter from a rational perspective, but practically it is a completely outrageous problem, and in this section of the series of symbols we have the whole of the dark portion, which is difficult to understand and impossible to explain in a few words.

Here we encounter the whole muddle and confusion of human life.

If I might give you a good example showing you both forms of the coniunctio in experiential form, then it is Goethe's Faust:

The confrontation with the projected unconscious in Faust 1: Faust and Gretchen. This is the object level.

Here he lives his projection, and the tragic end gives him that shock which causes him to reintegrate back into himself the image he had projected into Gretchen, which was filled with the entire secret of his creative being.

It appears to him again in the form of Helena. Helena is not a feminine figure to be encountered in life, but rather the classical anima figure of Antiquity.

She represents what he had first projected into Gretchen in a pure form.

In the second part of Faust where he contends with Helena, he also confronts the nature of the unconscious.

This problem manifests in various levels right up to the highest degree, the Mater Gloriosa.

He unites with the unconscious, as if interfused with it.

Here we find that absolutely extraordinary story in which he reappears after death among an angelic boys' choir.

He has, as it were, become a child again, carried toward maturity by the apparition of Pater Seraphicus.

A symbolic motif pertains to this confrontation, the union with unconscious totality, that we haven't yet encountered in the series.

Namely, this union has a remarkable consequence: in the Gretchen tragedy the biological union leads to a pregnancy and in time a child is born.

This ordinary event becomes essential symbolism in alchemy, which is not present in the Eastern series.

Such is the secret pregnancy, the soul pregnancy. The poets speak of such things.

Now I have no wish to compete with the poets, but I would like to observe that this soul pregnancy is a singular soul state of creative latency.

One also obverses this in people who do not exactly give birth to a Faust, yet it is it a peculiar soul relationship.

This state is always quite perilous for the individual.

(11) That is why here in the Tantric symbols series, we have the vihâra, which in the hermetic philosophy is the domus thesauria or vas hermetis.

There is a particular soul relationship, the symbol of enclosure, of protection, the cloister on the summit of the mountain, walled-in many times, the so-called treasure chest (thesauria) in which is contained the priceless thing, the sealed container that must not be opened, so that what is contained within it does not escape.

This is the protected, hidden state resonating with the state of the child in its mother's womb.

(12) The child thus born, as we noted in relation to alchemy, results from the union of consciousness with the unconscious.

It represents a new being. In alchemy it is the homunculus, the tiny man, in Greek anthrōpárion.

This tiny man is often depicted as consisting of metal, of gold. Or it is a transparent being, ethereal, a being of light.

It is clearly the illumined human in embryonic form.

We find this motif in the second part of Faust where Wagner succeeded in creating a homunculus in a retort.

He flies around and finally shatters on the throne of Galatea because he has dissolved into flames:

Nereus: Here in the middle of all this host, what new revelations are we to see?

A flame by the conch, at my daughter's feet, Now mounts high and strong, now burns sweet and low, as though it were stirring with pulsations of love.

Thales: That is Homunculus, whom Proteus has taken …

Those are the symptoms of passion's imperative—I almost can hear the loud groans of its travails He'll shatter his vial on her glittering throne—there's the flame, there the flash, and already it empties!

The same thing happens to the boy Wagenlenker and the Euphorion, the son of Faust and Helena. These too go up in flames because they chase after the girls.

I see in these figures the danger of covetousness, of being too much influenced by the environment and by projection.

The quasi-monastic protection is designed to keep these dangers at bay from within and without so that the child can mature.

This remarkable symbolism is also Christian. Christ is also worshipped as a child, an infant.

In one hymn, Mary is compared with a sea flower.

A water flower, growing up out of the water, holding Christ in its lap.

Or as a sea flower in which Christ settles as a sea bird.

We find the same symbol in Mahâyâna Buddhism where the Buddha is enclosed in the lotus blossom.

Whoever has achieved enough merit will have their soul enclosed in a lotus blossom for countless aeons.

Then it blossoms one day in the miraculous kingdom of the Amitâbha.

This is the child being raised from the coniunctio. In Chinese, it is a diamond being.

In medieval philosophy it is the incorruptible body, the subtle body, which is seen as the result of this coniunctio.

These remarkable ideas all point to the basic idea of the man of light, which we all know from gnosticism.

For this man who is born is an illuminating being, comparable to the diamond or gemstone.

The grail is also a gemstone in Wolfram von Eschenbach.

Its personification is Christ, Buddha, or, in India, purusha, i.e., the primal man who is to some extent within everyone.

Later we will encounter this purusha when we discuss Patañjali’s Yoga Sûtra.

This new being reveals that this is an autonomous existence, which is not the same as the I, this latter being in this case only masculine.

The feminine counterpart is the unconscious.

The psychic result of this union is not another masculine I, but rather a different being, firstly a child.

This child goes through a certain education and development, as of course does the I.

For to the extent that this second personality develops, the I dissolves.

According to the description in Indian texts, it is as if consciousness dissolves its ties to objectivity, as if abstracting itself from it, from its attachment to objects, so that it almost appears content-free.

This becoming conscious of something, of no longer being attached to it, is described in English quite aptly as awareness.

In Indian it is described as samâdhi, i.e., rapture or ecstasy. The Greek word ékstasis in fact means rapture.

In fact this state is not unconscious, although certain texts compel us to assume that it is a question of unconsciousness, because consciousness is so disconnected from objectivity that it is virtually empty.

But one must be conscious of something, otherwise one cannot be conscious at all.

In Buddhism this emptying is taken so far that an unconscious state arises called the void, shûnyatâ: the absolute void.

Of course, that is a contradictio in adjecto. I cannot be conscious of the absolute void.

But Eastern philosophy doesn’t fret over these nuances.

The next thing we can fathom about these peak states with our Western knowledge is a far-reaching disengagement of consciousness from its contents.

There is a very fine Chinese text about this in the Secret of the Golden Flower, which says in poetic language what is also described in Indian yoga.

The Hui Ming King says of this letting-go:

A halo of light surrounds the world of the law.

We forget one another, quiet and pure, all-powerful and empty.

The emptiness is irradiated by the light of the heart of heaven.

The water of the sea is smooth and mirrors the moon in its surface.

The clouds disappear in blue space; the mountains shine clear.

Consciousness reverts to contemplation; the moon-disk rests alone.

A better image of this letting-go of consciousness can hardly be found.

I have simply selected this text in order to describe this singular state of consciousness.

I do not want to conclude these two series of symbols without explicitly drawing your attention again to the fact that these final levels in the creation of the Self's reality, achieved by this union or coniunctio, that these levels are very mysterious, and that a great deal of psychological experience is required to make any sense of these things.

I would not dare to mention these things in a public lecture, or even to spell out these things in published literature.

If a commentary upon them were ever undertaken, then it would only be very incomplete.

And for good reason.  Western man is a good philologist, but he has no clue about yoga experiences.

One must have already spoken to the people themselves, the practitioners, in order to pursue these practices.

What we get to see in this country are acrobats, not philosophers.

From what practitioners recount and what the texts say, a rough picture emerges, which is in fact the psychic event of yoga.

And there one discovers things that apparently we have never dealt with.

If we go back in our Western history we do find parallels, but these have died out since the Enlightenment in the eighteenth century, becoming unpopular.

Nonetheless, if one pursues practical psychology, one is simply compelled to engage with these matters.

And in that spirit we will conclude this particular series of symbols.

I'd like to return once again to the Yoga Sûtra, which I covered superficially last semester.

I'm selecting certain key ideas from this exceptionally comprehensive text that are relevant here.

These are four texts by an ancient classical Indian philosopher, the chief philosopher of ancient Indian yoga. It is assumed that he is one and the same as the grammarian Patañjali.

You know that India does not have a written history.

The only historical dates we have about India come from the Buddhist chronicles, aside from which there are no historical records.

We learn from certain evidence in the writings of Patañjali that he lived in the second century BCE.

This comes from a battle report dating from 150 BCE. The texts are very difficult.

For Sanskrit specialists they are a particular puzzle.

But the most difficult thing is the interpretation of how these texts should be understood, so I will confine myself to only a few statements.

The aim of yoga as Patañjali formulates it is the promotion of the samâdhi, contemplation, rapture.

There is another word: dhyâna, i.e., the state of extasis, rapture in an active sense. Samâdhi is contemplation in the passive sense.

Therefore the goal of yoga is so-called rapture.

Hauer translates samâdhi as enfolding, i.e., introversion. This is the main goal.

The other is a correlate, namely the diminution of the so-called compulsions, the kleshas, i.e., of the instincts, the drives.

The kleshas are: ignorance (ávidyâ), egoism (asmitâ), attachment (râga), aversion (dvesha), and the fear of death (abhinivesha)

Ignorance is the field where the other forces of corruption develop, … [YS 2.4, p. 45] I.e., all these compulsive drives are based upon ignorance.

For Ignorance is misperceiving permanence in transience, purity in impurity, pleasure in suffering, an essential self where there is no self [YS 2.5, p. 45].

Ignorance comes down to esteeming or believing in the non-eternal, the impure, and suffering, all mistaken for being eternal, sensual, and the Self.

That is why all those things are desired.

These kleshas must be overcome through dhyâna, through meditation, because they are the roots of karma, that is, the way in which one lives leaves a remnant, a life’s outcome or karma, that fills one’s existence and causes one’s rebirth accordingly.

So if one has achieved no merit in this life and has accumulated suffering, then that bad karma will entail a corresponding fate in the next existence.

Remarkably, in Buddhism the dominant belief is that karma is not personal in nature.

I can accumulate merit in my life, but because I do not have a soul, when my life ends my karma survives and requires a new existence.

This already fascinated the ancient monks, and so they asked the Buddha about it.

Buddha left the answer absolutely open as to whether this survival of karma means a continued personal existence after death or not.

He leaves the question open as to whether karma is not potentiality created by my life, causing another life that is absolutely not connected to me.

On the other hand, one must recall that in his discourses the Buddha always spoke of his pre-existences as if he had always been the same.

Yet in the end one can also understand that what remains was always karma and not one's own soul.

I would like to inform you of certain fundamental teachings of the Yoga Sûtram. Sûtra means text or tract.

The translations you will find on the one hand in Deussen's History of Philosophy, in Volume 1, part 3.

A newer translation which is more psychological in many aspects, i.e., more differentiated but actually less clear, is by Hauer in his text: Der Yoga als Heilsweg [Yoga as a path of healing].

The style is very difficult, as the texts are themselves exceptionally difficult.

I will now translate once again so you can see what it's all about:

The non-differentiation of the representations of Sattvam and the Purusha, both these being absolutely different, is enjoyment.

Hauer translates "the 'consumption of the world' by the 'man-in-himself.' "

He means that if the two are not differentiated, the world is consumed by the purusha.

Through application of total discipline upon one's own interest, which is different from the other's interest, knowledge of the Purusha is achieved.

This concerns the differentiation of the purusha and the sattvam.

I will go into the meaning of these words:

3.35: According to Deussen:

The non-differentiation between the representations of sattvam (as proponent of the prakriti) …of the prakriti which encompasses the external nature and the psychic apparatus (cittam) and which consists of the three gunas: sattvam, rajas, and tamas—… and of the purusha, which are both absolutely distinct, is pleasure [and suffering]:—knowledge of the purusha is achieved by the application of total discipline upon one's own interest [i.e., the purusha] which is distinct from the other's interest [i.e., the prakriti]. [YSD 3.35, pp. 532–533].486

According to Hauer:

"Man-in-himself" and the "luminous world substance" which forms the organ of the mind are eternally unalloyed.

The "consumption of the world" by the "man-in-himself" is made possible by the fact that "luminous world substance" and "man-in-himself" are not differentiated in the conscious mind.

One acquires knowledge of the "man-in-himself" through application of total restraint for the purpose of this consumption for the "other" and one's own distinct purpose. [YSH 3.35, p.108]

According to Vivekananda:

Enjoyment comes by the non-discrimination of the very distant soul and Sattva.

Its actions are for another: Samyama on this gives knowledge of the Purusha.

According to M. A. Oppermann:

Experience is the unclarity of the mitigated perception of "sattva" and "purusha" which are absolutely separate; this joy is for another; knowledge of "purusha" arises through "samyama" upon itself.

An accompanying note:

"Purusha" in pure sattva reflects and animates the same; sattva, thus called into life, believes that all experiences which it has are to be attributed to him.

Through this muddled identification of the two, all experiences are made possible at all.

All experiences through which sattva believes itself to be enriched are useless to it and serve only the "purusha."

Every action of prakriti, being the basis of sattva, and which cannot be without "purusha," are for the "purusha."

Hence sattva functions not for itself, but, as the text says, for another.

Hence, it is correct to say that "samyama" applied to itself, to its own nature and destiny, leads to knowledge of the “purusha.”

Is a body becoming spirit something which we can confirm from experience, has it ever happened? (2021-12-13 03:24)

[paypal _donation _button border="5"]

It has been conceded, from the days of the very early Church, that the body of Mary was also taken up into Heaven.. the only material thing in the celestial spheres.

[1]Black Books

We will now turn to the real Jesuit Meditation of the Fundamentum as it is practised in the exercises.

I will again give you some examples from Przywara’s book "Deus semper maior", as he gives us a profound insight into Jesuit meditation.

He also begins with: "man was created" or rather with man and asks himself: "what is man?"

As you saw in the case of the meditation on the Anima Christi, Przywara thoroughly investigates almost every word.

He says: "Mensch ist Geistwerdung des Leibes" (man is body which becomes spirit) and that he is "Leibwerdung des Geistes" (spirit which becomes body).

We must ask ourselves here: can we accept this point of view?

Is a body becoming spirit something which we can confirm from experience, has it ever happened?

It is, of course, confirmed in the dogma of the Church, the corpus Christi became spirit, it became the glorified body of Christ.

And though it does not belong strictly to the dogma, it has been conceded, from the days of the very early Church, that the body of Mary was also taken up into Heaven, where it became a glorified body, the only material thing in the celestial spheres.

Przywara ’s meditation is founded on these teachings of the Church but, if we regard the matter from the psychological point of view, we cannot rely upon the dogma but must ask ourselves is there any psychological experience which would justify or prove body becoming spirit?

I must say that I could not bring any direct proof that such a process is possible.

I do not mean can the body be transformed into spirit but is there any experience of which we could say that it felt like the transformation of the body into spirit.

We say sometimes that a man looks like a ghost or a spirit but that just means he looks pale, thin and interesting but that has nothing to do with flesh becoming spirit.

But there is something which can be proved from everyday experience, not body becoming spirit, but body becoming conscious, man becomes conscious of his body.

We know from medical experience that many people are quite, or very nearly, unconscious of their bodies.

They do not know that they have certain bodily weaknesses and have no idea what they look like.

I have even had pathological cases that had to look at themselves in the mirror before they could utter a word.

And people often do not realise when they are hungry or cold, and treat such simple facts as if they were psychological problems, or live in a very foolish way because they have no idea what they are doing.

Such people really have no experience of their body, so consciousness of the body is no matter of course.

Every one knows theoretically that he has a body, but gymnastic teachers tell us that many people have no idea of their own physical existence and how they really breathe; whereas other people are quite conscious of this and of how they hold themselves and what their muscles are doing.

We must have a psychic image of the body, in order to become conscious of it, we must translate the physical fact of the body into a psychic experience.  Carl Jung, ETH Lectures, 19th January, 1940, Page 220-221

He is no hero who never met the dragon, (2021-12-14 04:14)

[paypal _donation _button border="5"]

Naturally there is an enormous difference between an anticipated psychosis and a real one, but the difference is not always clearly perceived and this gives rise to uncertainty or even a fit of panic.

Unlike a real psychosis, which comes on you and inundates you with uncontrollable fantasies irrupting from the unconscious, the judging attitude implies a voluntary involvement in those fantasy-processes which compensate the individual and —in particular—the collective situation of consciousness.

The avowed purpose of this involvement is to integrate the statements of the unconscious, to assimilate their compensatory content, and thereby produce a whole meaning which alone makes life worth living and, for not a few people, possible at all.

The reason why the involvement looks very like a psychosis is that the patient is integrating the same fantasy-material to which the insane person falls victim because he cannot integrate it but is swallowed up by it. In myths the hero is the one who conquers the dragon, not the one who is devoured by it.

And yet both have to deal with the same dragon.

Also, he is no hero who never met the dragon, or who, if he once saw it, declared afterwards that he saw nothing.

Equally, only one who has risked the fight with the dragon and is not overcome by it wins the hoard, the "treasure hard to attain."

He alone has a genuine claim to selfconfidence, for he has faced the dark ground of his self and thereby has gained himself.

This experience gives him faith and trust, the pistis in the ability of the self to sustain him, for everything that menaced him from inside he has made his own.

He has acquired the right to believe that he will be able to overcome all future threats by the same means.

He has arrived at an inner certainty which makes him capable of self-reliance, and attained what the alchemists called the unio mentalis. Carl Jung, CW 14, Para 756

[1]Encounters with C. G. Jung: The Journal of Sabi Tauber (1951–1961)

Introduction

About this Edition

"I am handing you my journal," Sabi Tauber is reported to have said to her son Christian in the spring of 1984.

"Do with it whatever you please.  You can burn it or, if you think it could be valuable for others, you can publish it after my death."

Obviously she had no objection to publication; on the contrary, she simply did not want to burden anyone with it.

Burning was certainly never an option.

Sabi also left a copy of her journal to her daughter-in-law, Marianne Tauber, who resides in the USA; she might translate it into English and then, if she should wish, have it published someday.

As trustingly as Sabi handed over her journal to her son, Christian Tauber handed it to us in 2016, asking whether we could imagine doing the editing.

He saw it as a continuation of the transcription work we had done on Winterthur Colloquies published in 1999.

A brief, initial glance at the densely typewritten pages was enough to realize that the document held real pearls - many eternally authentic teachings of C. G. Jung.

These teachings had not only been helpful to the journal's author.

They would also be an inspiration to a wider public, who, with the help of Jung's knowledge of the unconscious, is tracing the great questions of humanity.

What Jung has to say, for example, about the meaning of the shadow for the continuity of our culture, should not concern us less today than it did then.

The document is extremely valuable, not least because fewer and fewer people remain that can still give such an authentic account of Jung as a human being, as a man.

The pathway from the raw typescript to this book, however, would turn out to be long and challenging.

It seemed sensible to us to coordinate the German and English editions, since at that point, the English translation by Marianne Tauber was already well on the way.

As soon as the idea of a bilingual edition was welcomed by the entire Tauber family as well as by the Foundation of the Works of C. G. Jung, the project could really take off.

Sabi Tauber's journal integrates the recordings of the aforementioned discussion evenings, where C. G. Jung answered questions within a relatively small circle of the Tauber family's friends. Parts of these recordings were already published in 1999 under the title, C. G. Jung, Ober Gefuhle und den Schatten.

Winterthurer Fragestunden (On Feelings and the Shadow. Winterthur Colloquies).

At that time, the text was accompanied by three CDs with the original audio recording.

However, the publication had been out of print for some time.

In November 1998, in the foreword of the textbook of the abovementioned publication, Christian Tauber wrote: "In October 1955, C. G. Jung visited Sabi and Ignaz WauberScheitlin in Winterthur for the first time.

Within the family circle, each of us five children was allowed to ask Jung a personal question.

When he returned, on May 26, 1956, the circle of attendees had been extended by three couples, with whom they were friends.

During his third visit, on May 29, 1957, ten more acquaintances and relatives joined, and someone recorded Jung’s answers on tape; unfortunately, the recordings were incomplete.

It was not until his fourth visit, on June 27, 1957, that I was in possession of my own tape recorder, and, with Jung’s explicit consent, I was able to record all the questions and answers.

On March 3, 1961, Jung’s state of health no longer allowed him to travel to Winterthur, so the last question and answer session took place at his home in Kusnacht - without a tape recorder.

An initial question would be presented to Jung in the car, as the hosts were picking him up in Kusnacht or Bollingen.

All other questions developed in the moment during the course of the evening. [ ... ]"

The Winterthur Colloquies are being republished here; and for the first time they now appear in English.

A revision wasn’t considered necessary, even if, after today’s editorial review, perhaps minor Introduction linguistic corrections would be made and a few more comments added in footnotes.

The division into chapters and titles (On Feelings, On Redemption, On New Symbols, On Projections, On the Shadow, On Psychological Insights) were added at the time by Walter-Verlag.

They remain unchanged to help the reader recognize the identity of the recordings.

They reappear here in their original chronology.

The question of what form Jung’s statements should take was a bit of a challenge for the present volume.

At times, Sabi Tauber wrote her notes during a discussion with Jung.

Probably more often, however, she made them immediately afterward, so they can’t be regarded as actual quotations.

The same applies to Ignaz Tauber’s notes, also found in this volume.

He made them as a follow-up to a particularly meaningful meeting with Jung. Consequently, where no audio recordings exist, quotes in quotation marks seemed inappropriate and illegitimate.

In the English translation, Sabi’s quotation marks were kept in place, which can be justified as far as every translation of a text into another language is a subjective judgement call.

Importantly, what Jung said to Sabi shall not be understood as literal quotations.

This does not mean that we found any reason whatsoever to doubt the accuracy of the recorded content of Jung’s statements.

We decided to distinguish Jung’s words from Sabi’s questions, either by offsetting them visually or by marking them as "commentary."

Sometimes we used indirect speech, and other times we appealed to the reader’s feeling to apprehend who is speaking.

Because Sabi - an abbreviation of Elisabeth - carried her affectionate pet name throughout her life, we would like to refer to her that way as well.

Preserving the atmosphere of Sabi Tauber’s journal entries was particularly important to us.

They naturally reflect her own personal way of experiencing, which we would like to honor with the utmost respect.

This also includes the fact that we have only made compelling linguistic improvements.

Of course, the dialogues in Swiss dialect were noted by Sabi in High German; nevertheless, the colloquial language cannot be ignored. In order to preserve the character of journal entries, we have only very cautiously adapted them to High German.

We find it, especially in the case of Jung, quite refreshing to hear his own way of speaking.

At times, considering today’s understanding, Jung’s wording is not politically correct.

However, we need to keep in mind that he lived in a time when people spoke in a certain way, and that it was one of his outstanding qualities to call things directly by their name.

Terms like "negro," "primitive," or "archaic" are examples of what was considered acceptable use of language at the time.

When we look contextually it becomes obvious that far be it from Jung to make derogatory or racist remarks. J Jung’s writings, letters, seminars, and even this publication give ample demonstration of his high esteem for those we now respectfully refer to as indigenous peoples.

So, for the sake of historical accuracy, we abstained from adjusting his wording.

We have added numerous comments in footnotes, many of which establish the connection of C. G. Jung's spontaneous utterances to his collected works.

Some simply provide the reader with useful additional information.

The footnotes of the two editions are naturally not completely identical, but rather have been aligned to the extent that the German- and English-speaking reader now hold essentially the same book in their hands.

We have placed particular emphasis on treating the private matters of all persons addressed as sensitively as possible.

Biographical Notes

Sabi lived from 1913 to 2001.

She was born Elisabeth Scheitlin, in Winterthur, on August 27, 1913. She had two sisters, seven and thirteen years older.

She spent most of her life in the small, proud industrial city of Winterthur.

Her mother, Emma Scheitlin-Steinbruchel, was a devoted housewife and an excellent cook.

She loved the arts and cultivated her talents in embroidery and sewing.

She enabled her daughter Sabi to take lessons in music theater and rhythmics with the then-famous Mimi Scheiblauer in Zurich, who was one of the pioneers in introducing rhythmics as a learning tool in remedial education.

Later on, Sabi placed great emphasis on musicality and body movement in the education of her own children.

All of her five children learned to play an instrument, and daily practice was just as much part of everyday life as brushing their teeth.

Sabi loved playing the piano.

When she played Bach's Italian Concerto, for example, and her children danced to it, she was thoroughly delighted.

Music gave her a lightness that helped her endure hardship.

Sabi's father, Emil Scheitlin, held a significant position as a mechanical engineer at Sulzer AG in Winterthur.

In 1936, he received an honorary doctorate from the ETH Zurich (Swiss Federal Institute of Technology) for his significant inventions.

He was the inventor of the so-called Sulzer steam turbine.

When Sabi was one year old, he took on an attractive job in Petrograd (St. Petersburg).

The family moved with him to Russia, where they experienced challenging years from 1913 to 1917.

When the outbreak of the revolution forced them to return to Switzerland, the mother and the three girls traveled ahead.

On the way home from Petrograd, via Finland and Sweden, Sabi fell ill with scarlet fever and had to spend several months in the hospital in Stockholm.

As a result, she suffered from a heart valve disease that wasn't recognized until she was about forty years old.

The original title of Sabi's journal was "Wind in My Face."

The title referred to an unforgettable childhood experience that connected her to her father: On several occasions she had the opportunity to experience with him the inauguration of a new steamboat on one of the Swiss lakes.

She used to love to sit on the ship bow and watch how the water parted.

She loved to feel the wind blowing in her face.

Much later in life she remembered feeling the same fresh breeze in her face whenever she met C. G. Jung.

Sabi was thirty-two years old when she first met Jung in Rapperswil, in 1945, at a lecture for the Medical Society of the Canton of Zurich.

It was in the coat room. Jung's hat had fallen to the ground.

When she leaned forward to pick it up, Jung did the same, so their heads bumped together.

Jung said, laughing: "Wow, you have a hard head!" Sabi replied: "And so do you!" Maybe it was during the lecture that Sabi felt the desire to talk to Jung in person?

Sabi was burdened by family tensions from the time her father got involved in an extramarital relationship.

The much younger woman lived with the family: the marital couple and their three daughters.

In the beginning, at least, her father’s mistress was appreciated by everyone, but later was ostracized as "the temptress."

After Sabi’s mother passed away, the mistress became the wife of the 80-yearold.

At the time, Sabi was without doubt friendly towards her father’s second wife, and she may have always possessed a conciliatory eros.

Yet, her eros was seriously put to the test once more in her own marriage.

At a young age she swore to herself to never start a family, to never get married and have children.

Fortunately, fate had other plans.

Right at the beginning of her medical studies she met Ignaz, who radiated vitality.

Ignaz dreamt of having at least twelve children, and soon his life-spark also ignited Sabi.

Ignaz was born in Alexandria, Egypt, on December 28, 1907.

He was the son of Bernhard and Amelia Tauber-Luzzatto.

He had a twin sister and five other siblings.

His paternal ancestors were Jews and came from Czernowitz, today’s Chernivtsi, in Western Ukraine.

His father Bernhard completed a successful military career before turning to a career in diplomacy.

As consulate councilor of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, he was sent off to Alexandria, a vivid and cosmopolitan city at the time.

Ignaz would have lasting memories of the Arab nannies that punished him and his siblings with horrific stories of demons.

And even though he suffered from nightmares, his soul felt a deep, lifelong connection to the Egypt of his childhood days as well as the country’s ancient mythology.

His wish or urge to write a research paper on Egyptian mythology is mentioned several times in Sabi’s journal. - During World War I the family had to leave Alexandria.

After yearlong stays in Rome and Cologne, the Taubers were finally able to settle in Switzerland.

The once wealthy family had suffered great losses.

Ignaz had to complete an apprenticeship as a commercial clerk.

Later he took evening classes to attain the qualification for university entrance (matura), before he could finally begin studies in medicine.

Sabi for her part wanted to become a medical doctor in order to help poor families in India.

When registering at the University of Zurich, she met Ignaz - though it wasn't their first encounter: the Tauber and Scheitlin families had previously met in 1923 during their vacations in the mountains.

After their engagement, she gave up her own career aspirations.

They married in 1935, and throughout Ignaz' time as an assistant doctor she went along with him to various destinations.

Their children were born between 1937 and 1950: Roswith in 1937, Jurg in 1938, Christian in 1942, Lotti in 1944, and Marianne in 1950.

Sabi took the initiative to find a home for the expanding family.

She succeeded, and in 1942 they were able to move into their house on Salstrasse in Winterthur.

It offered enough space for the large family, and for Ignaz's medical practice on the ground floor.

A little anecdote from that time, the early 1940s: A bookseller friend of theirs from Winterthur sent a new book release to Dr. Tauber for review: The Psychology of C. G. Jung, by Jolande Jacobi.

Sabi returned it immediately: no interest.

The book was sent to them twice more, the third time it sat around the house until it was too late to send it back.

Ignaz became strangely fascinated by the book and began reading it, until Sabi took notice and threw it in the trash.

Ignaz bought another copy and secretly continued reading it at night.

One day, Sabi's curiosity was finally aroused, and she began to read it as well.

They were both hooked.

Ignaz began an analysis with Jolande Jacobi, and Sabi with C. A. Meier.

After that, the Taubers bought C. G. Jung's books and together discussed what they had read - for Sabi it had been something like a "daily service."

When a painful episode broke out in the marriage relationship, necessitating a deeper examination of the unconscious, Sabi wrote to Jung asking if he would take her and her husband into analysis.

Jung had to decline, saying he could no longer take new analysands, but sent Sabi to Barbara Hannah and Ignaz to Marie-Louise van Franz.

For both of them, this was the best thing that could have happened.

In the early 1950s, Sabi and Ignaz started attending the Psychology Club in Zurich, founded by C. G. Jung in 1916.

Jung was often present and gave frequent lectures.

In 1952, with a warm recommendation by Jung himself, the couple became regular members.

From 1977 to 1984 Ignaz Tauber was president of the Psychology Club Zurich.

Here we close our biographical notes on Sabi and her husband Ignaz.

Out of the many recollections of their descendants, we have noted mainly those events that contribute to the understanding of the journal records.

There are still many anecdotes yet to be told, many historical details to be revealed, joys and tragedies to be recalled from this life rich with memorable events.

Let us call to mind that the very biography of an individual is essentially created by the self.

Thunderclouds Over the Marriage

With the help of metaphors such as "stormy clouds" and "a dark cloud from which thunder rolled and lightning flashed," Sabi confides in her journal that her marriage suffers deep turmoil.

She experiences that archetypal forces can interfere in human relationships as powerful natural phenomena.

Ignaz had apparently fallen in love with another woman; Sabi suffers for many long years from this tense and humiliating situation.

Many years later, Sabi retitled the typescript of her journal, "Deja-vu," assumedly because she realized that she needed to endure and suffer in her marriage what she had likewise experienced as a child, albeit from a different perspective.

This time, however, she could share her dreams with Jung.

And Jung recognized that basically, the love entanglements of her husband, which were painful for her, had the potential to set her on her individual path .

What happens to an individual human being cannot be rationalized away if it is orchestrated by the self and not by collective moral concepts: at least not without causing psychological damage.

Anima and animus are not mere theoretical terms, but names of the divine figures operating in the background of such drama.

In Jung's understanding, the anima of a man or the animus of a woman are determining factors that seek to lead individuals to unknown goals in their creative lives.

However, if inadequately comprehended in consciousness, these factors potentially create a disturbance that can develop into an irritating and torturous presence, especially in a marriage.

They begin to act autonomously and cause any number of disruptions.

In the case of Ignaz and the way he experienced his anima, Jung's explanations are real eye-openers.

Jung advised him to focus, by putting down on paper the essence of his work on Egypt, so as not to get lost in intuitions.

This would help a great deal in liberating him from his anima problem.

Jung recognizes that Ignaz is in the grip of the archetype.

However, he does not simply defend him on that account; he also expresses outrage over his tactlessness and cruel lack of feeling towards his wife.

He sees Ignaz' inflation as the cause of this insensitivity.

He explains to Sabi the significance of anima projections and the effect they have, not least, on sexual life.

Jung also does not mince words in regard to Sabi's pronounced animus problem.

She suffers, understandably, from her husband's anima entanglements; nonetheless she herself is called upon to pursue a creative activity.

Not only he, but she, too, has to take on a creative task, even though she is already occupied with caring for five children.

For this reason, he supports her participation in a group he has put together for further research on synchronicity. (See below.)

Sabi possibly sensed something of this mystery early on, but had yet to understand, by way of her own suffering, that the conflict is rooted in the self.

Sabi is noting here core ideas of Jungian psychology.

Only if we recognize this great arc of psychic reality, that is, if we are aware of the presence of divine figures in marriage, can we understand why Sabi, sometime later in her life, almost feels a kind of gratitude that Ignaz did not spare her such difficulties.

The love problem formed the prima materia for her individuation process, to put it in alchemical words.

Transference to Jung Sabi is soon destined to experience for herself what it means to be seized by archetypal forces.

Quite obviously, she has a so-called "transference" to Jung.

Or, as we like to say: The god Eros has hit her and made his incomprehensible demands on her.

Jung encouraged her not to evade, but to allow herself to be overwhelmed by that which is greater than herself.

For, so says Jung, without being gripped, a person could have no deep experience coming from such an encounter; there would be no effect and ultimately no value.

Sabi registers Jung’s comments and interpretations of her dreams, she writes poems full of longing and makes warm-hearted paintings of her encounters with him.

Hardly by chance, Sabi records the words of C. G. Jung on the cover of her journal, from his biography Memories, Dreams, Reflections (chapter "Late Thoughts II"):

"There is no better means of intensifying the treasured feeling of individuality than by the possession of a secret which the individual is pledged to guard."

The mystery of her life - or should we say the myth of her life? - is her soul’s encounter with C. G. Jung.

Occasionally, in the journal, she calls him the "old wise man" or "guru."

While this may sound somewhat effusive to today’s ears, it was undoubtedly a truth for her.

Sabi indeed experienced in Jung the psychopompos, the guide of her soul.

He was a guru for her, that is, the personification of an archetypal figure with superhuman charisma and irresistible appeal.

Jung, for his part, explicitly refused to accept the role of guru, as we read in Sabi’s journal.

But he was clear about the function and effect of this significant projection: The conscious experience and such enduring deep emotion can bestow meaning upon one’s entire life.

Due to his enormous experience, Jung was able to keep the door open to Sabi during those tumultuous years, while, at the same time, remain on guard so as not to identify himself with the Old Wise Man.

He was acquainted all too well with the dangerous side of any identification with the archetypal reality.

When at one point Jung explained to Sabi that, in that specific moment, he was a god to her - which may cause some readers to be appalled, or to shake their heads in dismay

- Jung alludes exactly to this numinous quality of a love projection.

Throughout his life, Jung tried to find words for this mystery, although he knew that, ultimately, there are no words.

Over his lifetime he dared to interpret, although he knew perhaps better than anyone else that there are only hints, only verbalizing aided by analogies.

In his book, The Psychology of Transference, not published until 1946, C. G. Jung admits that the transference phenomenon is so complicated and various that he lacked the categories for a systematic account.

He therefore preferred to draw upon the symbolism of the alchemical opus.

Here, he had found an adequate language for the otherwise inexpressible.

He concluded that the innermost essence of transference is the uniqueness of a life individually lived.

Transference belongs to that kind of processes, which nobody can grasp from outside, but which, on the contrary, holds the individual concerned in its grip.

With a lot of personal courage and self-honesty, Sabi Tauber took upon herself all that was visited upon her - but that she had not sought - by fate.

Accompanied carefully by Jung, it was possible for her to experience the transference to him, and thereby sense the meaning-giving dimension encountered in this relationship.

The following words are from Sabi’s last journal entries: "He has shown all of us the possibility of creating culture out of transference.

Not a complete sacrifice is required, but a transformation! [ ... ] Not to the beyond belongs our purest love, but into our living hearts on this Earth."

1. G. Jung’s Interest in Oracle Methods

One of the longer passages yet to be mentioned in Sabi’s journal, for which a few explanations may make many a reader grateful, addresses Jung’s occupation with various oracle or divination methods.

Jung and Sabi discuss several geoscopes as well as tarot card spreads, and often they would add a hexagram of the / Ching.

We reproduced the sketches photographically to preserve the original character of the material they studied together.

Anyone who makes the effort to understand Jung’s resulting comments in detail will be amazed at the astonishing connections he makes and will certainly find them rewarding.

However, it is not so easy to find one’s way through these passages, and often the reader might wish to learn more from Jung than can be found in the shorthand of Sabi’s notes.

The question arises: Why and in what way did C. G. Jung pay so much attention to divination (to geomancy and the tarot, in addition to astrology and the Chinese oracle of the I Ching)? Our anticipated answer: Apparently, he was interested in "synchronicity." But why?

And what does that entail?

Jung refers to synchronicity as a meaningful coincidence or correspondence of two events, which are not causally connected.

Or, in other words, as a coincidence of subjective and objective facts which cannot be explained causally, but which convey the feeling that a latent meaning exists.

Sabi Tauber quotes Jung in her journal: Synchronicity "doesn’t work causally, but meaningfully, and only when deep emotion is involved!"

The terms "meaning" and "meaningful" are important here.

In his most relevant essay on this topic, "Synchronicity: An Acausal Connecting Principle," C. G. Jung specifies that "meaning" is the essential criterion of the synchronicity phenomena; but what comprises the meaningful factor is beyond our recognition.

Nevertheless, Jung wanted to find suitable methods by which the reality of the collective unconscious could be objectively determined. He postulated the existence of an organizing archetype, the archetype of the self, to which he also ascribed the property of unified psyche and matter.

Jung was engaged in the question of the psychological conditions that he suspected behind synchronistic events.

When he came across the Chinese / Ching, he encountered, for the first time, an entire religious philosophical system that did not characterize linear relationships by cause-and-effect, as is so prevalent in the West, but rather described synchronistic phenomena.

His acquaintance with Richard Wilhelm, translator of the I Ching: Book of Changes, must have been one of the most significant in Jung's life.

Thanks to Wilhelm, Jung gained access to synchronistic thought, which he understood as complementary to the causal thinking of the West.

The classical Chinese way of thinking does not consider the question of why something happens, or which factor causes what effect, but rather, "what likes to happen together in a meaningful way in the same moment," to use Marie-Louise von Franz's terminology in On Divination and Synchronicity: The Psychology of Meaningful Chance.

These were the connections that fascinated Jung.

He wanted to know if the same kinds of connections were also observable in geomancy, the tarot, and, last but not least, in horoscopes.

1. G. Jung had an immense interest in astrology, which is extensively documented in Liz Green's book Jung's Studies in Astrology. Prophecy, Magic, and the Qualities of Time, published in 2018.

Early in life he had already calculated his birth charts.

In his Red Book he repeatedly illustrates the signs of the zodiac.

Throughout his entire body of work, he constantly refers to his psychology in relation to the Platonic age, notably in the Visions Seminar, held from 1930 to 1934 (published in 1998), and in Aion: Researches into the Phenomenology of the Self, one of his major works.

Even though Jung had rounded off his book on synchronicity by including a preface in 1950, in no way had he considered his research on the subject to be complete.

Synchronicity phenomena continued to preoccupy him, perhaps more than ever.

This becomes clear from numerous letters of the 1950s and also from the here present journal records (1951 to 1961).

This is where we learn of a group of people who were asked to collect data for Jung, empirical facts for a research project.

This group consisted of Sabi Tauber, Linda Fierz-David, Jung's daughter Gret Baumann, Hanni Binder, the latter two of whom were experienced astrologers, and others.

It appears Jung hoped to gather as many synchronistic occurrences as possible; he wanted to present a kind of "proof" to substantiate his hypothesis on the reality of the collective unconscious, and ultimately, the unity of psyche and matter.

Basically, he wanted nothing less than to shed light on a still obscure field, which to him was of the greatest philosophical importance, as he writes in the preface to his essay on synchronicity.

He sought to appraise modern science of his ideas on the living reality of the archetype.

At one point, at a colloquium at the Tauber's in Winterthur, he explains why for him astrology had its justification:" ... because there exists an objective psyche." To substantiate this was his great concern.

In this context, we can now understand the task Sabi Tauber was given.

It consisted of interviewing hospitalized accident patients about how they assessed their psychological state or emotional condition before or during the accident.

Did they remember dreams or extra-sensory perceptions or anything of that sort? (According to Christian Tauber, there is an archive of one hundred respective cases still waiting to be processed.)

Jung wanted to explore whether a possible synchronistic coincidence could be discerned related to the accident, or, as we might say today, a specific unconscious conditioning factor, a constellating archetype.

When he and Sabi brooded over tarot cards and geoscopes – and although these sections may seem of little use to some readers of the journal - we should be aware that Jung's search centers on the great range of questions surrounding synchronicity.

The same holds true for the fact that when he encouraged Sabi to write a paper on the

I Ching and her astrological research.

It was not because Jung was looking for a method to predict the future! It was even his explicit intention to revise the paragraphs on astrological experiments in his publication on synchronicity, because he was always misunderstood.

He expresses this, for example, in a letter to Prof. Markus Fierz, February 21, 1950 (Collected Works, vol. 18).

Jung knew very well that parapsychological phenomena could not be proven by applying probability theory - otherwise such phenomena would be causal.

In a letter to Prof. Hans Bender, director of the Institute for Frontier Areas of Psychology and Mental Health, on February 12, 1958, Jung states that his question was aimed at the psychic conditions of their occurrence, and he would abstain from coming up with a semi-physical energetic explanation.

Nothing could be explained at all by giving such phenomena names like telepathy, clairvoyance, precognition, psychokinesis etc.

Jung's interest in the connection of psyche and matter goes very far back, in fact all the way to this student days, when from 1895 onward, he participated in spiritualistic seances.

Now when, in 1951,Sabi quotes Jung in her journal: "In addition, there was the problem of soul and body," a problem also alluded to in his essay "Synchronicity: An Acausal Connecting Principle," published in 1952, we learn something about the psychological burden brought upon him by these questions.

His whole life long he attempted to shed light on a mystery that he later called unus mundus, in reference to the alchemist Gerhard Dorn.

A few additional comments need to be made in regard to geomancy, which Jung discussed with Sabi.

(For technical details about how to create a geoscope, see the notes in the text.)

Here also, Jung is less interested in fortune-telling than in the exploration of the archetypal background.

In her book On Synchronicity and Divination, in which Marie-Louise von Franz captures the depth of the entire issue, she calls geomancy a "terrestrified astrology."

We also refer to her book Number and Time, in which she details the geomancy technique and its significance for Jungian psychology.

Our account of Jung's work on synchronicity brings our introduction to a close, with one further note.

It remains to point out the great distress caused to Sabi by the research assignment given to her by Jung.

As hard as she tried, her journal states, she often felt overwhelmed by the complexity of the subject matter.

There are differing accounts among her descendants as to whether this was why Sabi plucked up the courage one day to write to Jung and ask for an audience, or whether it was rather the agonizing marital situation that was the motivation.

Whatever the reason, it can be said with certainty that Sabi's journal begins with Jung's answer to her letter, in which he offers her an appointment and describes the way from Bollingen station to his tower.

Sabi gained a very private access to Jung, as it were through the back door - metaphorically and quite literally - just through the hidden wooden door of the tower of Bollingen.

Art and the Zürich School (2021-12-15 04:04)

[1]Red Book

Art and the Zürich School Jung’s library today contains few books on modern art, though some books were probably dispersed over the years.

He possessed a catalogue of the graphic works of Odilon Redon, as well as a study of him.

He likely encountered Redon’s work when he was in Paris.

Strong echoes of the symbolist movement appear in the paintings in Liber Novus.

In October of 1910, Jung went on a bicycle tour of northern Italy, together with his colleague Wolfgang Stockmayer.

In April 1914, he visited Ravenna, and the frescos and mosaics there made a deep impression on him.

These works seemed to have had an impact on his paintings:  the use of strong colors, mosaic-like forms, and two-dimensional figures without the use of perspective.

In 1913 when he was in New York, he likely attended the Armory Show, which was the first major international exhibition of modern art in America (the show ran to March 15, and Jung left for New York on March 4).

He referred to Marcel Duchamp’s painting Nude Descending a Staircase in his 1925 seminar, which had caused a furor there.

Here, he also referred to having studied the course of Picasso’s paintings.

Given the lack of evidence of extended study, Jung’s knowledge of modern art probably derived more immediately from direct acquaintance.

During the First World War, there were contacts between the members of the Zürich school and artists.

Both were part of avant-garde movements and intersecting social circles.

In 1913, Erika Schlegel came to Jung for analysis.

She and her husband, Eugen Schlegel, had been friendly with Toni Wolff.

Erika Schlegel was Sophie Taeuber’s sister, and became the librarian of the Psychological Club. Members of the Psychological Club were invited to some of the Dada events.

At the celebration of the opening of the Gallery Dada on March 29, 1917, Hugo Ball notes members of the Club in the audience.

The program that evening included abstract dances by Sophie Taeuber and poems by Hugo Ball, Hans Arp, and Tristan Tzara. Sophie Taeuber, who had studied with Laban, arranged a dance class for members of the Club together with Arp.

A masked ball was also held and she designed the costumes.

In 1918, she presented a marionette play, King Deer, in Zürich. It was set in the woods by the Burghölzli.

Freud Analytikus, opposed by Dr. Oedipus Complex, is transformed into a parrot by the Ur-Libido, parodically taking up themes from Jung’s Transformations and Symbols of the Libido and his conflict with Freud.104 However, relations between Jung’s circle and some of the Dadaists became more strained.

In May 1917, Emmy Hennings wrote to Hugo Ball that the “psycho-Club” had now gone away.105

In 1918, Jung criticized the Dada movement in a Swiss review, which did not escape the attention of the Dadaists.106

The critical element that separated Jung’s pictorial work from that of the Dadaists was his overriding emphasis on meaning and signification.

Jung’s self-explorations and creative experiments did not occur in a vacuum.

During this period, there was great interest in art and painting within his circle.

Alphonse Maeder wrote a monograph on Ferdinand Hodler and had a friendly correspondence with him.

Around 1916, Maeder had a series of visions or waking fantasies, which he published pseudonymously.

When he told Jung of these events, Jung replied, “What, you too?”

Hans Schmid also wrote and painted his fantasies in something akin to Liber Novus.

Moltzer was keen to increase the artistic activities of the Zürich school.

She felt that more artists were needed in their circle and considered Riklin as a model.110

J. B. Lang, who was analyzed by Riklin, began to paint symbolic paintings.

Moltzer had a book that she called her Bible, in which she put pictures with writings. She recommended that her patient Fanny Bowditch Katz do the same thing.

In 1919, Riklin exhibited some of his paintings as part of the “New Life” at the Kunsthaus in Zürich, described as a group of Swiss Expressionists, alongside Hans Arp, Sophie Taeuber, Francis Picabia, and Augusto Giacometti.

With his personal connections, Jung could easily have exhibited some of his works in such a setting, had he so liked.

Thus his refusal to consider his works as art occurs in a context where there were quite real possibilities for him to have taken this route.

On some occasions, Jung discussed art with Erika Schlegel. She noted the following conversation:

I wore my pearl medallion (the pearl embroidery that Sophie had made for me) at Jung’s yesterday.

He liked it very much, and it prompted him to talk animatedly about art—for almost an hour.

He discussed Riklin, one of Augusto Giacometti’s students, and observed that while his smaller works had a certain aesthetic value, his larger ones simply dissolved.

Indeed, he vanished wholly in his art, rendering him utterly intangible. His work was like a wall over which water rippled.

He could therefore not analyze, as this required one to be pointed and sharp-edged, like a knife.

He had fallen into art in a manner of speaking.

But art and science were no more than the servants of the creative spirit, which is what must be served.

As regards my own work, it was also a matter of making out whether it was really art. Fairy tales and pictures had a religious meaning at bottom. I, too, know that somehow and sometime it must reach people.

For Jung, Franz Riklin appears to have been something like a doppelganger, whose fate he was keen to avoid.

This statement also indicates Jung's relativization of the status of art and science to which he had come through his self-experimentation.

Thus, the making of Liber Novus was by no means a peculiar and idiosyncratic activity, nor the product of a psychosis.

Rather, it indicates the close intersections between psychological and artistic experimentation with which many individuals were engaged at this time.  Sonu Shamdasani, The Red Book, Page 203-204

This is why it is almost impossible to translate the term "unconscious" into Hindi. (2021-12-15 04:06)

[paypal _donation _button border="5"]

[1]Psychology of Yoga and Meditation

One must take it like breathing exercises, as a technical matter.

It has nothing to do with religious preaching. All these hatha yoga exercises are means of achieving the state of emptiness.

It is the sinking into what we describe as an unconscious state, but which in the East is described as a higher consciousness. Purusha is a super-consciousness.

This is why it is almost impossible to translate the term "unconscious" into Hindi.

There is a term: bodhi, i.e., enlightenment, a higher or super-consciousness, an extended superhuman consciousness, namely the consciousness of purusha.

Now here in the West we have some medieval parallels with this concept, namely in Meister Eckhart. In his meditation "On the Abandonment of Things" he says:

People say: "O Lord, how much I wish that I stood as well with God, that I had as much devotion and peace in God as others have, I wish that it were so with me!"

Or, "I should like to be poor," or else, "Things will never go right for me till I am in this place or that, or till I act one way or another.

I must go and live in a strange land, or in a hermitage, or in a cloister."

In fact, this is all about yourself, and nothing else at all.

This is just self-will, only you do not know it or it does not seem so to you.

There is never any trouble that starts in you that does not come from your own will, whether people see this or not.

One's own will, this self-seeking to which Meister Eckhart refers, this is Western language; to be precise, this is the I, certainly not the purusha, but the self-seeking of Western consciousness.

We can think what we like, that a man ought to shun one thing or pursue another-places and people and ways of life and environments and undertakings-that is not the trouble, such ways of life or such matters are not what impedes you.

It is what you are in these things that causes the trouble, because in them you do not govern yourself as you should.

Therefore, make a start with yourself, and abandon yourself.

These matters are prakriti. The I-consciousness that one should abandon is sattvam.

Truly, if you do not begin by getting away from yourself, and abandon yourself, wherever you run to, you will find obstacles and trouble wherever it may be.

People who seek peace in external things be it in places or ways of life or people or activities or solitude or poverty or degradation-however great such things may be or whatever it may be, still it is all nothing and gives no peace.

People who seek in that way are doing it all wrong; the further they wander, the less will they find what they are seeking.

They go around like someone who has lost his way; the further he goes, the more lost he is.

Then what ought he to do?

He ought to begin by forsaking himself, because then he has forsaken everything.

This is self-abandonment. If I abandon sattvam I have also abandoned all things with it (prakriti).

If I succeed in differentiating between the egoic consciousness within me, which is naturally always bound to objects, and the objects themselves, then it is possible to reach the purusha.

Truly, if a man renounced a kingdom or the whole world but held on to himself, he would not have renounced anything.

What is more, if a man renounces himself, whatever else he retains, riches or honors or whatever it may be, he has forsaken everything.

About what Saint Peter said: "See, Lord, we have forsaken everything" (Mt. 19:27)-and all that he had forsaken was just a net and his little boat-there is a saint who says: "If anyone willingly gives up something little, that is not all which he has given up, but he has forsaken everything which worldly men can gain and what they can even long for; for whoever has renounced his own will and himself has renounced everything, as truly as if he had possessed it as his own, to dispose of as he would."

For what you choose not to long for, you have wholly forsaken and renounced for the love of God. 534

One has abandoned it for God’s sake, that is, for the sake of the purusha.

That is why our Lord said: "Blessed are the poor in spirit!" (Mt. 5 :3 ), that is, in the will.

And no one ought to be in doubt about this; if there were a better form of living, our Lord would have said so, as he also said: "Whoever wishes to come after me, let him deny himself" (Mt. 16:24), as a beginning; everything depends on that.

Take a look at yourself, deny yourself. That is the best of all.

You should know that there was never any man in this life who forsook so much that he could not still find more in himself to forsake.

There are few people who see this to be true and stick by it.

This is indeed a fair exchange and an honest deal: By as much as you go out in forsaking all things, by so much, neither less not more, does God go in, with all that is his, as you entirely forsake everything that is yours. Undertake this, and let it cost you everything you can afford.

There you will find true peace, and nowhere else.

So this contemplation is a direct parallel with this Yoga Sutram.

But it is in a Western sense parallel with our exceptionally egoic consciousness.

The West is combined in a way with the prakriti, which was never the case in the East.

When compared with our consciousness, Eastern consciousness is darker.

We would say that of course. An Eastern man would certainly not say that, for when compared with what he is conscious of, we are in the dark.

Meister Eckhart has another term related to this: the concept of detachment.

This is directly a differentiation between purusha and sattvam.

In a very illuminating sentence, he says in his meditation about detachment:

I have read many writings of heathen philosophers and sages, of the old covenant and of the new, and have sought earnestly and with diligence which is the best and highest virtue whereby a man may knit himself most narrowly to God and wherein he is most like to his exemplar, as he was in God, wherein was no difference between himself and God, ere God created creature.

And having approfounded all these scriptures to the best of my ability, I find it is none other than absolute detachment from all creatures.

As our Lord said to Martha, "unum est necessarium " which is as good as saying, He who would be serene and pure needs but one thing, detachment.

Our doctors sing love’s praises, as did St. Paul, who said, "Whatsoever things I do and have not charity I am nothing."

But I extol detachment above any love.

First, because at best love constrains me to love God.

Now it is far better my constraining God to me than for me to be constrained to God.

My eternal happiness depends on God and me becoming one; ...

This the union with the purusha.

[ ... ] but God is apter to adapt himself to me and can easier communicate with me than I can communicate with God. Detachment forces God to come to me, and this is shown as follows.

Everything is fain to be in its natural state.

But God’s own natural state is unity and purity and these come from detachment.

Hence God is bound to give himself to a heart detached.-Secondly, I rank detachment above love because love constrains me to suffer all things for God’s sake: detachment constrains me to admit nothing but God.

Now it is far better to tolerate nothing but God than to suffer all things for God’s sake. For in suffering one has regard to creatures, ...

This is the prakriti .

. . . whence the suffering comes, but detachment is immune from creature. Further, that detachment admits of none but God I demonstrate in this wise: anything received must be received in aught.

But detachment is so nearly naught that there is nothing rare enough to stay in this detachment, except God. He is so simple, so ethereal, that he can sojourn in the solitary heart. Detachment then admits of God alone.

That which is received is received and grasped by its receiver according to the mode of the receiver; and so anything conceived is known and understood according to the mind of him who understands and not according to its innate conceivability.

And humility the masters laud beyond most other virtues.

I rank detachment before any meekness and for the following reasons.

Meekness can be without detachment but complete detachment is impossible without humility.

Perfect humility is a matter of self-naughting; but detachment so narrowly approximates to naught that no room remains for aught betwixt zero and absolute detachment.

This is the void or shunyata.

Wherefore without humility is no complete detachment.

Withal two virtues are always better than one.-Another reason why I put detachment higher than humility is this: humility means abasing self before all creatures and in that same abasement one goes out of oneself to creatures.

But then man is trapped once again in the prakriti through humility.

But detachment abideth in itself. Now no going out however excellent, but staying in is better still.

As the prophet hath it, "omnis gloria filiae regis ab intus," the king’s daughter is all glorious within.

Perfect detachment is without regard, without either lowliness or loftiness to creatures:

it has no mind to be below nor yet to be above; it is minded to be master of itself, loving none and hating none, having neither likeness or unlikeness, neither this nor that, to any creature; the only thing it fain would be is same.

But to be either this or that it does not want at all. He who is this or that is aught; [ ... ]

So as you see this is prakriti.

[ ... ] but detachment is altogether naught. It leaves things unmolested.

Here someone may object, But surely in our Lady all the virtues flourished in perfection and among them absolute detachment.

Now granting that detachment is better than humility, why did our Lady glory in her lowliness instead of her detachment, saying, "quia respexit dominus humilitatem ancillae suaeJJ: "He regarded the lowliness of his handmaiden?"

I answer that, in God there is detachment and humility as well, so far as virtues can be attributed to God.

Know, it was his loving meekness that made God stoop to enter human nature while it remained within itself as motionless, what time he was made man, as it was while he created the heavens and the earth, as I shall show you later.

This describes the mixing and at the same time the detachment from the purusha, the droplet on the lotus leaf. In this way God entered into creation without being affected by it in his innermost.

And seeing that Our Lord when he chose to be made man did persist in his motionless detachment, by the same token did our Lady know that he expected her to do the same, albeit for the nonce he had regarded expressly to her lowliness and not to her detachment.

So remaining unmoved in her detachment she yet gloried in her lowliness and not in her detachment.

Had she but once remembered her detachment to say, "He regarded my detachment," her detachment would by that have been disturbed and would not have been absolute and perfect since a going forth has taken place.

Any event, however insignificant, will always cause some troubling of detachment.

There you have the explanation of our Lady’s glorying in her lowliness instead of her detachment.

Quoth the prophet, "audiam, quid loquatur in me dominus deus," "I will be still and listen to what my God may be saying within me," as though to say, if God would parley with me then he must come in for I will not go out.

It is Boethius who exclaims, "Ye men, why do ye look without for that which is within you?  Carl Jung, Psychology Yoga Meditation, Page 235-239

Purification of the senses: (2021-12-16 03:25)

A [paypal _donation _button border="5"]

[1]Psychology of Yoga and Meditation

Purification of the Senses:

As one desires a precious object by exclusive means of which one can acquire merits the purification and mental transmutation of all the aggregates the elements, and the functions of the various organs of the senses into Devata furnish such an object. [SCST, p. 8]

When one succeeds through active imagination in making the various intellectual and sensory functions autonomous by saying: seeing is not my function but rather it is a devata, i.e., an autonomous being, then this is a great gain. Now what is the psychological benefit of such a way of behaving?

That is hard to discern.

We have already encountered the idea that one should imagine the four basic functions of our consciousness as Buddha, and thus as a being in our consciousness, as if the various functions were beings in their own right.

If you imagine this, then it boils down to the idea that through this imagination, every psychic action is transformed into a distinct entity: the process of imagination, of thinking, feeling, etc., this is a distinct entity. In this way the entire character of the psychic process is somehow objectified, it takes on a life of its own.

With it, the activity is sort of distanced from consciousness.

If you imagine that the thinking of the I is no longer your own activity but an autonomous being, then the entire psychic process is completely cumbersome as if I were to dissolve myself into separate parts.

I delegate the parts.

I must sort of call upon the gentleman who represents thinking:

Please say this and that, or upon the young woman who represents feeling:

Please smile now.

In this way, one empties oneself of these functions.

One no longer has them.

One pushes them away. Instead of being a personality one is now an entire theater represented by a troupe of actors who are these distinct functions.

The whole personality, all my functions, are paraded before me as autonomous figures.

Through this I have become completely empty.

One achieves that with this meditation, and that is also the purpose, that emptiness, shunyata is created and one finally owns nothing any longer.

Everything is external, it is "the others."  Carl Jung, Psychology of Yoga and Meditation, Page 96-97

Excerpts from "Animus and Anima" by Emma Jung (2021-12-16 04:04)

[paypal _donation _button border="5"]

[1]Animus and Anima by Emma Jung

One of the most important ways that the animus expresses itself in a woman is in making judgments, and as it happens with judgments, so it is with thoughts in general.

From within, they crowd upon the woman in already incomplete, irrefutable forms.

Or, if they come from without, she adopts them because they seem to her somehow convincing or attractive.

But usually she it is no urge to think through and thus really to understand the ideas which she adopts and, perhaps, even propagates further.

Her underdeveloped power of discrimination results in her meeting valuable and worthless ideas with the same enthusiasm or with the same respect because anything suggestive of mind impresses her enormously and exerts an uncanny fascination upon her.

This accounts for the success of so many swindlers who often achieve incomprehensible effects with a sort of pseudo-spirituality.

On the other hand, her lack of discrimination has a good side; it makes the woman unprejudiced and therefore she frequently discovers and appraises spiritual values more quickly than a man, whose developed critical power tends to make him so distrustful and prejudiced that if often takes him considerable time to see a value which less prejudiced persons have long recognized. The egg, the vessels and the words. From Izdubar to Answer to Job (2021-12-16 06:48)

[paypal _donation _button border="5"]

[1]Christian Gaillard - The egg, the vessels and the words. From Izdubar to Answer to Job1

The egg, the vessels and the words: From Izdubar to Answer to Job; For an imaging thinking by Christian Gaillard, Paris [Translated from the French by Anita Conrade]

Abstract: This essay on The Red Book seeks to underscore a characteristic specific to Jung's approach to psychoanalysis. In this book, and more generally, in all of his writings, Jung's thinking is based on his personal experience of the unconscious, in which he leaves himself open to progressive encounters. Some of them, in the years 1913–14 and 1929–30, particularly his meeting with the giant Izdubar, were quite threatening.

As a result, he forged an original way of thinking that is qualified here as 'imaging' and 'emergent'. The Red Book served as the first vessel for theories Jung would later express. His way of thinking, with its failures and semi-successes, all of which are always temporary, of course, is compared to the art of the potter.

The author shows the kinship between the formation of the main Jungian concepts and the teachings of the French poet, professor, and art critic Yves Bonnefoy. He also considers certain recurrent formal themes in the work of contemporary German painter and sculptor Anselm Kiefer.

Lastly, this epistemological study, constantly aware of the demands of Jungian clinical practice, demonstrates the continuity in Jung's work, from The Red Book to Answer to Job, where Jung ultimately elaborated a conception of history that defines our ethical position today.

The first time I opened Jung's Red Book, and every time I return to it, I find one particular thing striking, whether I am looking at the handwritten pages or those more especially devoted to images.

It is, of course, the presence of figures: the characters and other creatures, both human and not. However, I must say that I am especially intrigued by and sensitive to the consistency of the scenes in which these characters are engaged.

Figures and configurations

In classical terms – classically Freudian terms, in this case – one might observe that The Red Book shows Jung's remarkable figuration skills2 his capacity to represent a caterpillar, a serpent-dragon, a tree, a giant, a volcano, a flower, a diamond or a star, a big boy, a sage, a warrior, an urban or rural landscape, a fortress . . . .

But that would be missing the point. For The Red Book is unique. Were we to search the entire catalogue of psychoanalytical literature for a similar book, it would be in vain.

And if we narrow our scope to the body of Jungian writings, the few good sources we would find deal with the observation and study of insistently present, progressive figures, whereas works that develop an analysis of the configurations, the scenes showing such strongly organized, structured, progressive interactions are found far less frequently, and not often enough, in my opinion.

It was a great step forward for analytical psychology when, with and after Jung, we made a distinction between an archetype and an archetypal figure.

Likewise, we would progress in both our thinking and our clinical practice if we changed the focus of our attention from the figure, character, or presence we tend to describe as archetypal to a scene which could also be considered just as typical, in the organization and interaction it displays, and particularly in the structural dynamic of its progression and its transformations.

Since I have just mentioned figuration, configurations and interactions, let us consider two pages from The Red Book. In my opinion, they are good representations of the characteristics that distinguish the Jungian approach from any other, in the psychoanalytical movement.

The first is a calligraphic transcription of a dialogue. The passage in question is truly a dialogue, and is quite obviously rendered as such by the handwritten transcription on the page (fig. 1. A dialogue with Izdubar).

Two characters are playing out a scene. The first person singular, or ‘I’, is conversing with a second figure, and as we shall see, their dialogue can also be a conflict or even a combat.

Fig. 1. A dialogue with Izdubar (RB p. 36)

The second page, even more visually and clearly, shows a scene, and soon, we shall see how it evolves and changes

Obviously, this is a picture of Izdubar. But why is he named ‘Izdubar’?

Sonu Shamdasani informs us, or reminds us, that for some time, the name Izdubar was given to Gilgamesh. He also notes that Jung mentions the Gilgamesh epic in his 1911–1912 edition of Wandlungen und Symbole der Libido5. We have then here a window onto what Jung was reading: his sources and company. But why on earth isn’t this character named ‘Gilgamesh’ here?

Everyone would immediately be able to identify him. Whereas ‘Izdubar’ is a much rarer and lesser-known name.

The crux of the matter is, from the first pages of this Book, a de-nomination effort is underway. By de-nomination, I mean the loss, abandonment, or even the deconstruction of names that had hitherto been more familiarly used.

True, the figure we see here comes from some source – visibly Mesopotamian, then, to judge by his closeness or kinship to Gilgamesh, or to an analogous figure from the mythologies we are acquainted with.

But here, by losing his usual name, the figure also loses the story we know, perhaps the story of his origins. He is freed. He lives his own life.

By presenting himself as Izdubar, under a new and unfamiliar name8, he is detached from the realm of what we have already known, seen and heard. For both Jung and the reader, he acquires a new presence, a presence that makes itself practically native and, as we shall see, with a will of its own.

Fig. 3. The volcano burst (RB p. 64)

Right before our eyes, from the outset, on the page, in dialogue, we have an approach to working with the unconscious that treats it as a living reality, surprising, rushing, for which we can learn to make room, with which we must learn to reckon and, when necessary, which we must also confront.

From there, let us take one more step, from late December 1915 to February 1917, and from page 36 of The Red Book to page 64

The primitive, caveman-like creature we saw before, wearing his animal skins and carrying a club in his right hand, has given way to a new image: an explosion of fire and flame.

It is an erupting volcano, shattering the earth's crust, as the magma from deep below leaps out. And yet, according to the text, this is Izdubar, once again.

This illustration shows him after he has escaped from the egg that was supposed to contain him. Or perhaps he has been released from a bottle. Certainly, some of us remember stories of genies imprisoned in lamps.

I must say, I myself was fascinated by the stories in the Arabian Nights as a child. I read and reread them, even before reading Grimms' Fairy Tales.

De-nomination, dis-figuration, and disproportion

Only the fiery event we see here isn't even a genie. In any case, it's not the type of genie who is bound to obey, who can be put back in his bottle – which is an egg, in this case – or who can be made to grant wishes, like the genies in the tales we read as children.

Moreover, not only is the creature in the image nameless, unidentifiable – we shall gradually pay more attention to all the repercussions of this work of de-nomination – but it barely even has a form.

It is entirely fire and flame, power and energy, out of all human proportion and reach. Indeed, in the image, de-nomination is paired with deformation. In other words, the loss, lack, or failure of words and names is doubled by a shattering of the shapes that would make it possible to recognize familiar territory, to know where one is.

De-nomination and deformation lead all the way to dis-figuration. How can what is presented be contained? How can it be shaped properly?

How can it be named, in order to understand? Answering these questions is quite a struggle. Jung struggled. And after him, so do we.

This is an important question. For what is at stake is the identification of what one is dealing with.

We have touched one of the themes of the Book, one that is among the most insistent, in my eyes. It is therefore related to 'disidentification', leaving the subject voiceless and lacking any sufficiently familiar representation.

But let us look even more closely at the two plates which have given us pause; let us compare them (figs. 2 & 3).

This time, let us pay attention not only to figures or objects represented in the picture, but also to the way they stand in relation to each other, as a configuration, or a whole.

Let us examine them as scenes in a drama, and make an effort to perceive their dynamic and the issues being worked out.14 In order to contemplate the scene as a whole, I suggest that we remove our attention from the centre. From the somewhat crude, brutal, paleolithic figure dominating the first plate, and the burst of fire consuming the second, let us move our attention to the tiny little man in each image. In the first scene, he kneels on the lower edge, his arms outstretched.

In the second, we find him again, bowing until his head almost touches the ground. Disproportion reigns.

De-nomination, dis-figuration, disproportion: the situation is extremely critical, even physically, to judge by the threatening gap that is evident between the enormous, explosive force we see, and the tiny creature, the little human being, who appears to be trying to disappear.

We wonder how he could ever succeed in rising again, or even raising his eyes. This gap and disproportion are aggravated by the defeat of representations and knowledge, likely to leave very little room, or perhaps no room at all, for belief – which says, or claims to say, what is going on, who is doing what. Belief names and shows, and therefore informs, or would like to inform, who or what we are dealing with, and how to go about it (Gaillard 2011a).

Where can we be headed, at that rate?

To the very worst The next step takes us to one of the most surprising encounters in the Book, doubtless the most terrifying (fig. 4. The Horrible Being).

Here the problem is not only de-nomination and dis-figuration, but a veritable de-formation that even leads to the totally formless. Jung went there, and so did some others.

In fact, some of them never came back. We might think of Nietzsche, Holderlin, and many more. Still others have indeed attempted to find themselves there, and to give this encounter a slightly more approachable face – and here, I am thinking in particular of Nicholas of Flue, who was so marked by the visions he had in the solitude of his hermitage that his face was twisted, until the moment when, finally, he was able, or believed he was able, to recognize the teachings of the Church of the moment on the Trinitarian God (Jung 1933; von Franz 1987).

In this regard, it is appropriate to speak not only of surprise – which remains one of the indications that one is indeed dealing with the unconscious – but even of fear, and even horror. Horror, because one is dealing with the ground, the ground so deep it may be bottomless (Urgrund, one may say, in German), Fig. 4. The horrible being (RB p. 123) practically impersonal, and as a result, practically inhuman, where in most cases, we are very careful not to venture. But this is the ground, this Urgrund, Jung was interested in exploring.

The venture is fraught with ambivalence, not only in relation to past teachings, especially religious ones, that have surveyed the territory, but also the most disturbing advances in contemporary arts.

There is a work by the Swiss painter Peter Birkhauser, which Jung commented on in one of his last books (fig. 5. Peter Birkhauser, The Fourth Dimension).

Here is what Jung wrote:

Water is flowing out of the mouth of the big face at the top, through the city. In fact, if we believe the indications supplied by the emphatic nostrils and abnormally wide eyes, this face is only conditionally human.

Of the other four faces, the only indubitably human one is the one at the top on the left. Another face, at the bottom left, is only obscurely recognizable. (Jung 1958, para. 737; see also von Franz 1964)

In 1932, then shortly after he finished The Red Book, Jung recalled such encounters in relation to contemporary art when he discovered Picasso's work, at a retrospective in the Kunst Haus in Zurich, and also when, the same year, he felt compelled to express his thoughts about the impact Joyce's novel Ulysses had upon him – and us (Gaillard 1998, 2006, 2010a; Rowland 2005).

Likewise, shortly afterwards, when he discovered and explored the illustrations and writing of the alchemists, he recalled what he had experienced, written and then calligraphed and painted between 1913 and 1929/1930.

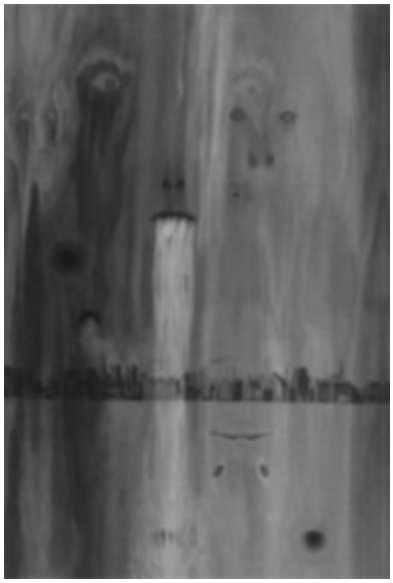

Fig. 5. The Fourth Dimension

Peter Birkhauser (Wertenschlag 2009)

In these two fields, that of contemporary arts, particularly the works of Picasso and Joyce, and that of the illustrations and writings of the alchemists, Jung recognized his own experience throughout the years when he had devoted himself to his Red Book, as well as the experience he had to accompany so many times in his clinical practice: the struggle that, in addition to being capable of dispossessing you of all your knowledge, may also literally, and more than savagely, demolish you.

There is a well-known page from a 15th century codex, currently conserved in the Vatican Library, showing a monstrous beast attacking and devouring some miserable human beings, who are striving to fight it, but are only increasingly overwhelmed in the struggle (fig. 6 Cod. Pal. Lat. 1066, folio 239).

Let's associate it with the plate from The Red Book which also deals with a struggle, a dreadful combat (fig. 7. Wrestling with the snake).

What is required or threatened here is a veritable dismemberment.

Soon, Jung discovered that the alchemists, as well as many Asiatic traditions, were aware, like him and before him, of the 'shattering' a person may experience. To express this, Jung uses the German word 'Zerstuckelung', which literally means 'breaking up'.

Those who experienced this shattering or dismemberment learned that it occurs at certain times or passages, many of which are required steps in the work or process underway.

I will have to return to this concept of process, a process that could well require some critical steps and painful moments.

But, for the time being, in order to progress towards that point, I shall skip forward in the Book, all the way to the final illustration (fig. 8. Last plate).

Fig. 6. Cod. Pal. Lat. 1066, folio 239, Vatican Library, Rome (Gaillard 1998, p. 151)

Fig. 7. Wrestling with the snake (RB p. 119)

There is a striking resemblance between this plate and the scene of the erupting volcano.

We see here a sort of ball of fire, or at least, a kind of living star.

The burst or bursting star is surrounded by heads, or rather outlines of heads, or remains of heads.

There is a whole crowd of them, and they seem to be somewhat lost. In any case, they are unfinished.

And we cannot see or hear what they might be saying, what they might very well be saying, about the burst of fire.

Fig. 8. Last plate (RB p. 169)

The scene dates from between 1928 and 1930: 1930 is most probable.

From the time when Jung would abandon the writing and painting of the Book.

After all his previous work on the Book, why did he set it aside at the end of the 1920s?

What work, what other work, did Jung take up in his life and research? What vehicle did he adopt, to replace the Book?

Answering these questions should enlighten us about the issues in his life and work, and by reflection, about the function fulfilled, for a time – a long time, from 1913–1914 till 1928–1930 – by the Book.

Helplessness

It so happens that another German painter and sculptor works with writing, like Jung, as well as paint and other materials. In the late 1970s, Anselm Kiefer produced a series of prints similar in composition to the last image of The Red Book at a decisive moment, a turning point, in his life and work.

In these prints, we see a circle of lost, frightened heads similar to the ones in the unfinished drawing Jung made in 1929–30.

Kiefer's print shows them in a chaos that borders on insanity. The title of this print, and a whole series of similar ones from the same period, is Die Wege der Weltweisheit (Ways of Worldly Wisdom).

Kiefer wrote on them the names of the great minds who had an impact on the history of Western philosophical or religious thought, and on his own thinking, as well. On the print to which I refer, we see Kant, Jakob Bohme, Jean Paul, Eichendorff, Fichte, Kleist, and Holderlin, apparently lost in the crowd of stray, aimless, frightened, ectoplasmic heads. Like zombies lacking strength and voice.

One of the prints even shows . . . our own Carl Gustav Jung, placed by Kiefer in this apparently ghostly company. Poor Carl Gustav! It seems that for Kiefer, the German artist from a younger generation, he has no more consistency than the other faint, empty, obsolete minds of Germanic thought.

Jung is no more help than the other great minds he has solicited in vain.

The contemporary German artist's desperation is so great that when we look at his prints, we can almost hear a mute appeal, inaudible but insistent: 'Is anyone out there? Is anyone still there?'. Someone to talk to – someone who speaks, and who is able to say something even slightly pertinent to the events that are happening, the enormities that loom, that can barely be represented, but that are exploding before our eyes.

The basic and structural kinship between Kiefer's print and Jung's unfinished painting is impressive.

It seems obvious that Carl Gustav Jung and Anselm Kiefer are cousins.

It seems that both of them, and many others with them, evidently, experienced a hope and an expectation that were disappointed, a cry left unanswered, questions without responses: at least, no responses that were not hollow shapes and empty words without body or meaning.

Both searched long and hard, reading and keeping company with good authors, the best minds of the past, from whom they expected a response to their own experience, to their questions – to their efforts to find their own place and role in history.

But for a very long time, they searched in vain. To create their own approach, to complete their individual journey, both Kiefer and Jung had not only to reconsider and reevaluate the past they inherited, but also and especially to seek elsewhere than in the past, which could very well be useless, to make their own way.

Note that we have just leaped forward in time, twice.

The second time, with Kiefer, I have gone outside the time of the book which, let me remind you, is practically closed by the end of the 1920s.

Moreover, the last image in The Red Book, an especially troubling scene, is unfinished. It leads us to wonder why the book ends there, in those years. And it also prompts us to go back to where we left off, in an effort to understand how it arrived at this point, the moment when the Book closes.

Fig. 9. Watering the Flowers (RB p.125)

We recall the first encounter with and representation of Izdubar in 1915 (fig. 2).

In his second appearance, or avatar (fig. 3) he is much more difficult to recognize: in 1917, his powerful fires are flaming from the egg and spreading in space.

But he appears yet another time in the Book, in a painting dated January 1920 (fig. 9 Watering the Flowers).

Here the mood of the scene is entirely different. A curiously dressed man is pouring water down on flowers beneath him, while an Oriental-looking temple floats on a cloud at the top left.

If we follow the first actions and the course of this odd composite character through the Book, we clearly see that he bridges the distance between the encounters and dialogues with Izdubar and the rest of the Book.

Remember, in the first dialogue with Izdubar, the one asking questions was Izdubar, the primitive giant, while Jung, facing him, dispensed knowledge.

What knowledge or ‘science’ could this be? Obviously, it conflicts with belief.

In fact, it has even been qualified as a ‘poison’.

It’s about vessels We must take a closer look at the odd character watering the flowers.

Specifically, we have to examine the flowers growing on the lower border of the scene, as well as the vessel from which the life-giving water pours down on them.

Watering: often, we see that when a life is too dry, when it has been too poor emotionally since infancy, the most important thing to do, and right away, is to water.

Again, the medieval alchemists either understood it already or at least learned it (Fig 10. The Dew of the Alchemists): two people can collect the dew that condenses after night has fallen. It is quite a job, but it can lead to new ways of being, with oneself and with others. In my opinion, the scene is an eloquent representation of the work one can do in the analyst's consulting room.

But how can it be done? It is possible because there is a vessel.

Yet in this Red Book, the Horrible Being we saw is just opposite the scene with the vessel (figs. 4 & 9).

The second image follows the first. It is the answer to it.

And for me, this is the heart of the Book. The Red Book is all about vessels.

There is nothing here about the theories and promises that preach and claim that death gives rise to rebirth, God knows how.

Nor is there any metaphorical play that tells you that when you've sunk to the bottom, you can resurface with a kick of your heels. No.

The Book shows and says that we need a container: a vessel to hold what is presenting itself to us, asking us to live it.

For us and for our patients, our analysands, the container or vessel is ordinarily and primarily the protected, protective space of the analyst's consulting room.

It is the container that is meant for this purpose, with specific rhythms and rules.

We know that Jung continued his clinical practice while working on The Red Book, just as he continued to write and teach using more conventional means of expression, the sort that one expects from an honorable psychiatrist and psychologist.

We also know that he invited some of his patients – or

Fig. 10. The Dew of the Alchemists

(Plate 4, Mutus Liber. Gaillard 1998, p. 159) pupils – to make their own Red Books (Shamdasani 2009, P,.205).

And it is to be noted that was long before psychologists began to use art therapy, the way they do today.

But Jung's commitment to his Red Book was definitely an unusual, extraordinary journey, where he ventured alone.

What is it that made this adventure possible for him? How did he survive?

In fact, The Red Book served as the vessel.

You will note in passing that like the Book, the vase we see in the centre of this scene is also red.

The Red Book was his vessel, because it contains his encounters, all of which had the potential to be overwhelming, and his struggles throughout the years 1913–1914 to 1929–1930.

Within, it enables him to elaborate.

The containing and elaboration are essential, and consist in taking the time and carrying out the actions required by calligraphy and painting.

For though it may be relatively autonomous and spontaneous, the work of figuration does not necessarily and easily yield flowers that sprout and grow thanks to atmospheric conditions, or thanks to the virtues of spring or cosmic influences.

The young plants must be watered. And we know that the gardener's art is made not only of intuition and improvisation.

It also demands ongoing, continual attention and even some learning, in most cases. Actually, the cultivation of one's garden depends on staying in the here-and-now, while looking towards an expected and relatively foreseeable future you are preparing for the garden.

But it so happens that Jung is neither a gardener nor an artist, even though, as we know, he could have dreamed of being one.

Or others dreamed of that career for him.

Hence his interest in, and no doubt his struggles with, the 'art' of the alchemists, and even more with contemporary arts, particularly with the works of Picasso and Joyce.

Today, we know that after 1932, for a dozen years, Picasso was in a severe crisis (Clair et al. 2001). He had dried up, and was for a long time unable to muster the energy or the means to renew himself, to go further – something Jung had clearly seen in the work by Picasso he saw at the Kunsthaus in Zurich.

But we know that after this period, Picasso took off again. His art took off. It was different, of course. But it still involved painting, sculpture, ceramics, or printmaking. For Picasso had to be, and was, an artist.

Jung's paintings are not those of an artist.

Jung had to be a psychologist in clinical practice.

Nevertheless, in 1929/1930, he was quite lost, the way Picasso was in 1932, on the brink of nothingness, unable to go forward.

And he was helpless. He could not go on. He was lost, without a map, without guidance.

He no longer had any father figure to trust. He closed his Red Book, and decided to write something else, differently from in the Book.

The process demanded a different way of working. And of thinking as well.

The ways of a psychologist and analyst.

Although, as we shall see, he still did it in his own way.

So far, we have seen some of the vases in The Red Book, and how the Book served as a formative vase or vessel for Jung: a crucible. Yet, throughout his life, even after The Red Book, Jung thought of his work as that of the potter.

This is what the Book taught him. Making it, he learned to shape his thinking so that it fitted his primary and constant experience of the unconscious – an experience that would always serve as the raw material for his ideas, for his way of thinking.

Thinking that is both imaging and emergent Bachelard gave me the word ‘imaging’. In various writings, particularly in L’eau et les reves (Water and Dreams), Bachelard writes of ‘imaging forces’ (Bachelard 1942).

Then, in La poetique de l’espace (The Poetics of Space), he considers the ‘imaging consciousness’, opening a gateway to thought born of images (Bachelard 1957).

This was Bachelard’s way of working, and God knows it was a productive one.

Nevertheless, he was unable to see that psychoanalysis, particularly as practised and conceived by Jung, offered an even more radical approach to the question.

The idea was to think in an imaging way, thereby rediscovering a type of thinking that one shapes the way a potter shapes the clay.

Recently, I discovered that Yves Bonnefoy, a contemporary French poet, art critic, and pre-eminent professor at the College de France, in a beautiful text entitled Pensée’s detouffee ou d’argile (Thoughts of Fabric or Clay), maintains that ‘making vases helped elaborate if not invent language’ (Bonnefoy 2010, pp. 29, 46).

I was delighted with the find, of course.

We must note, however, that Bonnefoy immediately issues a special warning: ‘Not all pots tell the truth’.

Yes, of course, ‘not all pots tell the truth’: pottery can only be the best possible expression or accomplishment, at a certain time, of something that could not be represented or experienced more entirely, in another way – the Jungian definition of the symbol.

The pottery or vase is there only to give the truth a turn. And this turn, as we know, is only temporary.

It is doomed to obsolescence. With and since Jung, psychoanalysis has enabled a temporary thought to form.

All this thought claims to be is a bridge, a symbolic means of approach.

Strictly speaking, all it is is a means of amplification, a way of recognizing, at a certain time, and always from some distance, something that needs to be recognized (Samuels 2002, pp. 84–85).

So it is often a good idea to renew or break vases, to change the China you inherited, or the China you've been using – at least, if you want to try to be creative in the relationship to the unconscious.

The word 'creative', with which the words 'creativity' and creation' are associated, has now emerged in my writing.

However, they come only after we have also said and found the disturbing, distressing, and even destructive effect of the unconscious.

And only as long as we clearly see that every creation is only approximative, asymptotic, and temporary.

So Jungian psychoanalysis is disturbing. It has little sense of orthodoxy.

And it is even wary of intellectualization – along with aesthetization.26 Because it knows it must keep changing to stay alive; that it is always an unfinished process, something that is still underway. This has puzzled more than one thinker, especially when you want to teach. But we may as well know it, and get used to it.

Another step could broaden the horizons of our perceptions and thinking even more.

Finding a countenance Earlier in this paper, I brought in Yves Bonnefoy, and before him, Anselm Kiefer.

Let's consider these two artists again. Why Yves Bonnefoy and Anselm Kiefer?

First of all, because I have loved Bonnefoy's poetry for a long time, as well as the constant and diverse artistry of Anselm Kiefer.

And also because both of them, like all creative people, apparently, grope for creation, like the potter.

But also I see that, as they do so, they think their creation – or at least they try to. And they teach.

Yves Bonnefoy has been lecturing on poetry at the College de France since 1981.

As for Anselm Kiefer, he has just given a series of lectures at the same institution which means that both have managed to bridge the gap that is sometimes observed between the work of creation and that of thinking (Kiefer 2011)27.

To give further substance to our reflection, let us return to Kiefer, and through him, to Jung.

We saw Kiefer, lost, wandering, wondering, at the end of the 70s, at his wits' end.

At that time, he was struggling to come to terms with destruction, with disaster.

He was born under the sign of disaster, in Germany, in 1945.

He grew up in the period just after the war.

The disaster that surrounded him and shaped him, into which he was born, was not only material.

The war had ruined men, and ravaged a whole culture: its ideals, values, and nearly all of its cultural references.

It devastated an entire world as can be seen in the ravaged landscape of May Bug, Fly.28 Disaster rules.

It pushes the horizon back to the top of the picture.

The land is so cluttered with desolation that there is barely any room left for a little sky. You gasp for air.

And what does it say, at the top, in the distance? A few lines of words can barely be made out.

They resist the thick clods of wounded soil as best they can.

They're the words to a song, a German nursery rhyme: 'Maikafer Flieg – der Vater ist in Krieg – die Mutter ist im Pommerland – Pommerland ist abgebrannt'.

It's a German version of 'Ladybird, ladybird, fly away home', but it's about a May beetle: 'Father's at war – Mother's in Pomerania – And Pomerania is all burned'.

From memory, Kiefer writes the nursery rhyme, a wartime lament, incorporating it into his canvas. So as not to forget, no doubt.

It came to him from far away, from his childhood, or maybe his parents' childhood. One generation after another. A fragile and stubborn memory of lost presences, doomed, death written in filigree on absence.

An anonymous incantation. Kiefer remembers. But his work is still in search of itself, on the brink of itself.

Now a shape that is fairly enigmatic at first appears in his paintings.

It appears to be a rather basic object, but it isn't easy to identify (Palette on a field of ravaged land).

It is roundish. Actually, it is a contour more than a real object, an almost conceptual container, although it is at the same time so exactly, so tangibly, the right size for a human hand, the painter's hand: a form of equilibrium despite the fact that it is off-centre – or perhaps that helps.

It is a Palette, like an eye, watching.

It overlaps the scenes of devastated German land. And its presence effectively contains and measures the disaster, observing it, so that with the painter, steadied by the Palette, we can face it.

In 1916–1918, at Chateau-d'Oex, we recall, Jung was also dealing with a world war, the first one. Three or four years earlier, he had embarked on his Red Book, trying to draw mandalas, which did not turn out to be especially harmonious.

He did not yet call them mandalas, of course.

And he had yet to speak of the self. Kiefer might be surprised that I discuss his Palette this way.

Yet the Palette is at work here, doing what it can.

Like the star in Jung's Red Book (fig. 11. Star and Dragon).

It does what it can to shine and spread its light and balance, circumvented by the elementary violence of the dragon, the archaic, terrifying serpent-dragon – while our world below awaits, in the dark, suggested in a style that is partly Klee and partly Chagall.

But let us note and observe that once it has been set down, Kiefer's Palette lives its own life in his work.

Or at least, it tries to. In fact, Kiefer is searching for his soul, just as Jung was seeking his own from page to page in The Red Book. Seeking the proper place for it.

How to put it in the most proper place.

The Palette would like to forget about the cataclysm (see Palette with Wings).

It flaps its wings. It would like to take flight. To fly away. It would like to be an angel. Kiefer gives it wings.

It does what it can. Actually, it's a bit ridiculous, but touching, and a bit of an ordeal.

Soon, indeed, the Palette is struggling.

The painter does what he can to give it some lift, and yet the Palette must reconcile itself to its weaknesses.

A winged Palette – with black wings, this time – is crashing down to earth, which is Fig. 11. Star and Dragon (RB p. 129) again the devastated German land.

The canvas is called Icarus. A soaring ideal sometimes has trouble maintaining its altitude.

In fact, the Palette appears to be threatened. For example, Palette on Wire, from 1977.

We see the Palette hanging by a thread, the way filmmaker Wim Wenders might have visualized it.

Adding to the sense of impending peril, the imminent fall, Kiefer has painted short flames licking at the thread.

This painting is even more powerful than Icarus, because the fall is not explicit: the myth is not even mentioned.

The fall is felt, expected. Physically. Emotionally.

The painting is as powerful as we might wish.

Even though it teaches us to give up.

For apparently the Palette is suffering.34 It looks like an animal.

Like a wounded bird. Kiefer, who has just learned to paint black wings, is now employing the use of lead. The leaden Palette hangs from a tree, and ribbons made of lead – real lead on the canvas – fall from its body, subjugated by gravity.

This work dates from 1978. In my opinion, it is one of Kiefer's most beautiful of this period.

But flight is not part of it. It is beautiful, without taking flight.

The Palette remembers flight: it has kept the gestures of flight. But it has returned.

Now it struggles, stuck between its impulse to fly, like a bird or butterfly, and the gravity that nails it to the ground.

At this cost, the work took on a body. In fact, the body is in the scene.

Kiefer has entitled this scene Resumptio. There is no such word.

It's a play on Assumptio, the Assumption.

Perhaps Jung would have been surprised to see this treatment of the Assumption, he who was so happy to see the Roman Catholic Church proclaim the dogma of Mary risen to heaven (Jung 1952b).

However, after closing his Red Book, he would surely have recognized the same serious path and eroticism he was able to make out in the arcanes of alchemical iconography.

He too struggled between taking flight and the weight of matter, between sublimation and the gravity of grief as can be seen in The Rosarium (fig. 12).

He would then certainly have recognized the low centre of gravity in this representation of Kiefer's. Gravity can indeed make us flap our wings – thank God – but it is one of the laws of nature.

The meditation and reflection at work here are far reaching. On one level, the painter is meditating and reflecting upon painting, on the meaning of art.

Can painting do anything at all, can the painter be of any help at all, amid the disaster? So as we see here, the painter has also become a sculptor. And he's looking for his words.

I like the way Kiefer shows us flight and grief, so graphically we experience them. And the soul and death.

Here, thought and substance merge and add meaning to each other, without any clue as to which came before the other. But we know that art – the art of the poet, painter, sculptor, and also the musician – endeavours to pierce the mystery.

And so does the art of thinking (see Book with Wings). Let's note and underline here that in addition to being a painter and a sculptor, Kiefer has also published a number of remarkable books, and he is also demanding and creative in the design and printing of the catalogues of his exhibitions (Kiefer 1990).

It is also true that he teaches. The series of lectures he just gave at the College de France was also published in a book of great quality (Kiefer 2011).

Indeed, a book collects and contains, and at the same time, it can be opened, given – or closed again.

With Jung's Red Book, the subject is indeed the art of thinking, of formulating a thought, which also signifies writing, and having someone read.

At least, if one is a psychoanalyst, and especially if one is Jungian.

Then the concepts themselves, arising from experience and theory, seek their proper shape, their most appropriate vessel – groping a bit, as I was saying before.

The way Jung sought his path at Chateau d'Oex, and from one page to the next of his Red Book, which is finally open to us today.

Undoubtedly, Bachelard would have been delighted and mobilized by the discovery of this Book.

He knew so well how to read, and also how to write.

Sometimes, he grapples with concepts, of course. So does Bonnefoy.

They are fond of attacking or even condemning them. But Jung's concepts could enable Bachelard and Bonnefoy to make peace with the concepts.

When I speak of an anima figure, I am naming a certain presence I am more or less attentive to, as well as certain ways and manners I have to keep in touch, wrongly or rightly, with the persons, the objects, even the ideas I am addressing – a certain taste and a certain colour, a certain breath of my encounters, of the relationships I experience with the world and with the most intimate and so often unconscious strings of my life.

An anima is for me as consistent, dynamic, amazing, and surprising as the inner landscapes dwelling within me and which may suddenly pop up in one of my dreams, or may again appear at my side when I'm reading or travelling.

Fig. 13. Vessel on head (RB p. 125)

The shadow and the self are also living and therefore dynamic realities for us.

One can learn to keep company with them, represent them – and even sometimes make them evolve.

Our psychoanalysis is animated. It invites us to recognize and encounter presences which are invariably surprising.

In fact, they are continually playing tricks on us.

Our concepts are generic, of course – otherwise, they would not be concepts. However, at the time, they are figurative and dynamic, and not only figurative and dynamic, but also dramatic and even sexual – which is quite out of the ordinary for a concept.

They are also singular: their usage is personal, and depends upon the circumstances. Which is even less common.

Jung himself experienced this flash of consciousness initially by striving to think as an analyst and psychologist in parallel with his work on The Red Book.

And later as well, in the flow and at the pace of his research post-1929/1930, when he had closed the Book.

Another plate from The Red Book shows a vessel (fig. 13).

It occurs after the image of the flowers being watered (fig. 9).

I am not sure whether this composite creature, this Harlequin, who seems to be related to one of Picasso's, holds his vessel so high aloft because he wants to protect it from any harm – or because he is about to throw it overboard. We cling to certain ideas we have learned. It can be difficult to let go of them.

But we have also learned, particularly thanks to The Red Book, that our thinking is a process, a work in progress, that tries to contain what is seeking to emerge, and to be represented.

Rising and living concepts, as travel companions

Our thinking is an artisanal, handcrafting thinking, which gradually forms, the way a potter forms a piece – and it is creative, so it is always surprising. Instead of seeking to interpret, it welcomes.

And for a time, it accompanies that which asks to be accompanied. It offers a shape, or several shapes.

They are always temporary, of course, but good enough to be uttered and heard – emotionally as well, emotionally especially – that which asks to be heard.

It is special in that it is a conjunction of intellect and the senses.

Imaging thinking is emerging, in the hollows and shadows rather than under bright lights.

It speaks attentively, not shrilly – in a low voice. It is rising, welling up from below.

This is why the analyst is seated, with a low centre of gravity.

And it is also why it can be a good idea, sometimes – sometimes, not always – for the analysand to be reclining. The position provides perspective and weight – another form of breathing, another spirit.

It fosters emergence. And becoming.

And one may come to enjoy emergence, becoming, and transformation.

How the creative process gives us perspective on our history I have mentioned that there are steps in Jung's life and work, that we have to deal with a work in progress, or rather in process – a process, or rather a set of processes, that go through crucial moments, passages that may prove to be more than difficult.

This means that, in the relationship to the unconscious, we meet our match. I mentioned disproportion. We remember the first encounters with the creature named Izdubar, in December 1915 and then in February 1917 (figs. 2 and 3).

We wondered how the tiny little man we can barely see will be able to confront the energy emerging there, and even he might raise his eyes.

Jung experienced such an encounter again in 1951, years after he concluded his Red Book. In a dream, he remembered his 1936 visit to Fatehpur Sikri, in India (Jung 1963, p. 255).

In this dream, Jung, who is one of the main characters in the scene, bows very low, kneeling until his forehead touches the ground – in an attitude and position apparently quite similar, remarkably similar, to the one in the image of the little man facing the giant or the volcano burst in the scenes of 1915 and 1917.

It looks in this dream as though he is bowing down to the ground – but he isn't. Between the ground and his forehead, there is a tiny gap, he noted, a Fig. 14.

short distance he maintains, a reserve: the gap and reserve of his consciousness, maintained in the very relationship with 'the highest presence'.

Today, if we enter the temple of Fatehpur Sikri, we see it just as Jung saw it and experienced it in his dream (fig. 14).

And if we search carefully, we can find a representation of this temple from a different point of view, showing the throne room where Sultan Akbar ruled, surrounded by sages and scholars, his counsellors (fig. 15).42

Structurally and dramaturgically, the scene in the dream adopts the configuration we saw, of the first encounters with Izdubar.

But at the same time

Fig. 15. Fatehpur Sikri, from another angle (Gaillard 1998, pp. 100–01)

it plays out differently. In 1951, the point was to face differently that which was presenting itself.

And the point was to find words to fit this encounter, words other than the ones in The Red Book.

For the point was for Jung to take his position as a psychologist and analyst, in particular with regard to the Judeo-Christian cultural tradition to which he belongs, and therefore to play his role in our history as it unfolds.

And we know that this 1951 dream prefigures and in fact already contains the essence of his Answer to Job.

To put one’s hand over one’s mouth?

From the beginning, and throughout the first six chapters of Answer to Job (1952, paras. 564–631), Jung does indeed emphasize the disproportion between Job and the God he is dealing with.

He cites the Book of Job at length as well as the texts that are traditionally associated with it.

Rereading the story of Job grappling with Yahweh in this way, he draws his attention and ours to Job’s puniness, his impotence when faced with the violence determined to crush him.

How can we fail to recall, ever more insistently, the image of the tiny man in The Red Book, kneeling with his arms out when the first Izdubar manifests himself, and then prostrating himself on the ground, when the so-named Izdubar bursts from the egg or vessel that was supposed to contain him, but that actually exploded, spread, and erupted in the fire and flames of a volcano?

Only, gradually, in the same chapters, and those which follow, Jung changes the accent of his text to emphasize the inconsiderate brutality of this Yahweh, who is obviously devoid of any proportions – any weights or measures which would enable Him to evaluate His own actions and deeds, a consequence related especially to His almost total lack of consciousness.

Jung contrasts this divine recklessness with poor Job's relatively higher level of consciousness, which is precisely what differentiates him from God and makes him superior.

The idea is that Job takes nothing for granted, even though he gives every required sign of reverence and even submission. 'How can a man be just before God?

Though one wished to dispute with Him, he could not answer Him but one time out of a thousand', is the Biblical quote to which Jung refers at the beginning of his book (Job 9, 2,3; Jung 1952, para. 566).

Jung also cites: 'How can I reply to you? I put my hand over my mouth. I spoke once, but I have no answer; twice, but I will say no more' (Job 40: 4,5; Jung 1952, para. 564).

But this is where Jung resorts to the disturbing Psalm. The theme of this psalm is an attitude that is quite the opposite of displaying reverence to an infinite omnipotence. The singer goes so far as to protest against God, and even remonstrate with him: 'How long, Lord? Wilt thou hide thyself forever? Shall thy wrath burn like fire?/ Remember how short my time is: / Lord, where are thy former loving-kindnesses, Which thou swarest unto David in thy truth? (Psalm 89, verses 47–49).

The Book of Job then clearly takes another turn, which is audible in the change of accent, and especially tone, in Jung's interpretation and reflection.

Jung is then committed to following, step by step, Job's affirmation, still cautious, of course, but fully assumed, in the match with God's near omnipotence – and his own affirmation, the affirmation of his own position, as he accompanies Job.

Thus Job, grappling with the divinity Yahweh for whom he is no match, continues to rebel, and says so. As for Jung, he not only accompanies Job, but in fact, he actively supports him.

He even goes so far as to reply to Job's doubts and terrors, by writing the book – hence its title, Answer to Job.

Jung supports poor Job by accompanying him with his own work of thinking and writing, in our time.

For starting with Chapter 7 of the Answer, the progress of the story is what concerns himself in his own life and work. Not only the progress of the history of Job and Yahweh in their times – but also Job's position and advancement in our collective human history, and our own, which recalls this encounter, and continues even now, seeking and creating its becoming.

A history played out in 'la longue duree' ('over the long term'), as the French historian Fernand Braudel, a great scholar and the leader of the Annales School, would say (Braudel 1958).

The ability of this book to put our collective history in perspective is what makes it so powerful.

It is a retrospective power, of course, in that Jung thereby shows us the genealogy of Christianity, and hence that of his current position as analyst and psychologist.

But it is also a prospective power, for it places us where we need to be, to confront the present and begin reflecting on the future – a reflection that is ethical by nature, distanced from the teachings of religious dogma.

They are, by contrast, rigid: as belief systems, they are supposed to be quite immutable, whereas Jung attempts to meet the challenge of taking into consideration these beliefs and the transformations they have undergone.

The 1952 book clearly takes up the questions and struggles with him-who-is known-as-Izdubar, written and painted in The Red Book, but it looks at them in a different way. As a result, beginning in the late 1920s, and even more definitely in the early 1950s, the Book will turn out to be apparently obsolete, irrelevant, and no longer of any use.

But only apparently: for Jung, it was essential, as an initial structuring and framing of his reflection, a first and necessary attempt at understanding and enabling others to understand a number of ideas – notably, the place and role of his analytical psychology and clinical practice in relation to religions and a post-Christian world.

This is indeed the kernel that was forming in the story of Izdubar reduced to the size of an egg, and thereby brought closer, actually almost interiorized, which might have given rise to hopes and possibilities of rebirth.

And it is definitely the kernel that was forming – and may already have been waiting – in the scene of the vessels pouring water on the flowers below, while the building floating peacefully on a cloud might very well be a reminder – perhaps a somewhat nostalgic one – of the happy times before the destruction of the Temple.

From the first visionary encounters in The Red Book to putting our history in perspective and implementing it

One of the most powerful effects of Jung’s research, throughout his life and his writings, is to lead us to think history.

In harmony with the thinking of his time, he initially, and for a long time, envisioned psychic functioning in terms of space, as a geographical phenomenon, or, to be more exact, a geological one.

Hence his many metaphors, in which he speaks of digging through successive layers, or descending into depths to be discovered and explored, or multiple caves, one opening onto the next, leading the seeker to go ever deeper and farther inside.

Only very gradually in his life and his work did his thinking make the transition from these spatial representations to an investigation of the passing of time, and therefore of history (Gaillard 2010b).

This transition was facilitated by the fact that the representations in terms of space were already practically an invitation to advance step by step.

They therefore required time, introducing the idea of a process to be lived, with its own rhythm or rhythms.

In this respect, it is especially significant and thrilling to observe, in parallel, from year to year, the advancement of The Red Book and the lectures and texts Jung published between 1913 and 1929/1930 (Vieljeux 2004).

It is particularly interesting to examine the themes of his reflection and published work in the late 1920s and through the 1930s.

It becomes clear to us that, at the same time as he put aside The Red Book, he was wondering about the place and task of modern man, and arriving at keen insights into it – in Prague, in 1928 (Jung 1928/1931; Serina 2011; Gaillard 2011c), while he would soon resume and develop his reflection on Gnosticism (Shamdasani 2012, pp. 123; 153; 201) and, moreover, on the place of alchemy in the history of our culture.

Finally, this path led him to reflect on the genealogy and history of Christianity, up to our times, and that of his psychology in this heritage (Quaglino et al. 2007).

At the same time, he was increasingly curious about the analogies and differences between his approach and those of the Oriental traditions, especially yoga.

In 1925, three years before he gave the lecture in Prague, when The Red Book was still a work in progress, this transition – actually an epistemological mutation – occurred.

Therefore, it has a bearing not only on the formation of the first specifically Jungian concepts, as I outlined above, but it is also pivotal in the transformation of his spatial representations of psychic functioning into a reflection on history.

And this mutation took place in Africa.

In the summer of 1925, Jung took part in an expedition that enabled him to travel through East Africa and Egypt, from Mombasa to Khartoum, discovering landscapes and peoples that aroused his attention all the more in that they made him wonder about his own relationships to the world, to our past and our becoming, as we are led to experience them today (Jung 1963, Ch. 9; Bair 2004, Ch. 24).

At the time, he experienced a state that could be described as elation, stimulated by an almost infinite participation in a world that is so perfectly and righteously there, so perfectly primitive and immobile, it seems to be outside time and history – and least, outside our own.

However, his elation soon gave way to a drama: he immediately began thinking that this perfection has disappeared, or is in danger of disappearing.

And this is so precisely because it is the source of an inevitable becoming, a quest for a path: ‘At that time, I understood that within the soul from its primordial beginnings there has been a desire for light and an irrepressible urge to rise out of the primordial darkness’, Jung noted, in his ‘autobiography’.

And he added, ‘The longing for light is the longing for consciousness’ (Jung 1963, p. 264; 269).

As a result of the way he experienced this movement, this longing to become conscious, Jung’s thinking about time and history formed, ripened, and emerged in his writings.

It is indeed a way of thinking, a way of thinking about history, that Jung was always tearing down and reconstructing in the rest of his work, starting in 1933 and especially energetically in the mid-1930s, in conjunction with the series of lectures he was then giving at the Swiss Federal Institute of Technology and at Eranos.

This coincides with his work on the alchemists’ illuminated illustrations and literature, and how they are related to or different from our psychology and our clinical practice – and, of course, this work is continued in Aion (1951), Mysterium Coniunctionis (1955–6) and ‘The Undiscovered Self (Present and Future)’ (1957).

This thinking took shape initially in a dream, a dream that was itself highly elaborate and powerfully demanding – in its own way, of course.

The dream

in question, the dream scene, had come to Jung five years earlier, in 1920. It coincided with an earlier visit to Africa – to North Africa, this time.

The night before he embarked in Tunis to return to Europe, he had a dream that he gives a careful and lengthy account of in his ‘autobiography’.

In this dream, Jung is struggling with a young Arab prince who is attacking him.

They wrestle for a long time, in a match which long seems uncertain, until Jung has the prince read a book that is open between them, which he himself has written.

The scene of hand-to-hand combat thus turns into a debate centred on a book, which finally resolves it.

Jung later said that he did not understand this dream fully until his next journey to Africa.

His thinking and reflection in 1925, which he enjoyed presenting as his ‘myth’, proceeds or derives from the image – the drama – that already contained it in 1920.

But apparently it was present only in a remote way, far from the controllable exercise of consciousness, and thereby largely enigmatic.

The power of Jung’s thinking, in its finest essence specific to Jung, is the wisdom to continue grappling with its source, the imagistic work of a psychic life that is still largely unconscious.

For decades, this work found its best expression in The Red Book. And Jung also had the wisdom to continue ‘imaging’ in his later work – an approach that, by feeding from its source – makes his thinking ‘emergent’ as well, as I said earlier. And, because it is emerging, it is also surprising, and deliberately dramatized and dramatizing – not only when it reaches towards the conceptual, as I outlined above, but just as much when the issue is representing and experiencing history. In both of these areas, that of theorization, and that of the conception of history and putting it in perspective, this approach is good for the becoming-consciousness.

So it is quite possible that since the Septem Sermones ad Mortuos the Temple has been destroyed – or that, more discreetly, from one page of The Red Book to the next, it tends to vanish into the distance, above the clouds, no longer containing what we sought and found within it.

But the Book remains.

The Book, and all the books after it, particularly, this Red Book, at last open among us, opening onto the answer Jung would give Job in 1952, an answer with roots in both of Jung's journeys to Africa, an answer that will never cease evolving in his later works – an answer that even today has the power to move and mobilize us (see Eco 1962).

Thus, this journey we made as we looked at The Red Book took us from the egg to the vessels, and from the vessels to the words, and at the same time, from Jung's Red Book to his last works, a journey that can teach or, or rather remind us, of certain characteristics specific to Jung's approach to psychoanalysis and our own, characteristics I find essential.

First of all, this reading can teach us or remind us that our psychoanalysis is born from an experience, an experience of the unconscious faced as a dynamic, strangely living, enigmatic and largely independent and autonomous reality, endowed with powers of expression, representation, personification, dramatization, and symbolization which continually astound us.

Indeed, these forces are so powerful they may prove to be lethal.

However, we may also learn to cooperate with them, in order to make more room for the unconscious, the better to acknowledge and deal with it.

This first observation is a practical invitation, addressed to each and every one.

The Red Book also teaches us that because Jungian psychoanalysis is sustained by such an experience with the unconscious, it has the creative boldness to suggest a type of thinking that I have qualified as imaging, hence an entire set of concepts distinguished by their propensity for being virtually figurative themselves: often personalized, at the same time as they are deliberately dramatized.

As a result, their purpose, rather than being to describe a psychological functioning from outside, is to represent it, and especially to give it a voice and a figure, thereby making it possible for the subject to better acknowledge and experience emotionally the engagement in the relationship to the unconscious at a particular moment. The scope of this second observation is both epistemological and clinical.

Lastly, this Book teaches us – and we will stop here, for the time being – that the Jungian approach tackles these questions, and enables us to tackle these questions, over a long time frame, on a par with the time required for cultural transformations.

Therefore, the question of heritage and becoming is posed and imposed, and, by that very token, the question of our duty to the present. This third observation is of an ethical nature. Christian Gaillard, The egg, the vessels and the words.

[1]About Franz: Remembering C. G. Jung-A Son's Story

We went down the stairs again and out into the courtyard to visit the stone carvings: the famous Bollingen stone, the alchemical pictures, the tribute to Emma, and the list of family members and ancestors.

It was at this juncture that I was able to grasp something of the physical strength and stamina of Carl Jung, the man, as I moved from stone to inscribed stone, each one so artistically and carefully wrought, seeing the carefully chiseled names of generations of the Jung family forever inscribed.

The muscles of my back and arms began to ache and twitch as I realized what must have been required in order to present so permanent a set of messages to his descendants, both familial and spiritual.

Later, I wrote in my journal, "If ever any woman had a personal concretized animus experience or incredible constellation, I have had one!"  Mary Dian Molton, About Franz: Remembering C. G. Jung-A Son's Story, Page 51-52

[1]Zarathustra Seminar

1934 16 May LECTURE Ill Zarathustra Seminar

Dr. Jung:

294

Here is a question by Mrs. Bailward: "'Ye creating ones, there is much uncleanness. That is because ye have had to become mothers':

Does this passage allude to his psychic identification (possibly a necessary part of creation) which he intuits as unclean?"

Well, the identification we spoke of has nothing directly to do with what he means in this later passage; this is a particular problem, the problem of the psychological condition of creativeness, which has nothing to do with the identification of Nietzsche with the old man.

For there is nothing unclean about the old wise man, nor is there necessarily anything unclean about the anima, or the Puer Aeternus, and so on.

The impurity he alludes to in this very much later passage is the impurity of the mixture of spirit and matter which is necessary for creation; without that mixture no real creation can take place.

But it is not concerned with the identification we are concerned with just now.

I mentioned last time that recognition of God's being dead; we met that idea then for the first time.

Now, how shall we understand this statement by Nietzsche?

Dr. Reichstein: That the guiding principle which ought to contain the life, is dead.

Dr. Jung: Yes, we can understand God psychologically as a supreme guiding principle.

But we must well understand when we make that formulation or any other, that it is always our formula, it is what we say or know, it is our impression, the picture which we paint.

If you paint a picture of a landscape, say, you would never believe that it was the landscape; it is only what you make of the landscape.

You paint a picture as well as you can, but it is probably never as beautiful as the landscape itself.

Either you put something in that is not there, or you leave out something; at all events, you never make the mistake of confusing the one with the other.

But when we make a formulation about God, everybody assumes that that is God.

If I say, for instance, that god is an image, or a complex with a very great emotional intensity, or a supreme guiding principle, a psychological principle, then everybody asserts:

Dr. Jung says God is nothing but this.

A theologian does exactly the same thing when he says God can only be good.

And he has no idea of the blasphemy he is uttering.

How does he know that God can only be good? He takes half of the world away from him.

How can God he everything if he is denied the faculty of being evil too?

People make the mistake of assuming that he is nothing but their idea about him, and apparently God never defends himself.

He never says: now this is most certainly nonsense!

When somebody calls God a devil nobody strikes that man dead: he can live on ever afterwards perfectly happily.

One person can say that God is dead, and another one that he is most living, and it makes no difference.

Supposing that such an absolutely unimaginable thing as God exists: he must necessarily be beyond our grasp; otherwise, we would not use the idea of God.

It must be a thing beyond our mental possibilities.

So when we make a mental effort to formulate something about God, it is most obvious that we make a picture with our own means, consisting of our own stuff, and it is a most restricted aspect, because our mind is most certainly incapable of grasping such a fact as God would represent.

Moreover, the experience we can have of a thing utterly beyond ourselves can only be certain effects in our psychology;: we have absolutely no other material by which to judge.

And even in our psychological experience we are entirely restricted to our own condition.

You know, when I say something to a person and create a certain effect, then the right conclusion is: Dr. Jung said such and such a thing to me and I had such and such a reaction.

Only when in a very bad mood or very resentful will he identify his reaction with himself.

In case of a bad reaction, he will consider me a perfect devil, most cruel perhaps, but that is only when he does not see the justification of what I have said, or when he does not want to see that he has such a reaction because his character is such that it necessarily produces just that.

Only very naïve people will project such reactions upon each other.

Of course it happens all the time; you kick a stone and hurt your foot and then you go back and kick it again.

I saw a man do that recently.

He stumbled over a pipe in his path and dropped something in his hand, and then he went back and kicked that pipe most violently and hurt his foot a second time.

That is, of course, very human but it is perfect nonsense.

We always must keep in mind, then, that what we say about God is made of our own psychology; we cannot get beyond that fact.

It is our language, our own brain cells, our individual experience, and we cannot prove that anything in our conception could possibly touch the real being of what we call God.

It is almost futile to make such formulations because we never can prove them; we can only ask: Are there peculiar effects in our psychology which we cannot place otherwise than under such a heading? In other words: Are there such things as God-experiences in our psychology?-or what is the thing we call a God-experience?

All we can formulate about it is made of our own concepts, and we can only postulate that there must be an unimaginable paradoxical being behind the experience about which we cannot know, definitionem.

It is absolutely dark.

So when we assume God to be a guiding principle-well, sure enough, a god is usually characteristic of a certain system of thought or morality.

For instance, take the Christian God, the summum bonum: God is love, love being the highest moral principle; and God is spirit, the spirit being the supreme idea of meaning.

All our Christian moral concepts derive from such assumptions, and the supreme essence of all of them is what we call God.

So, when Nietzsche says God is dead, then it naturally means that supreme guiding principle is dead, the spirit, love-Christian love of course-whatever is believed about the Christian God: for instance, that God loved mankind so much that he even allowed his son to be crucified to redeem them from sin, and the idea that his son was himself and at the same time the sum total of all these leading dogmatic ideas.

So, you could say just as well that our Christian faith or point of view has vanished; we no longer believe in the Christian dogma, or in the leading principles of Christian morality, nor can we continue our traditional Christian psychology.

Nietzsche calls himself an atheist, but this formulation is of course a bit influenced by the idea that God is when he is said to be. In calling yourself an atheist, you make that concession to your primitive magic thinking-as if you could produce something by saying it is.

As Kant said, that word is is nothing but a copula in a judgment; you need to use a verb that expresses existence, but you have not produced a thing by it.

If you say you possess a hundred dollars, they don't necessarily exist.

But Nietzsche's idea confirms our explanation of the old wise man as the original Christian revelation continued in the idea of the paraclete, the Comforter, withdrawing slowly from the world and becoming a hermit, re-identifying himself again with the natural background from which he came.

You see, the original Christian spirit came out of the unconscious, out of human nature, in a most natural way.

The theologians and the historians of the Christian conviction always try to make us believe that Christianity fell from heaven.

But it grew very naturally through the course of centuries.

Everything was well prepared.

We spoke of the Persian origin of Christianity, but a great deal came also from Egypt, something from India even, because already in the second century B.C. there were Buddhistic monasteries in Persia, so through Persia the Buddhistic ideas probably crept into the formation of Christianity.

All the Christian ideas and symbolism existed before, and many of the institutions of the Catholic church also.

The mass probably derives from the cult of Mithras, and the communion ritual as well.

Monasteries already existed.

You know, at the time of the Reformation they asserted that monasteries and nunneries were not foreseen in the New Testament, and then the Catholic church pointed to the fact that monasteries existed in the early days of Christianity, introduced by the first believers in Christ, before the holy scriptures were ever recognized as holy.

They claim that the church is an older authority than the holy scriptures since they were collected and declared to be holy long after the church had been founded by St. Peter (who was supposed to be the first substitute of Christ on earth) and to have been put into that place by Christ himself before the Evangels were written.

Now, it is an interesting fact that later investigation has shown the evidence of the Catholic church to be not quite reliable.

The church pointed to a little book by Philo Judaeus, a Jew, also called Philo the Alexandrian, who was the philosopher of Christianity; he developed particularly the Logos philosophy which is contained in the most philosophical of the Evangels, the Evangel of John.

The little book is called Dr Vita Contemplative and in it he described monasteries that existed in his time in Egypt and presumably also in Southern Palestine in the valley of the Jordan.

The Catholic church quietly assumed that those were Christian monasteries, because one knew of no others; but the fact is that this book is now known to have been written between 20 and 24 A.D., at a time when Christ had not begun to teach; and moreover in writing about the life in those monasteries, Christianity is not mentioned-quite naturally, because it did not exist!

And just as monasteries were in existence before anything Christian, so the very central thoughts of Christianity had been well prepared for centuries and were already there.

Then the whole thing crystallized around that more or less legendary figure of Christ.

They said that it came suddenly as a great revelation, and they actually tried to destroy all traces of its sources, to forget how it came about and to make it absolutely unique, like a lightning from heaven.

But historically this is an unknown picture: natura nonfacit saltus, nature does not make jumps; it is a continuous development.

The spirit which grew through the centuries and appeared before the consciousness of the world in the moment of Christ's teaching, came about so naturally that Tertullian, one of the early fathers of the church, wrote that famous phrase: anima naturaliter

Christiana, the soul is naturally Christian.'

It was there long before people realized it, and the sudden explosion of the Christian faith was nothing but a sudden dawning of the consciousness of it.

And as it came from nature, so it went back to nature.

For a while it lifted man's mind out of nature and put it in opposition. St. Augustine, for example, said in one of his writings that people went out to marvel at the beauty of nature, the vastness of the sea, the greatness of the mountains, etc., and forgot themselves and lost their souls; he admonished them not to look, to beware of the beauty of nature, because it was all wrong; in everything there was the admixtio diabolicae fraudis, the admixture of devilish fraud.

A devil was in every natural thing.

That idea still exists in the preparatory rites of the Holy Mass.

For example, in the Missale Romanum, a collection of rites and prayers, there is a particular magic rite called the benedictio cerei, the blessing of the wax in the altar-candles, for the purpose of purifying the natural substance of wax as produced by the bees from all admixtio diabolicaefmudis.

They assumed that everything that came from the life of nature was impure because it contained effects or constituents of evil influence, the work of the devil, so in order to make a sacred use of things, one must disinfect them.

There is also the brnedictio salis, the benediction of the salt.

And in the performance of the Holy Mass the choir boys swing their censors to make the incense smoke rise, the smoke being a spiritual disinfectant.

Germs of evil nature are in the air but these devils are driven out by the smoke of the incense that surrounds the altar.

So in every detail the Christian spirit of the early Middle Ages lifted up something in man, his spirit or soul, till it was out of touch with nature.

But already in about the twelfth or thirteenth century we see the first reactions.

It was then that the poet Petrarch climbed a mountain for the first time to enjoy a beautiful view; he climbed Mont Ventoux in Provence, and the expedition was surrounded by all sorts of anticipations and fears because it was then supposed that mountain tops were inhabited by particular nature devils, so it amounted to an almost blasphemous boldness to climb to the heights.

After that, the Christian spirit included the importance of nature more and more.

The early primitive artists, who indulged in particularly ugly and unanatomical bodies, were soon supplanted by painters who had discovered the beauty of the flesh and of all natural things; and with this came the Renaissance, the resurrection of the spirit of antiquity, and of the old feeling of connection with nature.

We are still in that process of becoming acquainted again with the spirit of nature, in contrast to the medieval spirit. In the time of Nietzsche, this process, which had begun, let us say, with Petrarch, reached a culmination; it was recognized that the Christian principle was dead.

That was the confession of the materialistic age which began with the French Enlightenment in about 1730, with the Encyclopedists and philosophers Diderot, Voltaire, etc.

This statement that god is dead is obviously most important.

It is, one could say, the exposition of the whole problem of Zarathustra.

You know, in the beginning of a dream there is a short sentence or a picture which is the exposition of the theme of the dream, and this is such an exposition.

Zarathustra makes that statement to the old wise man, the old Christian spirit, who has turned very skeptical and prefers the solitude of the mountains and the woods to life in collectivity.

And he gives good advice to Zarathustra: he says to give mankind nothing, but rather to take part of their load and help them to carry it; only then will they be grateful.

Yet, he thinks they will not accept the new message.

We are now coming upon certain symbols to which I should like to call your attention.

In the fourth paragraph of the second chapter, for example, the old wise man says: "Yes, I recognize Zarathustra.

Pure is his eye, and no loathing lurketh about his mouth. Goeth he not along like a dancer?"

This quality or attribute of the dancer will occur again and again later, and I propose that someone make a note whenever we come across it.

There he is likened to a dancer for the first time and one cannot see exactly why, but when one compares that passage with others, one understands better what he means.

In the third chapter the rope-dancer turns up.

And the same symbol occurs in the fifth chapter; there the motive of dancing comes again in connection with a star that is born out of chaos.

Other symbolic expressions occur in different connections.

Right in the beginning, for instance, there is the motif of the setting of the sun, or the down-going of Zarathustra.

Mrs. Crowley: I have thought a great deal about the meeting of these two wise men. It seemed to me to be the exposition of the whole problem at the beginning of Zarathustra. And I wondered whether one could explain it in another way besides the historical one, that Zarathustra is the representative of the dying and resurrecting God.

The old wise man would be the spirit of nature, in the eternal, timeless sense, whereas Zarathustra would represent consciousness as a transforming reality.

Then I thought it was an important point that he speaks of the imperfection of man, which suggests the idea that the spiritual values come and go, but man, as the animal, inherits that element which is eternal, his instinctive nature.

Dr. Jung: Yes, you are quite right. The old wise man in the woods and the old wise man in Zarathustra are one and the same thing.

And that is always so.

The old wise man is at the same time the one that goes and the one that comes, for everything that is, also is not-and what is today, is not tomorrow.

Through that little mental operation of assuming that time is an extension, one knows that what has been, is still, and what will be, is already: inasmuch as things happen in a timeless condition they are always existing. So that archetype of the old wise man has been Zarathustra in the ninth century B.C. and Zarathustra.

He has been Christ, he has been Mohammed, he has been Mani.

He went and he came, he died and was born again.

It is of course exceedingly awkward and paradoxical, but things happen like that in the unconscious: you come upon such peculiar facts there.

And what the collective unconscious is, the world is also.

When you look up at the sky and marvel at the beauty of the stars, you don't see them as they are, but as they were, untold millions of years ago.

You apparently see a new star flaming up, but that star became incandescent when Tutankamen was Pharaoh in Egypt, and perhaps it does not now exist at all.

For if by a miracle all the stars in heaven could be wiped out of existence, you would still go on seeing them for four years: only then would the first star disappear perhaps, and twenty or fifty years later others might go out, but the sky would be there as before, and it would take untold millions of years before the last star vanished.

So we live continually in an age where things that have been are still in existence.

The disagreeable thing is that we cannot see what is in the future.

But our unconscious is somewhat in advance of our eyes, and has a notion of the things that will be, for the future is created out of the remote past.

Mrs. Baumann: I want to ask why Shiva is always represented dancing?

Miss Wolff: Dancing is a symbol of creation, according to Professor Zimmer's book.

Dr. jung: Yes, dancing is always connected with creation.

Shiva dances the origin and the destruction of the world.

The birth of the dancing star out of chaos is a symbol of creation.

Dr. Reichstein: Dancing with the self is always an expression of oneness.

Dr. Jung: Would you say that it was creative to represent the unity of your condition or the union with yourself?

Dr. Reichstein: Yes, it has a creative effect.

Dr. Jung: But upon what? What would be the creative effect?

Dr. Reichstein: It can be very different, it depends upon the kind of dance.

Dr. Jung: Exactly. You can dance not only to produce the union with yourself, or to manifest yourself, but in order to produce rain, or the fertility of women, or of the fields, or to defeat your enemy.

The idea of an effect, or something produced, is always connected with the idea of dancing.

Therefore, it was originally a magic ritual by which something was produced, it was the original idea of work even.

When primitives dance they really work, they dance until they are completely exhausted; they can dance for forty-eight hours in succession.

For instance, in the stag dances of the Mexican Indians one of the participants puts on the skin of a stag and wears a stag's horns, and is then pursued by the hunters who shoot at him with dulled arrows.

He goes on dancing until he is almost dead and then another one takes his place, and that goes on for days in succession.

That is a rite d'entree before the stag hunting season, and it is very clearly done in order to gather up all their energies and to put them into the frame of mind, the attitude, of stag hunting, or to produce plenty of meat supply, or to attract hunting animals.

They dance the animals in order to attract them, as the oyster fishers in Scotland sing the oysters.

And in Switzerland they sing the cows, the so-called ranz des vaches, or the Kuhreihen, in order that they may give a lot of milk and produce calves.

There are plenty of such primitive rites to produce fertility or for the cure of disease.

They dance a disease, they represent the demons of sickness and dance them in order to combat them.

So the first ideas of efficiency or effect were due to their peculiar psychological experiences through rhythmic movement: the efficiency mood was developed through the rhythmical repetition that slowly catches the whole system.

The native drum, for instance, the tom-tom, has an exceedingly suggestive effect; after a while the whole system quivers rhythmically, and by means of that rhythm they get into the attitude, a sort of ekstasis," in which the effect takes place, a state in which they may have visions that help them to get up their courage or to concentrate.

Then, people who are ordinarily just lazy dogs do things in an amazing hurry and with tremendous concentration.

I once watched an interesting performance in north Africa, south of Tunis.

The Marabout in that country is a saintly man who is usually in charge of the poor: he sees that they are fed. His title is "the one who nourishes the poor."

He naturally cannot feed them all out of his own pocket, so he is entrusted with land to cultivate for that purpose, which is worked in turn by voluntary labor; one year it is this village, and the next year it is another.

The men work for two or three days on the estate of the Marabout, and they do it as a sort of ritual.

I saw them assembling the evening before with their camels, hundreds of them with green banners, and then in the morning a wild drumming and singing started and the whole crowd began to dance.

They had sort of baskets or sacks, and short hoes instead of shovels and spades, and they filled these sacks with sand, a weight of a hundred pounds or more, and danced, carrying that load to another place where they were building dams and making little canals for fertilizing the very dry soil.

And all that heavy labor was done in dancing step.

Of course towards midday they were nearly dead in the great heat, but I watched them for hours and they were most efficient.

In a few hours they had built a huge dam.

But I am perfectly certain that if I had hired that crowd for three or four shillings they would hardly have moved; they would have been so tired and hot and hungry.

Now we go on to the next chapter:

When Zarathustra arrived at the nearest town which adjoineth the forest, he found many people assembled in the market-place; for it had been announced that a rope-dancer would give a performance.

And Zarathustra spake thus unto the people:

I teach you the Superman.

Man is something that is to be surpassed; what have ye done to surpass man?

All beings hitherto have created something beyond themselves: and ye want to be the ebb of that great tide, and would rather go back to the beast than surpass man?

What is ape to man? A laughing-stock, a thing of shame.

And just the same shall man be to the Superman: a laughing-stock, a thing of shame.

Ye have made your way from the worm to man, and much within you is still worm.

Once were ye apes, and even yet man is more of an ape than any of the apes.

Even the wisest among you is only a disharmony and hybrid of plant and phantom.

But do I bid you become phantoms or plants?

Lo, I teach you the Superman!

Well, this chapter begins with the continuation of the story.

You know, there is always a certain movement, a certain story, going on in all unconscious fantasies.

Zarathustra is in the mountains in the beginning, then he descends and goes through a wood where he meets that old wise man, and now he comes to the city which is near the forest.

That is like fantasies in general, a sort of drama which has its own time and place where it is enacted.

Of course it is symbolical.

The place high up on the mountain is a high level, corresponding, as we have seen, to an intense consciousness, the level of the sun: there one is isolated.

And the down-going is the approach to the lower level where one comes together with that man in oneself, the ordinary collective human being.

Not in your highest differentiation, your so-called differentiated or superior functions, are you connected with other human beings, but in your inferior functions.

You see, the differentiated functions help you to be independent.

If you could live entirely in your differentiated function, you never would need any other human being; you would be under no obligations and dependent upon nobody.

But where you are inferior, inefficient, you are connected with mankind.

The real vital connection is always through the inferior side, the "human, all-too-human," as Nietzsche says.

Now, Zarathustra comes first into the wood, and the wood is dark and doubtful.

To primitive people the wood is always a place of ghosts, full of unknown risks and dangers.

It is a place where the unconscious is projected.

So, from the very high level of consciousness, he has to go down almost into the unconscious in order to reach man, who is separated from a superior consciousness through the fact that he is unconscious of that high level.

The mountain is hidden from his view by the forest and by the old spirit that dwells in the forest.

And now he comes to the town, the collective place.

He has arrived on the level of ordinary humanity and will speak to his fellow beings.

The first person he meets is a rope-dancer.

If it were a dream or a fantasy, what would you say that meant?

Dr. Reichstein: It would suggest a caricature of the dancer that Zarathustra really is; he dances without connection with the age.

Dr. Jung: You assume that this would be a sort of mirror reflex or a caricature of Zarathustra?

Dr. Reichstein: I think it is a picture of the time perhaps, because people are out of connection with the earth.

To dance in the air is just the thing which is attempted by people.

Dr. Jung: Well, in the next chapter, the fourth part, there is a confirmation of this idea; he says:

Man is a rope stretched between the animal and the Superman-a rope over an abyss.

A dangerous crossing, a dangerous wayfaring, a dangerous look-back, a dangerous trembling and halting.

What is great in man is that he is a bridge and not a goal: what is lovable in man is that he is an over-going and a down-going.

Down-going is the translation here of the German word Untergang, but there is really no English equivalent.

This shows that the rope-dancer is an equivalent of himself, or himself under a certain aspect-a shadow aspect of himself, one could say, for he would not be conscious of the identification.

It is nowhere clearly indicated that Zarathustra is the rope-dancer, but it is perfectly obvious in the further continuation of the story inasmuch as he is Nietzsche.

I doubt very much whether Nietzsche realized it.

There is, however, farther on in the book, a quite irrefutable proof that he himself is the rope-dancer, in the prophecy of his own life, of which he could not have been conscious.

So I think I am safe in the assumption that Nietzsche was not conscious that Zarathustra was the rope-dancer.

You see, if a figure like that appears in a dream-if you encounter yourself in the form of a certain person, for instance-then you can safely conclude that you are unaware of the fact that you are like that person under a certain aspect.

Or if it is an animal, that you are unaware of yourself under the aspect of such an animal. You always assume it must be somebody else.

So it would be quite natural if Nietzsche did not recognize that figure.

But we have such dreams just in order to meet the thing in ourselves which is strangest to us, and that is the reason why Nietzsche meets that aspect of himself, a sorry sort of saltimbanque, a rope-dancer.

It is a very flimsy kind of profession, you know, and very risky at that: one easily slips and falls down dead.

Now he begins his sermon about the Superman.

Here we encounter that concept of the Superman for the first time.

He gives a certain definition of him as the being that can be created by man’s making a heroic endeavor to create something beyond himself.

Of course, any creation is a creation beyond oneself, because one is already in existence, and if anything is created it must be beyond.

The essence, the very principle, of creation would be man-beyond-himself, and that is the Superman.

Nietzsche says here, "Man is something that is to be surpassed," that ought to be overcome. Now what is the connection between the last statement of the chapter before, that God is dead, and this beginning of the new chapter?

Miss Hannah: It means that the possibility of projecting god into a thing outside of ourselves is over.

That period is dead, and we have to find it in ourselves-or rather in the Self.

Dr. jung: Yes, and that practically amounts to the question: What happens to man when he declares that God is dead?

Something must happen, because other human beings hold that God lives, declaring by that that they delegate certain of their vital processes into an impersonal sphere which they call God.

Mr. Allemann: It is an increase of consciousness, a breaking of a taboo.

Dr. Jung: Well, not necessarily, but something is increased by it.

Mr. Allemann: The responsibility to oneself.

Dr. Jung: One could say "responsibility" if one assumes that consciousness is increased; without consciousness there is no responsibility of course.

Remark: If he is not guided, he has to depend upon himself.

Dr. Jung: Yes, he is without God inasmuch as he assumes that God guides him.

But that is a special case: the gods don’t always guide, they also misguide.

For instance, we pray to the Christian God not to lead us into temptation.

One of my little daughters refused to say that prayer because God should not be doing such things.

We are little ants, not even children, in comparison with God, and that he takes a fiendish pleasure in leading us into traps is really very evil.

But there is a definite effect which takes place when you declare that God is dead.

Mrs. Crowley: Inflation.

Dr. Jung: Of course.

For you then declare that certain vital processes which you assume belong to a being outside of you, are now dead.

They either do not exist any longer, or they have become your own activity.

Now, since these processes are untouched by whatever you declare, they cannot die, they are never dead.

They happen as they have always happened, but they happen now under the heading of your own fantasy, of your own doing.

Instead of saying, "God spoke to me in a dream," you say "I had a dream, j'ai fait un reve, I produced, I made, a dream": it is your activity. Then somebody comes along and says: "You terror, how can you produce such a hellish dream?"-and you think you must be an awful fellow to make such dreams!

St. Augustine thanked God for not making him responsible for his own dreams.

He still believed in the impersonal activity.

He would have gotten into a complete hell if he had thought God was dead, for then his dreams would have been his own, and any evil or any good that God had worked in the worth hitherto would have been his own doing.

If a person is conscious of this, his responsibility can heighten to such an extent that he will have a hellish inflation of consciousness.

But also if he does not realize it, if he does not know what he has done by saying that God is dead, he can have an inflation of his whole personality.

Then his unconscious will get inflated; he will be hampered by the continuous presence of God in the unconscious, which is of course the most terrible thing.

Things happen to him, and he thinks he is responsible.

Suddenly a thought comes into his head, for instance, and he thinks he must be a most immoral person to have such a thought.

We cannot be objective, we are exceedingly hysterical: we think we have done so and so, because we don't assume that those things just happen.

We are like somebody walking through a wood who thinks, when an animal crosses the path, "Why have I caused this animal to cross my path?-why have I created this animal?"

But the mind is like a wood in which all kinds of things happen.

Formerly, we believed that God could do marvelous things and so could put peculiar thoughts into the human mind, or that evil ghosts played bad tricks, and thus we were rid of the responsibility of certain activities.

But if you declare that God is dead and that there is no spook whatever, then it is all your own doing; or worse still, the doing of your wife, or your neighbors, or their children, and so on.

That is quite bad.

Then God is not only introjected into you but he is also projected into mankind, and then what people do becomes extremely important, because you assume they know what they are doing and that only a devil could do such things.

But those people are perfectly unconscious, as you are unconscious: you don't know what you do really, because you are not God.

Yet you behave as if you were.

That is the inevitable consequence, and then of course you become very important, responsible for a whole world.

If you are inclined to be a good Christian, naturally you get the savior delusion.

You think you are, in a way at least, a little savior, and that you must missionize the world and tell people what is good for the good cause.

But your cause is exceedingly bad, because you only try to get away from your own inflation.

So when Nietzsche declares that God is dead, he is confronted with the rope-dancer, and the rope-dancer is what?

Mrs. Stutz: He represents the great risk of the inflation.

Dr. Jung: Well, the rope-dancer is that quantity of energy which has been in the god before.

This is the diminuitive form of the god in him, and he is a dancer because God dances the world.

That a god should be a dancer is of course a very pagan notion, and the Hindu idea is that he dances the creation of the world and its destruction.

But God as a creator, as the author, the maker of things, is a Christian idea as well.

So God appears now like the rope-dancer who is himself, Nietzsche.

And the rope-dancer leads an exceedingly risky existence.

Therefore, through his identity with God, he is instantly forced into a heroic attitude, an attitude of possible self-destruction: he is increased beyond himself by that inflation.

One could not say that this was very bad: it is the making of a hero.

You see, a hero must have a large self-destructive tendency in order to be a hero.

We praise a hero, and the hero contains a divine spark, or he would not be a hero.

He encounters himself, then, as the hero, this rope-dancer, but that means the maker of his own destruction.

For the moment, however, the rope-dancer plays no role.

First, Zarathustra tries to teach the people his idea of the Superman.

The idea of the Superman is, of course, the consequence of the God that is dead, for then man cannot remain man.

He is lifted out of himself, because all the vital processes that were embodied in God before are now in himself, and he becomes the creator of himself as God creates himself or the world.

In the old Egyptian texts, God is the maker of his own egg, the builder of his own nest; he hatches himself out; he is the Phoenix that burns itself and rises out of its own ashes; he is the God that eternally re-creates himself.'

So, whenever that inflation process gets into man, he becomes the maker of himself.

Therefore, Nietzsche continues now to speak about the Superman as able to create himself; Zarathustra is now the expression of man plus God.

He can undo himself and create a being beyond man, supposedly a product of man and God.

Then he says that "All beings hitherto have created something beyond themselves," and that otherwise they would go back to the animals.

Here is the interpretation of the old man in the chapter before: he didn't create any longer and so he went back to the animals, to nature, You see, those people who don't create themselves do go back to the animal.

This idea of self-renewal is a general religious idea.

In what kind of historical rites does it express itself?

Mrs. Baynes: In rebirth ceremonies and initiations.

Dr. Jung: Yes, all the rebirth ceremonies in all religions express this self-renewal, and it is always linked up with the idea that man in his self-renewal is doing the same thing that God does.

To that extent, he is God himself. For instance, the baptism of Christ in the Jordan is the moment of his generation by God himself.

According to the old Docetic teaching, it was the moment when God entered the man Christ.

Christ was an ordinary man until his baptism, when God entered him and he became Superman, god-man.

And he remained god-man until that moment in the garden before his crucifixion when he sweated blood.

There God left him, and it was the ordinary man Christ who was crucified and not God at all.

Therefore he said on the cross: "My God, why hast thou forsaken me?"

That old Docetic belief was of course a heretical teaching according to the Catholic dogma, but it lasted over many centuries and survives in certain more or less mystical sects still in existence.

Without the ceremony of rebirth, then, man is generally thought of as an animal. In the Catholic church, people must be baptized to save them from the natural state which is not capable of the vision of God, the special prerogative of that condition.

They are then quasi modo r.;rniti, as if newly born.

And in pagan cults they were clad in white robes and fed with milk like little children for about a week after the rebirth.

I was in one part of Africa where they have rather painful and complicated initiation ceremonies, and I was told that when the young men and women evade them, as they do now under the influence of the Christian missions, they are called animals because they have not submitted to the rebirth ritual.

All rebirth rituals are a making over of man into something beyond man, and that is expressed in many different ways; for instance, that the real parents are no longer their parents, or that they died and came back again as sort of ghosts in comparison to the animal being they were before, and they are given new names, etc.

These many forms of rebirth rites shmv that it is a representation collective, an archetypal idea, which means that the process in question is a regular quality of the collective unconscious, the original disposition of man.

And because it has occurred everywhere, it always comes back again in one form or another.

If we live at all, we will always seek the fulfilment of the archetype of rebirth; one could say it came to pass on the slightest provocation.

So when Nietzsche declares that God is dead, instantly he begins to transform.

With that declaration he is no longer a Christian, he is an atheist or it doesn't matter what.

He immediately gets into the process of that archetype of rebirth, because those vital powers in us which we call "God" are powers of self-renewal, powers of eternal change. Goethe felt that: there is a beautiful verse in Faust about the kingdom of the mothers where everything is in a continuous state of self-renewal, a continuous rearrangement.

And this kingdom of the mothers is the abyss of the deity; it is the darkness of the good, the deus absconditus, the auctor rerum, the dark father of created things. Also one can say it is the original mother.

Now, we have a peculiar sphere in our unconscious which corresponds to such concepts, and we call that "God," the creative or the creating god.

And as soon as this projection or this declaration, this creative god (whatever it is) is abolished, instantly that process begins in us.

We are caught in those powers.

If you don't want to be caught in them, then don't make such declarations; it is exceedingly foolish to make them, because you thus provoke the unconscious.

Of course you think it is quite futile whether you make such a declaration or not, that you can say this or that about God and it makes no difference whatever.

But I tell you it does make a difference in reality, only you won't connect it with things.

You see, the man Nietzsche himself did not realize, when he said God was dead, that it meant that he would get into the mill, into the alchemical pot where he is cooked and transformed.

As he did not realize, for instance, that thinking is a most exhausting creative process.

He says that all his thoughts jumped out of his brain like Pallas jumping out of the head of Zeus, l but on the next page he complained about the terrible vomiting and awful headaches he was always pestered with when working."'

That is generally so; we don't connect psychological and physical conditions.

You see, that declaration is a very obnoxious thing: it gets him into trouble right away, but he does not realize it.

The trouble is that he has to create the Superman.

His first word is: I teach you the Superman, not realizing that he has to give birth to a Superman, that he is confronted with the task of creating the Superman.

And what is the best proof that he does not realize it?

Miss Hannah: That he preaches it.

Dr. Jung: Yes, if he realized what a task he was confronted with, he would not teach it; he would keep it all to himself.

You see, when one preaches such things, one practically says you ought to do it, but I am all right.

But whether you realize it or not, you are confronted with an impossibly difficult task, perhaps really impossible, for who is courageous or bold or mad enough to suggest that he is capable of creating himself beyond himself, to assume that he is the carrier of a divine activity?

That is too big. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 47-55

Jung: My soul, speak to me!

S. What reason do you have to hesitate and doubt? Didn't you see how everything develops? What lives is just-so. Why should you let yourself fret? Has the white one accepted anything? Doesn't she incessantly make conditions and attribute to herself everything that belongs to you? One would like to say that you are too patient, too good, if it weren't too stupid.

I. I'm afraid that your advice is, as ever, too extreme.

S. Isn't the white one extreme? Everything is exaggerated, and resists you. For once just acknowledge this.

I. But love?

S. How does she go about it? Does she care about love in itself? Or only concerning the love that she receives, or doesn't receive. Fulfil her desire, and see how she behaves. If she behaves badly, which is quite possible, you can remain silent again until she becomes reasonable. It is always experimental with her. Since she usually does something worthwhile, you can indeed come somewhat closer to her. Only not too much, since she can appreciate only a little. You always give too much. That is stupid. One must make oneself costly to such people, otherwise you only squander yourself. The Black Books, Vol. VII, page 161-162

[1]Children’s Dreams Seminars

Lecture 4 Psychological Interpretation of Children’s Dreams (Winter Term, 1939/40)

1. General Remarks

(Professor Jung)

Professor Jung: This year I would like to forgo a longer introduction to the technique of dream analysis, and just briefly address a few general questions.

As you know, we apply a structure to the dream, that corresponds to the pattern of a drama.

We distinguish four elements: the introduction often specifies place and time, as well as the actors (dramatis personae) of the dream action.

There follows the exposition, which unfolds the problem of the dream.

It contains, so to speak, the theme, or maybe the question posed by the unconscious. From this arises the peripateia: the dream action leads to increasing complexity, until it reaches a climax and changes—sometimes in the form of a catastrophe.

Finally, the lysis gives a solution or the result of the dream.

As you know, in every interpretation of a dream we first of all ask: How does such a dream come into being? What caused it? What are the experiences of the previous day? What happened? Is there a remarkable situation?

An important additional question is also whether the dreamer is conscious of anything about it; this must by no means be taken for granted.

In the case of children’s dreams as remembered by adults, we are only exceptionally able to ascertain the situation out of which they arose.

And yet we have to try by all means to search for it, and to keep in view the question of causality, even if we cannot answer it empirically for the time being.

We have to reach a point where we can deduce the preceding situation from the dream itself.

Our dream analysis is of value only if we can subsequently detect, from the interpretation, what caused the dream.

Naturally this has to be done with the necessary care, because one can go considerably astray.

In addition, we subject each detail of the dream, its symbolic figures, and the sequence of the actions to a careful examination.

Whenever possible, we take note of the context of each idea or image.

By context, I mean the association material in which the idea is embedded.

When someone says, for example: "I dreamed of a glass," do we then understand what this means?

We don't understand anything yet. It could be a wine glass, a beer glass, a test-tube, a bottle, or a window pane.

First we have to know in which context the image "glass" is situated.

So we can't avoid asking about it, and then, sure enough, we may often hear the most astonishing answers.

In the case of banal ideas—as they so frequently occur in dreams—it perhaps suffices to confine ourselves to taking note of the context; this will not always be sufficient in the case of more complicated ideas, because often precisely the very important things are held back, as the complexes prevent the person from making the statement.

We also know this from the association experiment.

In these cases, we are forced to delve deeper into gathering information on the context, which I have called amplification.

In the interpretation of children's dreams, too, we will have to revert to this method.

As I explained last winter, we have always to reckon with the fact that the child cannot provide any associations to the dream.

In addition, precisely the most important children's dreams are frequently told only much later, so there is no possibility of getting information on the context.

This method of amplification is an expansion, a conscious enrichment.

I make the dreamer focus his interest on the image, and to bring up all associations linked to the image.

This must not be confounded with free association, in which we glide from one association to another, without regard to the initial idea. In doing so, however, we lose the certainty that the final element still has a relation to the initial one.

Of course we encounter complexes, but for that we need no dream, and moreover we don't want to discover complexes anyway;

instead, we want to know what the dream says.

Freud adhered to this method of free association, and he could do that because for him the dream is not the essential thing, whereas for me it is.

For him, it is the façade, for me, the essence. In this I rely on a Jewish authority, the Talmud, where it says: "The dream is its own interpretation," meaning that we have to take the dream for what it is.

We should not see in the dream something different from what it expresses, but we actually have to learn to see differently—that's the difficulty.

When I analyzed an Asian, I noticed the difference: he had an amazing ability to "smell" his context. Unabashedly, he said out loud what we ourselves would have noticed only with great difficulty.

The natural faculties Asian people show in this respect are astonishing.

They are helped, however, by their language, with its richness of images, in which everything is already given.

On the other hand, they are not used to designating something precisely.

Tell an Asian man, "Please, bring me a blade of grass," and he will bring you the whole meadow.

We have lost the larger context, because we see only the separate details; Asians, however, always have an overall picture.

William McDougall has something characteristic to say about this.

He had the typical Western mind, stuck on details.

He was interested in Chinese philosophy, and had trouble understanding the notion of Tao.

So he asked a Chinese—his pupil—about the meaning of Tao, but did not understand anything of what the Chinese explained to him.

So the latter grew impatient, dragged the professor to the window and asked him: “What do you see?” “Houses, cars, people; and also trees, clouds; it is raining and the wind is blowing.”

And the Chinese said: “Well, you see, this is Tao.”

We have to try to gain such an overall picture with the help of amplification, even in the case of very simple dream images.

So, for instance, what does it mean if someone dreams of a rabbit?

Then we must not look at it separately, by itself, but we have to see it in the field, notice how its fur matches the earth; we must also feel that the hunter belongs in this context, and the dog, the corn in the field, and the flowers.

Only then will we know what a rabbit is.

In interpreting the single dream elements, I proceed in this complementary way.

Only from this general view do I realize the meaning, and I’ve had quite a few surprises.

If someone dreams of a bicycle, for example, I will ask: “How would you describe it if I had never seen a bicycle before?”

The dreamer has to create an image for me, to write an elementary school composition, so to speak, so that I will know how he sees it.

A downright “myth” of the bicycle can result from such a description.

Perhaps we discover that it is a sun wagon, in which a ghost journey is made.

The primitive mythology of the European may come to light on such an occasion.

In using this method, we are not necessarily bound to the concrete statement of the dreamer, but can amplify the dream images ourselves.

In this, we have to revert to those images we all have in common, namely, the archetypal images of the collective unconscious, as they are found in language, myths, and so on.

So we explain a dream by amplifying the range of the image for each single element, in using all our knowledge.

To verify an interpretation, we must have a look not only at the dream by itself, but maybe also in the context of a whole series.

Then we will often discover that the dreamer had a dream right before or afterward, in which our interpretation is already contained. In a series we can compare dreams with one another and thus eliminate errors.

Let me give you an example for such a verification: I was told a dream in which the patient's father holds a globe, trying to divide it into two halves, such that there would be exactly the same number of people in the East as in the West.

The dream reminded me of the history of creation in Genesis, in which God also makes a division, when on the second day He divided the waters that were under the firmament from the waters that were above the firmament.

From this I concluded that a process of growing consciousness had occurred in the dreamer, that he had started to think consciously and autonomously.

This hypothesis could later be verified.

This person had already dreamed of the act of creation the night before; he had dreamed that God had created a world with lightning and thunder.

Of this dream, however, I knew nothing.

You see how we can retrospectively verify the interpretation of a single dream image in the context of a dream series.

1. Dream of a Ten-Year-Old Girl of a Snake with Eyes

Sparkling Like Diamonds

Presented by Marie-Louise von Franz

Text: A snake with eyes sparkling like diamonds chases me in a forest or in my bedroom.

This dream frightens me so much that I no longer dare move in the bed, because even when awake, everywhere in the room I see the glowing eyes of the snake that wants to bite me.

Ms. von Franz: As is evident from the text, the dream has often recurred.

When a dream appears with such forcefulness, we have to conclude that it will be of central importance for the dreamer's psychology, indeed, that the situation here depicted will perhaps govern her whole life.

Already among the primitives, recurrent dreams are accorded a very special importance.

Now, the difficulty in the interpretation of this dream lies in the fact that it does not really have a plot or activity, but only contains one single image; therefore, we are not able to apply the usual dramatic schema (exposition, statement of the problem, peripateia, lysis or catastrophe).

In fact, the dream takes the form of a vision, of an apparition, which is also confirmed by the fact that the dreamer still sees the snake “even when awake”—we would say half-asleep.

She does not dare move in the bed, “because even when awake, everywhere in the room I still see the glowing eyes of the snake that wants to bite me.”

Thus, the image appears so intensely that, like a vision in the waking state, it is even able to interrupt the continuity of waking consciousness.

So we have only the image of the snake by which to orient ourselves, an image which, as you know, is so enormously widespread in all religions and myths of the world that, frankly speaking, I was able to draw only very general conclusions regarding the situation of the dreamer.

A few details of the description, however, may perhaps show the path to the particular way in which the dreamer reacted—that is, the emphasis on the gaze of the snake, the eyes, described first as sparkling like diamonds, then, in a gradual increase of its evil character, as glowing, and, by the final sentence, that the snake “wants to bite her.”

As far as the snake in general is concerned, it nearly always belongs to the chthonic-female element of religions, indeed it very often is its embodiment proper.

In dualistically oriented systems, therefore, it often stands in opposition to a bright, male, spiritual world, from whose perspective it represents the demonic-evil.

Through the story of Paradise, the snake has, as it were, taken this meaning for the whole Christian world.

Philo of Alexandria in particular, probably under Persian influence, contributed to this snake symbolism and to the development of the devil concept.

For him, however, it is at the same time also the most spiritual animal, of a fiery nature and of great velocity.

Through its ability to shed its skin, it is even immortal.

But in other cultures, too, the snake plays the role of the primal enemy of the upper world of the gods: the Midgard snake, together with the Fenris wolf, threatens the gods in Asgard by creating a flood.

In Greece it is Gaia, the earth goddess, who creates half-snakes, the Titans, who storm Olympus and wrestle with Zeus.

Simultaneously, she is themother of Echidna ( snake), of the Sphinx, Cerberus, and others.

Leviathan, too, the antagonist of Jehovah, is a snake, a dragon at the bottom of the sea.

In the Mithras cult, the snake is the animal opposed to life that, together with the scorpion and the ant, absorbs the life-giving effect of the bull sacrifice.

It is the antagonist of the lion, the damp, cold, dark animal in contrast to the animal of the heat of the sun.

It devours the vital force of the sacrificed bull, or it wraps itself around a Kratér (vessel), with the lion facing her.

It stands in a similar opposition to the lion as it does to the eagle, which is the sun-bird and spiritual principle.

Thus, an eagle sits on top of the Germanic world tree, but a dragon dwells below, while the squirrel Ratatwiskr (bearer of discord) transmits mutual insults.

In Indian mythology and in fairy tales, the races of the snakes and eagles are eternal enemies, and seek to destroy each other.

Once, the snakes outwitted the eagles, which then had to serve them, but the eagle Garuda, Vishnu’s mount, stole the soma, the drink of immortality that he was supposed to obtain for them.

A North American fairy tale recounts that a child-stealing witch seizes the hero Tsoavits, but an eagle leads him back again.

At this, the witch seeks help from her grandfather, the giant snake, but is devoured by him on the spot. “Ever since all witches have been snakelike.”

The snake is also closely related to the basilisk or dragon, whose defeat signals the beginning of nearly every heroic legend.

I will mention only Heracles and the lernaic snake, and Siegfried and the Christian St. George, both modeled after him.

In wanting to help the bright upper world to achieve victory, indeed by embodying the new sun himself, the hero stands in opposition to the snake.

It is because of this that two snakes—sent by Hera, the evil Great Mother—already threaten Heracles in his crib; later she sends him fits of madness, during which he even kills his own children.

A snake also steals the herb of immortality, obtained with great difficulty, from Gilgamesh, while he is inattentively bathing in a pond.

The hero Philoctetes, too, a figure identical with Heracles, is bitten by a snake in the foot because of the curse from the nymph Chryse, whose love he did not requite; he slowly wastes away from the wound.

In a very similar way, the son god Re is poisoned, according to an Egyptian hymn, by a venerable worm, formed out of his own saliva and laid in his way by Isis, who is enraged at him.

She then heals him only after he discloses his name to her, but his power remains broken.

Apollo also had to first conquer the python in Delphi before he could create his oracles there.

Strangely enough, such prophetic abilities often arise out of defeating a dragon, just as Siegfried understands the voices of the birds after having eaten Fafner's flesh.

As far as the especially numerous snake and dragon fights in Greek mythology are concerned, it should be pointed out that matriarchy had ruled in the Aegean culture before the Indo-Germanic populations of the Greeks invaded it about 2,000 B.C., and that the cults of the Great Mother, later worshipped as Cybele, Agdistis, Mountain Mother, Artemis of Ephesus, and so on, stem from this time.

(As a matter of fact, we know about the free status of women in Crete.)

This Great Mother was often depicted together with a snake.

The shield goddess Athena, too, is pre-Greek, and often the snake is her companion (compare Phidias's depiction).

Hence, for the Greeks, overcoming the snake means at the same time overcoming the goddess of the ground, overcoming the unconscious reemergence of the pre-Greek layer, which in the postclassical period broke through again in the mysteries of Cybele, Sabazio, the Phrygian Mother goddess, and others, and which has inundated the whole spectrum of Mediterranean culture.

It is quite clear from this compilation of images that the snake symbolizes the vital, instinctual, and drive stirrings in man, his unconscious dark side in contrast to brightness, to the conscious side of his nature.

Scientifically speaking, the snake has only a cerebrospinal nervous system, and so represents all the stirrings originating in this sphere. In various Gnostic systems it is identified with the human spinal cord, proof that already then one was aware of these correspondences.

This is a direct parallel to the Indian Kundalini snake in Kundalini yoga, climbing up and down in the spinal cord.

In the contexts previously described, the snake plays the role of an evil demon, hostile to light, and represents a dark, ambiguous deity of the depths.

But this is only one side of its being; at the same time it is also a god of healing and salvation. In the mysteries of Sabazios it represented the highest deity: according to the testimony of Clement of Alexandria, a snake was pulled through the abdomen of mystics.

Arnobius also testifies that a golden snake was drawn through the clothing of the initiated.

The snake is the oJ dia; covgpou Qeov , and the ritual signifies the mystical unification with the deity, toward whom the mystic is in a feminine position.

Similarly, the snake is the animal accompanying and, in earlier stages, personifying Asklepios; according to Artemidorus, its appearance in dreams of the sick signals healing and the return of vital power.

A Grimm fairy tale shows particularly well how strongly it is associated with the mysterious vital power of a human being: a child who eats with a snake thrives until his mother slays the snake.

From this moment on the child, too, loses weight and wastes away until he finally dies. Likewise, Porphyry writes in the biography of his revered teacher, Plotinus, that the latter's disciples had observed by his bedside, a few days before his death, how a snake came out of Plotinus's mouth and left; the master died shortly thereafter.

For these reasons the appearance of a snake at the sickbed can also mean death.

It was also generally assumed that the souls of the dead would live on as chthonic snake gods, as inhabitants of the underworld where they became guardians of a treasure.

Thus, snakes were ritualistically worshipped in holes and crevices in the ground in the Asklepieias of Ptolemy and Hygieia.

At the so-called Arrhetophorias, obols and cakes in the form of a snake or phallus were sacrificed in crevices in the ground.

An erect snake made of granite was found in the pits.

Thus the snake becomes the guardian of the secret treasure, and very often also the possessor of the herb of life (compare the Indian fairy tale in which it wants to have the soma potion) with which it can reawaken the dead.

A Greek saga recounts that the hero Glaucus, sitting next to the corpse of his murdered friend Polyeides, catches sight of a snake, which he slays.

Thereafter a second snake appears, fetches an herb, returns, and reanimates its dead friend.

At this they disappear together and leave the herb for Glaucus, who revives his friend

Polyeides with it.

This motif emerges in identical form in the Grimm fairy tale “The Three Snake Leaves,” and in numerous other fairy tales.

When the snake, as I mentioned in the beginning, steals the herb of life from Gilgamesh in a moment of inattention or unconsciousness, this somehow belongs to this same sphere.

The snake arrives there, attracted by the scent of the flower that Gilgamesh had fished up from the bottom of the sea along with the herb, and, one is almost tempted to say, takes back what is hers.

Perhaps you recall the dream series that was discussed at the end of last winter, in which a boy dreams that he is searching for a transparent stone and that a lion, also wanting the lapis, appears at that moment—similarly, the snake is also a lover of stone or the herb of life.

(Incidentally, in that series, a white snake with black crosses on its back appears in a dream directly preceding the former, a symbolically depicted soter snake, the serpens mercurii, which dwells in the earth. And earlier still, it was the spring, the water of life, with which it is identical.)

The snake is not only the guardian of the stone or herb, however; it is essentially identical with it, or contains it in itself.

The Indians believe that the cobra carries a diamond in its head; and an Indian fairy tale recounts that a snake daily brings a scholar a gold piece for reading to it from spiritual works in a garden, until the old man’s greedy son hits the snake on the head and breaks the jewel inside; the snake kills the son in revenge and disappears, lamenting: “Woe, who has shattered my jewel?”

The particular reason why I presented this fairy tale is because such an association may resonate in the expression of our dream text: “eyes sparkling like diamonds.”

As already suggested, the snake and its relation to the lapis play an essential role in alchemy.

Thus, a text from the Musaeum Hermeticum says: “A terrifying dragon lives in the forest who lacks nothing; when it sees the sun’s rays, it forgets its poison and flies so dreadfully that no living animal can resist and not even the basilisk is its equal. Whoever knows how to kill it wisely . . . will escape all dangers . . . and its poison turns into the ultimate medicina. Suddenly it swallows its own poison by eating its own poisonous tail. It is forced to complete all that within itself. Then a magnificent balsam will flow forth from it.”

A thought parallel to this is that the gold is already present in the initial situation, but that it is either old and sterile or compositum; this gold is dissolved in a type of aqua fortis, which corresponds to the snake.

Yet, the whole process is something taking its course within itself, which is why it is also said that a punctum igneitatis exists in Mercury himself through which that (immanent) dissolution happens.

I do not want to go into this alchemical problem here any longer, but to address instead a source of alchemical symbolism, the concepts of the Gnostic sects of the Ophites and Naassenes.

Ophis is Greek for snake. Likewise, Naas is the Hebrew word for snake.

The Gnostics gave themselves these names in saying “that they alone could grasp the depths of God.”

Thus the snake is the deus absconditus, the dark, deep, incomprehensible side of God.

The so-called Perates, too, especially elaborated on the theory of the snake.

“The primeval power originating from the father, the logos, is a snake; so are the stars, but they are the evil snakes. This is why Moses shows the perfect snake to the children of Israel. . . . Whoever sets his hopes on it will not be destroyed by the snakes of the desert, that is, the gods of creation. This all-encompassing snake is the wise logos of Eva, this is the mystery of Eden, this is the river that flows out of Eden.”

This explains the meaning of the words “and as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up.”

The snake is the “great beginning,” of which it is said: “In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God.

The same was in the beginning with God.

All things were made by him; and without him was not any thing made that was made.”

What is made by it is life. The snake stands for vital power, as we have seen.

Eve originated through it; Eve is life. This Eve is the mother of anything alive.

The evil materia, however, in contrast to the logos, is also, in the final analysis, a snake.

At first, it is the water to the Perates, flowing around the world as in a ring; it is Kronos.

They say of it: “It is a power bright as water, and no creature can escape this power, Chronos; it is the reason why each creature is doomed to perish; it is the water of Styx."

One can view the battle of these two snakes in the sky: "The logos is the constellation of the dragon; to the right and left of it are the crown and lyre. In front of the dragon kneels that pitiable man, Heracles. Behind his back the evil master of this world, the constellation of the snake, draws nearer so as to steal the crown from him. The bearer of the snake, however, keeps them together and prevents it from touching the crown."

Here again, the snake is aiming at what is most valuable.

The main ritual of the Perates, the evening meal, proceeded as follows: they piled loaves of bread on the table and summoned the snake that, as a holy animal, was cared for in a container box.

The snake came near and slithered on top of the loaves.

Through this the breads were consecrated.

Each member kissed the snake on the mouth and prostrated himself before it.

Thus logos is present in the form of the snake at the Lord's Supper.

It is Christ both as logos and as snake.

The rituals of the Sabazios mysteries, mentioned earlier, also belong to this area; they are the coniunctio with the divine logos.

But in other cultures as well, the snake is the savior of the logos: Quetzalcoatl, the god of the Toltecs, is a winged snake, the son of the "cloud snake," who appears as the bearer of culture and savior.

Upon Tollan's fall, he again disappears in a lake in the form of a snake.

According to the Gnostics, the evil snake, too, was not evil originally, but became so as follows: Justinos recounts that on his journey west, Heracles had united with a virgin, half snake, half human (cf. Herodotus), in order to regain his stolen horse.

Elohim likewise is said to have united with a virgin half-snake and half-human, called Eden or Israel, and to have procreated with her twelve paternal angels and twelve maternal ones.

He then leaves her and returns to the upper, good god.

Out of her sorrow at having been left, she then becomes that evil power, hostile toward God.

Her servant, the angel Naas (snake), later brings about the crucifixion of Christ; Christ, however, left Eden his body on the cross, with the words: "Woman, behold thy son!"

But these are the very words Christ spoke to Mary when he entrusted John to her.

So John is, as it were, the body, the mortal part of Christ!

Strangely enough, in medieval art John, too, has the characteristics of a snake.

In a picture of Quentin Matsys, he holds a communion cup containing a small dragon, which he consecrates.

In the great division of the cosmos, shared by nearly all Gnostic sects, there are three realms, and always right at the bottom there is the snake leviathan, the ouroboros, reappearing in alchemy.

But the latter is Eve, that is, life. Leviathan is the master of this world, of whom it is said in Isaiah 27:1: "In that day the LORD with his sore and great and strong sword shall punish leviathan the piercing serpent, even leviathan that crooked serpent; and he shall slay the dragon that is in the sea."

Alchemy also knows—besides the tail-eater who unites the opposites in itself—the image of two snakes uniting, a fleeing and a wingless one (see also the contrast eagle—snake).

I turn now to one last aspect of the snake, actually already contained in the preceding one: the snake as a time symbol.

It is the snake that is Chronos, Greek for time.

It is the ring of coming into being, the en tov pan (one and all). "All cults and mysteries serve it. As Oceanos or Jordan it is the humid substance, and nothing in the world—immortal or mortal—can exist without it. Everything is subject to it, and it itself is good, and, just as in the horn of the one-horned bull (Moses), it embraces the beauty of all other things . . .like the river rising in Eden and dividing itself into four origins."

Simon Magus, however, says: "And it is always one and the same, that which is living in us, that which lives and is dead, and which is awake and asleep, and is young and old.

When it changes, the latter is the former, and again the former, when it changes, is the latter."

Meister Eckhart calls this "the river flown into itself."

Christ was also interpreted in this sense as the great ecclesiastical year; he was the Zodiacal snake, whose pictures represent the twelve apostles.

The Indian god of creation Prajapati, too, is the world year.

The idea that the snake represents time, the coming into being, and the durée créatrice is probably connected with the fact that it sheds its skin.

Many fairy tales of the primitives interpret this as a reincarnation, and infer the snake's immortality from this.

We have also heard that Philo regarded it as immortal. So that is probably also the reason why it is in possession of the herb of immortality.

In Mithraism one has also found the figure of a god with a lion head, on whom a snake winds upward, laying its head upon his.

He is the god Aion or Zervan, the god of eternal duration.

Similarly, in Kundalini yoga the snake, climbing up the spine and touching the various chakras in a temporal development, stands for the vital force by which man is simultaneously put into the course of time.

It stands for nature in contrast to the spirit, yet at the same time it is the principle heading to the lapis, to perfection beyond nature.

It is quite impossible to bring some order into the whole wealth of this material, and still harder to interpret the meaning and the real essence of the snake as a symbol.

When I stressed three main aspects—the snake as earth demon, as savior, and as time symbol—this was just an attempt to organize the many aspects.

When the snake appears in a dream, you basically have to take into account all three aspects.

I now come back to the dream to evaluate the remaining details of the description.

The snake appears to the girl either in the forest, or it chases her as far as into her bedroom.

The encounter in the woods is, so to speak, the more natural place, because the forest stands for the dark, unconscious side, where one meets one's animals and projections. Initially it looks as if the dreamer came to meet the snake.

But then the situation is reversed; the snake chases the dreamer as far as into her bedroom.

There exists an intense attraction between the snake and the child; the snake becomes active and the child thinks it wants to bite her.

It haunts her with glowing eyes, sparkling like diamonds.

The snake is famed for its gaze, by which it hypnotizes its victims, to devour them afterward; one also says of certain women, the “vamp” type who exerts a kind of terrifying attraction, that they would have that snakelike gaze.

Its eyes sparkling like diamonds could be an indication that the snake does after all possess the diamond, the lapis, carrying it in its head, whereby it would not only have the pure, negative instinctual characteristic, but also, as seems to be indicated, the possibility of higher consciousness.

The glowing eyes are easy to explain.

As has often been said, the snake is connected with the secret fire; it carries within itself the punctum igneitatis of self-destruction; it is also in connection with the fiery lion.

Mercury is the kyllenian fire, and many dragons in mythology are fire-spitting monsters; all of this has to do with the fact that it dwells in the depths of the earth, psychologically speaking, that it has to do with the sphere of emotional outbreaks, with the drives.

By the way, the motif of the snake’s eyes is sometimes accentuated in other contexts, too.

You may remember the vision of St. Ignatius, from the lecture at the beginning of this summer, to whom a snake with many eyes appeared after rigorous ascetic exercises.

He says that a certain something appeared to him, beautiful and great, greatly comforting him.

Sometimes it would have been a snake full of sparkling eyes, although it was not eyes.

Later he interprets this as a vision of the devil, and wards it off.

Argus, too, is such a dragon figure with innumerable eyes.

This multiplicity of eyes may be connected with the multiplicity of subliminal perceptions: man is, so to speak, more clear-sighted in the unconscious than in the conscious, and, above all, sees into many more directions simultaneously.

Hence the snake’s power of prediction, also bestowing the gift to understand birds’ voices.

The last remaining statement of the dream says: “the snake that wants to bite me.”

It is questionable if this is so objectively.

In any case the child supposes this, because she is frightened.

Because she flees the snake, the latter chases her, for it just wants to get near her.

Obviously, it wants to unite with her in one form or another, and chases her as far as into her bedroom, that is, into her most intimate living space.

The girl rejects it, however, being frightened by its instinctual, negative, demonic aspect. Incidentally, in many Asian fairy tales we find the motif that girls transform themselves into snakes at night, or, conversely, that snakes walk as girls, or one sees how at night snakes glide into a girl's mouth.

This is interpreted as possession by a demon.

So we might assume that the dreamer has a conscious attitude that cannot accept this power the snake stands for, a so-called Christian attitude, which, of course, can only be the result of the milieu; or else a too orderly, well-behaved, rational scope of consciousness, which naturally provokes, attracts, and at the same time rejects the snake as its counterpart.

The girl being young, the snake might well rather stand for temptations of a worldly nature, that is, for life and "the lord of this world," whom the snake after all represents.

If she cannot accept it, the snake will probably poison her and create a flood, that is, an inundation of her consciousness with unconscious images.

For the rest, it can be said of the problem that the child faces a rather common situation, which makes a solution more likely.

Professor Jung: In her exhaustive paper, Ms. von Franz has very beautifully pointed out the three main aspects of the snake symbol: the aspects of the chthonic snake, the soter, and the time snake.

You can now picture how ambiguous this symbol is, and how manifold its manifestations are.

The snake touches on the deepest instincts of man, so that from time immemorial one thought it to be in possession of great secrets.

Let us now deal with our dream in detail. It is a snake vision.

The girl is threatened by an enigmatic snake that is very intense and alive.

That it assumes such a concrete form is striking and indicates that it plays an important role in the dream.

Participant: Doesn't the frequent recurrence of the image also point to its importance?

Professor Jung: Yes, we have to assume that the dream has quite a special importance for the psychic disposition of the child. What follows from the snake's assuming such a concrete form and from the intensity for the dreamer?

Participant: That the unconscious seeks to forcefully assert itself.

Professor Jung: When is this the case?

Participant: When consciousness is split off from the unconscious.

Professor Jung: Yes, there has to be a strong splitting off of the unconscious, probably having existed for years.

There are many reasons for such a phenomenon of splitting.

As a rule, they lie in the environmental conditions, for example, in the relationship of the parents to each other.

It is not uncommon that the split in the child is a reflection of the conflict between father and mother.

Here we may thus assume that there is a certain tension between the parents, not allowing the child to find herself.

Of course, there are also other reasons for the split that needn't be related to the parents or other environmental factors, but are determined purely intrapsychically. What could those be?

Participant: Perhaps a psychic trauma?

Professor Jung: That, too, would somehow be determined externally.

Participant: It could be an inherited disposition to anxiety.

Professor Jung: This, too, would follow from the parents' psychology.

In addition, the fear of the snake cannot be readily explained in the context of inheritance; it is simply there.

Either you fear a snake, or you don't.

There are individuals for whom a stay in the tropics becomes a perfect hell because of their constant fear of running into a snake.

After all, it is very inconvenient to suddenly discover a snake in your bed, or in your shoes, in your trousers, in the cupboard, or in all sorts of impossible places.

Snakes are always where you don't suspect them.

The uncanny thing with these animals is that they are completely inhuman; they aren't in any rapport with human beings.

The snake wardens in the zoos know this.

For some time, the snakes let one do anything with them, and one day they wind themselves around the warden with lightning speed, trying to squeeze him to death.

You can make contact with nearly all animals, but there seems to be no possible psychic bridge to the cold-blooded animals any longer, although they let themselves be hypnotized, as we know.

No “niceties” any longer here.

But now back to our question: What would an inner motive for the split be?

Participant: There could be too great a stress on consciousness.

Professor Jung: But this again would be related to the environment; we have to find an inner cause.

Participant: Maybe the child is strongly determined by the former ages, through the “Bardo,” and has difficulties in developing into reality.

Professor Jung: I am thinking of something else, namely, of cases in which a content emerges from within quite spontaneously, without causal involvement of the environment.

Participant: Could it be a psychic inclusion?

Professor Jung: Yes, that’s what I mean.

I am calling this a psychic teratoma. This is a term borrowed from medicine.

There it refers to a kind of tumor as the result of a developmental disorder, and containing parts of a twin, for example, hair, teeth, finger parts, an eye, and so on.

Teratomas are to be conceived of as an incomplete development of a fetus that is included in the other, fully developing twin.

Something analogous exists in the psychic realm too; though one can’t talk of a psychic twin, but rather of an encapsulated entity of inheritance.

You all know what an entity of inheritance is, don’t you?

You know, for instance, the peculiarity of the lower lip in the Habsburg family, although it has nothing to do with a teratoma.

Now, if an entity of inheritance simply grows along unbeknownst to the individual, then we are dealing with a kind of teratoma.

It is like the inclusion of something alien that is not properly connected to the surrounding environment.

This creates a character who, on the one hand, may have a normal disposition, but in whom, on the other, something is hidden that doesn’t want at all to connect with the rest of the person.

It's not always easy to identify a teratoma; when folks say, for instance, "Now that's a very nice guy; unfortunately he's inherited that particular family trait that ruins his whole life," there needn't necessarily be a teratoma present, but it may point to some manifest feature, such as mendacity, alcoholism, or the like.

If something completely incommensurable is enclosed in the character, however, something that in no way would fit the character or could be derived from his mentality, then we can assume the existence of a teratoma.

When this part of the soul becomes conscious it can cause immense disturbance.

That is why one may touch this encapsulated world only with utmost caution, because otherwise there is the danger that all of a sudden a second personality erupts.

Such cases can be observed in the mentally insane.

Do you think that the present case could point to such a teratoma?

Participant: No, it wouldn't manifest itself as such a general symbol.

Professor Jung: Quite right.

As I described it, the characteristic feature of the teratoma lies in the fact that it is a pathologically grotesque phenomenon, for example, consisting of only one eye, or two teeth, and so on.

The snake in our dream has no such pathological character at all, but is a general symbol.

So, by no means is it a teratoma.

What then can, on the contrary, be concluded from this universal symbol?

Participant: That the child is not abnormal.

Professor Jung: Yes, that she is quite normal overall.

Only the facts of concretism and the force personified in the snake are striking, both being strongly accentuated. So where must we locate the reason for the split?

Participant: In environmental influences.

Professor Jung: Yes, very probably there must exist parental influences, affecting an in itself normal disposition of the child, and causing there a split that is an adequate answer to the situation at home.

The cause of the split, with which we are obviously dealing here, is thus clarified.

We now arrive at the question: “How should we conceive the character of the split?”

Naturally, such a disturbance affects the child’s whole behavior.

Don’t forget that this anxiety-triggering figure is very dynamic and contains very much energy.

What does this mean for the consciousness of the child?

Participant: There is a certain paralysis of expression.

Professor Jung: Yes, one could say that.

Participant: The instinct is missing.

Professor Jung: Yes, the instinctive is missing. With what influence on consciousness?

Participant: Problems in adaptation.

Professor Jung: Well, I am thinking of a certain, and quite frequent, form of difficulty to adapt.

The snake represents, as we have seen, the instinctive, unconscious life, which actually contains the complete expression of the unconscious.

There lies in it a blind naturalness closely connected with instinct.

If all of this is unconscious, the conscious personality will lack it.

What impression does it then make?

Participant: An intellectual or not genuine impression.

Professor Jung: That is too negative an expression; I’d rather say: it makes the impression of an artificial personality, imitating what it finds in its environment.

For instance, it lets itself be governed by the opinions in its environment and adapts to these with a minimum of effort. It lacks, as it were, the “real” thing.

A relatively normal person can get away with this attitude for a long time.

Quite a few individuals live with an artificial personality, and they also get away with it—until the point when the function of instinct is absolutely of the essence.

Now, which moment is that?

Participant: When you fall in love or marry.

Professor Jung: Yes, when someone marries, or just falls in love.

Then you are challenged.

Because then you can't enforce it any longer with the artificial personality, then you have to be connected to the deeper sources.

If the entire snake entity is in the unconscious and therefore invisible, then the conscious personality will be more or less artificial.

But there are cases in which the snake entity is, at least partially, absorbed by the conscious personality.

How does such a person strike you then?

Participant: As very contradictory.

Professor Jung: Yes, these individuals have a double personality.

On the one hand, they are reasonable and adjusted; maybe too much adjusted, you know, just a bit subdued, not very obviously, or yet a bit obvious on the one side, be it intellectually or emotionally, depending on their talents. In the main, the differentiated function will take over and will lead the personality.

On the other hand, this is somebody who is very different.

These cases are very frequent.

There are also children who show this double quality to a more or less high degree; above all, it's the well-bred children who suddenly play all kinds of mischievous tricks round the next corner.

In the grown-up it often takes just a bit of alcohol to make the other personality come to the fore.

Then you say: "I had no idea you could be like that."

Often, the person concerned didn't know it either, until it just happened to him and the other side of his personality broke through.

Such individuals are often the "other" at the wrong place.

It is in this way, as we know, that many things come to light.

In a way, they are committing indiscretions toward themselves.

In the case of these splits, the one personality often has a taste contrary to that of the other.

What will happen then?

Participant: Such a person will, for instance, say at home just the opposite of what he says outside of it.

Professor Jung: Yes, a devil at home and an angel on the streets.

This expresses itself in a child so that at school he shows a completely different character from at home.

This expression is only too well known.

Children with a striking split, for instance, behave quite atrociously toward their mothers, while they are polite and nice with other people, or, conversely, they are lovely and nice at home, and somewhere else behave like the worst street kids.

Such children find special fun in deceiving the adults, and in doing so feel like little martyrs:

“Oh, if you only knew how I really am. You really deserve it that you hurt me.”

They find it extremely attractive to think: “If you only knew how I suffer, but I just don’t tell.”

I remember my own school times in Basel.

There was a kid who had to wear white gloves on Sundays.

Once she came to the countryside; there, she raised her head, marched into the meadow in her white lace, and finally put the excrement found there into her mouth.

Such piggery would never have entered the heads of the village kids.

It is precisely the well-bred children who develop such obsessions.

They think of the oddest things, because these belong to the side of their personality of which they hadn’t had any idea.

When they see something horrible lying in the street, a toad, for instance, they have to eat it.

As a rule, children with such splits really develop two characters.

So, if we know about this split, what would we then tell such a child?

Participant: That he is at odds with himself.

Professor Jung: Yes, one could tell the child that to his face.

You are at odds with yourself; you say “yes,” and it says “no,” or the other way round. The child actually understands such language: You want to obey the parents, and then something happens that comes in between.

You should do your homework, and then you can't do it.

You also should be nice in school, and then it doesn't work.

These are opposites in which the split manifests itself, and which the child knows very well.

He will also tell you examples of his own, and then you can quite naturally bring up the question of how all this feels for the child, and how one could possibly address this situation.

Participant: Couldn't one also ask him how and when he feels best?

Professor Jung: That is too complicated a question. I'd rather ask:

"Say, how come you're so different at home from at school?" Or: "Really, how come in school you're so terribly naughty?"

It wouldn't make much sense just to ask with regard to the school alone, because the school is only secondary to the child, but he may well know to tell a quite different tale about the parents.

Participant: But perhaps the child doesn't yet know anything about that.

Professor Jung: Perhaps—but a ten-year-old girl usually knows already much more than the parents would guess. In these years the question already arises: "How do I tell my parents?"

I myself have unlearned being naive about children.

I'm no longer naive about a ten year-old girl.

You are pointing right to the center of the problem with all these questions regarding the child's being at odds with herself.

If you focus completely on this schism, you will understand not only the dream, you will also understand the child.

The dream not only describes the situation of the child, but also allows us to say something about the prognosis.

Which details of the dream could we take as a starting point here?

Participant: The snake wants to devour the dreamer.

Professor Jung: Yes, this stands for an intense relation between the halves split off from each other.

What do you conclude from that?

Participant: That the dreamer wants to assimilate the snake.

Professor Jung: Of course, both attract each other with great force.

The snake wants with all its might to come near her, and she is fascinated.

So you can bet that both halves will come together at some point, that under favorable conditions, in other words, the split will be overcome.

The prognosis of this split is good, because the child and the snake are intensely relating to each other, which, it is true, still expresses itself in the child as strong anxiety.

At that moment the unification of the opposites was quite impossible for the child; but one may assume that in the course of time the mutual attraction will eventually make itself felt.

Now we still have to deal in more detail with the nature of the snake!

In this dream the eyes in particular are very impressive.

They are described as sparkling like diamonds and glowing.

Ms. von Franz has, therefore, correctly stressed their importance.

The eye really is he seat of fascinating fright; the attraction and the threat come from

A good parallel to this is the snake with the many eyes in the vision of Ignatius.

The stress on the eyes differentiates the snake in the dream from the dim poisonous snake and points to the fact that it contains an inner light and fire.

What would you conclude from that? To what could this point?

Participant: That the snake contains the light of consciousness.

Professor Jung: Yes, that it has a consciousness in it, that it is, so to speak, the second person of the dreamer who, however, has completely merged with the unconscious.

What meaning, then, does the snake have here?

Participant: The meaning of the soter snake.

Professor Jung: Quite so; one could conclude with some certainty from the dream that this snake is a kind of bearer of the light, or at least a bearer of the diamond, the glowing stone.

In alchemy we find the idea that the stone, the lapis philosophorum, can be found in the brain and is, therefore, also called the brain stone.

The same idea can be found in our dream, too: there seems to be a light hidden in the brain of the snake.

It announces the capability of an extended consciousness, not yet present at the moment.

For the time being, there is a restricted consciousness, as is normal for the child; at the same time, the possibility that at some later point consciousness can expand is hinted at.

The reason why we may draw this conclusion is that the snake here is a soter snake.

The chthonic snake, with its character of the earth demon, of evil, would not directly lead to a healing outcome, because it is only drive, which, as such, brings hardly any promise with it.

Participant: Could one assume that in life the child is fascinated by precisely those figures in which the quality of light is prominent?

Professor Jung: This is a quite natural conclusion, as the whole religious question is being raised with the image of the soter snake.

The Soter snake has a distinctly spiritual meaning.

That’s why Christ is often depicted as a snake.

Such representations are frequent in the Middle Ages.

The snake is the symbol of secret wisdom and promises the revelation of hidden things and knowledge.

It offers instinctive, as opposed to intellectual, knowledge. What’s the term for this?

Participant: Intuition.

Professor Jung: This is not knowledge, but a perception.

Participant: Inner view.

Professor Jung: That’s right.

Participant: Illumination.

Professor Jung: That's its consequence.

Participant: Revelation.

Participant: Belief.

Professor Jung: That's quite right, but not in the sense we today conceive of belief, as scientia fidei, as science of belief.

What I mean is gnosis.

This is knowledge of an irrational nature, different from the arbitrary act of thinking.

It is an event, a self-revelation, a mental activity, the result of a quite peculiar spiritual situation.

When you study the Gnostics you will find similar ideas.

The Gnostics preach snake wisdom, that is, knowledge coming from nature itself.

There is also a specifically Christian gnosis.

You can barely trace the secret of this knowledge.

Rationally, it can't be explained at all.

You get an idea of this difficulty when you ask how the dogma of the trinity came into being.

This is gnosis, knowledge springing from inner experience.

Participant: Couldn't one call this knowledge also mystical knowledge?

Professor Jung: That would be a metaphysical term.

We view this question, however, from the psychological standpoint.

Then we understand that there is still another way of gaining knowledge that is simultaneously a life process.

Naturally, these things are alien to us, but they become more understandable if we make ourselves acquainted with the psyche of Eastern man.

In the East, the intellectual thinking processes recede very much into the background; the whole philosophy of the Upanishads and classical Chinese philosophy, for instance, stem from life processes whose nature is, at the same time, a process of gaining knowledge.

This is a thinking out of the bowels, out of the depths.

This stands in contrast to the academic intellect that is often empty and, as we know, doesn't always do us any good.

For women particularly, it has something destructive.

For what basically concerns her is not the intellect either.

What concerns her is gnosis.

That's why so many women are most deeply disappointed by their university studies, particularly by philosophy, because nowadays philosophy, too, is treated intellectually, in contrast to antiquity, when it was still a life process.

Then it was gnosis, a drive, a fact of nature, an inner need.

It was like water seeping into dry ground.

Gnosis is knowledge stemming from blood.

Thus the alchemists say of the stone: "Invenitur in vena, sanguine plena," that is, the stone or lapis is found in blood-filled veins.

That's why it is also called sanguineus, or carbuncle, or ruby.

This form of knowledge is also expressed in the above-mentioned eye snake of Ignatius.

When he strove for knowledge of God, that snake appeared to him, as if it wanted to tell him: "I am the one with the one hundred eyes that see all and are all-knowing."

These many eyes are, so to speak, as many possibilities of consciousness, corresponding to decentralized functions of consciousness.

The objects of gnosis are quasi self-glowing, and reveal themselves in their own light.

That is also why this process is so often described as a revelation, as an eruption by which the individual is overwhelmed.

It is always a process reposing in itself.

That's the meaning of the snake when one experiences it from within.

The image of the many eyes also appears in alchemy.

The alchemists referred to a passage of the prophet Zechariah, where it says that the eyes of the Lord run to and fro through the whole earth.

They are seven eyes, and according to the testimony of the prophet, they are on the foundation-stone of the new temple.

But the eye is also the self-perception of an unconscious illuminated or capable of being illuminated.

This the alchemists knew and thus they also saw corresponding phenomena in chemical transformations.

They report, for instance, the lighting up of the dark, simmering compound in the flask; they took this to be oriental jewels, which they described as fish eyes; for the so-called piscis rotundus, too, the eyes would have been important: this fish also appears in an Arab legend, where it has only one eye.

It embodies a being living in darkness and possessing, owing to its eye, a peculiar capability of knowledge.

From such inner perceptions stem the images of God.

For everything originating in this inner knowledge forms the basis of such experiences.

The commonness of these experiential processes has also led to the fact that we find concordant God images in the most various places.

We no longer know about these connections and, therefore, think that the God images had been “invented.”

That might be the essence of what one can say about this dream.

There still remain the details of the forest and the bedroom.

The forest is a symbol of the unconscious.

There you can see all kinds of things, but the vision is restricted, just like in water, in which you also can’t look into the depths.

The bedroom is one of the symbols of the unconscious.

But what is the essential difference between forest and bedroom?

Participant: The forest is something collective, the bedroom is a symbol of the personal unconscious.

Professor Jung: Yes, that’s right.

The personal unconscious has an atmosphere one can humanly empathize with; it is personal and intimate.

So we can very well call the bedroom a symbol of the personal unconscious.

Just as the dreamer is displaced from the wide space of the forest into the narrow personal space of the bedroom, so the collective unconscious borders on the personal unconscious.

A process of separation is under way.

This separation is necessary because a clearing of consciousness cannot take place as long as the collective unconscious and the personal unconscious are still undivided.

The personal unconscious is like a laguna that is cut off from the sea by a strip of land, and is forming a little lake or a basin itself.

Just like the latter, the personal unconscious is surveyable, and one can venture out without danger.

Out there, however, is the ocean, the collective.

This difference is crucial for the interpretation of our dream: for when the snake is encountered in the forest, this is more or less a natural phenomenon.

But when it comes into the bedroom, panic arises. Why?

Participant: Because it concerns the dreamer personally.

Professor Jung: In the forest I encounter the snake “by coincidence,” but in the bedroom this goes under my skin, I am most personally touched by it.

This advance of the snake into the personal unconscious is another sign of a good prognosis.

The possibility of a merging of the separated forms is thus hinted at.

Participant: Doesn’t the frequent recurrence also speak for a good prognosis?

Professor Jung: This shows the urgency of the problem that will make itself felt in one way or another.

Participant: But if the importance of the snake is so great, why does the dreamer feel frightened by it?

Professor Jung: It often happens that one fears what has to be, what in the deepest sense belongs to one.

One fears it, and yet wants it at the same time.

One should really press the fear to one’s heart and say: “This is, after all, precisely what I want.”

Participant: Is the fear of being bitten justified?

Professor Jung: Of course, because the snake wants to penetrate her inside, wants to be absorbed in her.

Simultaneously, the poison infiltrates her; the poison, however, that is also a remedy. It is fate, and that's why one fears it.

In the end, one always fears oneself; I don't mean the "I," but fear of the Other in us, the Self. Here, one's fear is justified, because it is a superior force of which one knows: "It belongs to me, and I belong to it."

They both belong together. And yet it is terrible.

1. Dream of a Ten-Year Old Girl of Sinking in the Water Presented by Margret Sachs

Text: I go from the Bellevue across the Quaibrücke and I'm scared, because I know what will happen.

Suddenly, between Bauschänzli and Quaibrücke, I fall into the water in an upright position. Slowly I am sinking deeper and deeper, until I reach the bottom. I nearly drown. Then I wake up.

Mrs. Sachs: This dream is from the same girl whom we know from the last meeting.

First let us try to structure the dream systematically:

Locale: From Bellevue across the quay bridge; the water.

Dramatis persona: The ego of the dreamer.

Exposition: "I'm scared."

Peripateia: "Suddenly I fall into the water in an upright position."

Lysis: The dream shows a possible solution only with the word "nearly."

So something is there that saves the dreamer from the final catastrophe; some yet unknown eventuality might still occur, a backdoor for an escape has been left open.

The frequent recurrence of the dream—it was dreamed "innumerable times"—indicates its importance and its certainly fateful meaning.

To start with, let us try to have a closer look at the locale: "I go from Bellevue across the quay bridge.”

Zurich seems to be the home town of the dreamer, so she does not cross just any bridge in some unknown environment, but the dream is situated in her city, in a place well known to her—an indication that the dream also concerns her own affairs.

She comes from “Bellevue,” a beautiful square in Zurich, which is called “beautiful view” to boot.

For a ten-year-old child, the place with the beautiful view—now lying behind her—might be her past childhood, the security she felt within the family.

From there she comes, and now she crosses the bridge.

Although she does not mention that she has to cross the bridge, she wouldn’t do it if it were up to her, because she is scared.

This is probably a process at the mercy of which she fatefully is; her whole behavior in the dream is also completely passive.

She has already left the place with the beautiful view, the place where life and future seemed “beautiful.”

She is already on the bridge.

Three particular characteristics can be found for “bridge”: it connects two banks, two places of solid ground; it forms a secure way across the water flowing underneath it;

and, third, it is not a natural formation, but man-made.

Bellevue, the bygone beautiful childhood, was solid ground for her.

So there would be adulthood on the other side, and the bridge would represent the transition from childhood to adulthood, namely, puberty.

But Bellevue could also represent any other beautiful point of departure, a secure place, from which she has to move on.

Because of its frequent occurrence, however, the dream can not only stand for a momentary slight difficulty that has to be “bridged,” but has to create an image that throws light on a fundamental situation of the dreamer.

We have to resort to interpretations, therefore, that do justice to the dream’s importance.

For this purpose let us have a look at some examples from history and mythology concerning the keyword “bridge.”

The following examples have been taken from the seminar in the winter term of 1936/37.

It is said that in a text of the Koran a bridge over hell is mentioned, thin as a string and sharp as a sword, which only the righteous can cross.

A Muslim legend further tells of a bridge between the Temple of Jerusalem and the Mount of Olives, between the East and the West.

Below is hell, into which the unrighteous fall.

From the songs of praise of the later “Avesta,” in the compilation of Schaeder, we quote the passage about the “Chinvat bridge, made by Mazda.”

It is the place of the spiritual deities, the point of transition through the ordeal of fire.

“The comely, strong, shapely maiden drags the souls of the bad and deceiving into the darknesses, and leads the souls of the truthful over the Hara brzati and lets them cross the Chinvat bridge.

The ‘Good Sense’ rose from his golden throne and said: ‘How did you get here, oh you truthful one, from the sorrowful existence to the sorrowless existence?”’

As you can see, this bridge leads from this world to the nether world.

Life, too, is the bridge between the cradle and the grave, the bridge between the past and the future.

Thus the bridge takes on a cosmic and religious meaning.

In Gnosis, Leisegang gives an account of the ophitic sect of the Perates, whose name means “traversing,” derived from the Greek word peran.

Philo of Alexandria writes: “We alone, who have realized the necessity in creation, and the ways in which man came into the world, have also profoundly learned it—to traverse—and are also able to cross transience.”

It is an interesting fact that the sect of the Perates venerated the serpent as an expression of the Logos.

Thus we have found a connection to the vision of the child with the snake, which, there too, means Logos or soter.

As a result, the problem with which the dreamer will certainly be confronted in the long term will revolve around “traversing transience” to reach the “sorrowless existence,” revolve around being reborn, not only of water, but also of the spirit, and revolve around the snake of salvation, the soter snake.

Another mythological concept of the bridge is based on the idea that a spirit or a water demon, a bridge ghost, would be underneath it.

By building the bridge we would have escaped his direct influence, but various sacrifices were made to him, human beings at first, and later man-shaped dolls, among other things.

In ancient Rome, in the month of May, a yearly procession led to the Pons Sublicius, the oldest and most famous among Rome's bridges.

On the way, twenty-four chapels, the Sacella Argeorum, were visited, and from each an Argei, a doll representing an old man, was taken along.

Chanting hymns and prayers, the Vestales threw these dolls into the Tiber.

It is assumed that this is a relic from an older epoch, when old men, who were no longer fit for military service, were sacrificed as a yearly tribute to the river god, who had been affronted by the building of the bridge (Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics).

London Bridge is said to have been made durable by being sprinkled with the blood of little children, and legend has it that human sacrifices were made in a bridge building, of the bridge in Arta in Italy, whose pillars collapsed until the bridge builder walled up his own wife in them.

The last relics of these ideas are the chapels built on the former sacrificial sites on the bridges.

On the Spreuer bridge in Lucerne, adorned with pictures of Holbein's Dance of Death, a sanctuary lamp is still burning today in a small altar niche, built in a little oriel above the river Reuss, and many a passerby raises his hat, makes the sign of a cross, or even murmurs a prayer in passing by.

The bridge phobia is a well-known form of phobia, in which even today people are seized—despite all their enlightenment and all the ferroconcrete—by sudden and inexplicable fears, nausea, and pallor when they have to cross a bridge, because the demons of the depths have come to life again for them.

Let us summarize: the bridge is a place of danger for the deceiving and the bad, because they might fall down; but it also symbolizes the situation of a transgression of transience, the path to sorrowless existence.

Significantly, the Pope has taken over the name of Pontifex Maximus, supreme bridge builder, which previously was carried by the Roman emperors.

In the light of psychology, the bridge represents a dangerous, precarious part of consciousness, a path that offers few possibilities of giving way.

The fact that it is man-made, not a natural formation, may indicate that active forces will have to play a part for the "bridging" to be successful.

The bridge arch, stretching from one bank to the other, from one solid place to the other, can also represent that psychic capability which moves on with certainty, with strength, and with confidence about the unknown, as a movement out of itself, into the future to a new task.

Künkel talks about the “suspense arc” [Spannungsbogen] of children, which must be big and long enough to carry the child from one developmental stage to the other, from one difficulty to be mastered to the next.

If the suspense arc is too small, and is insufficient, the child will shy away from his task, will hole up in previous positions, drop back in his development, fall into a great introversion, or even into a regression.

It is for a very good reason that the primitives have their puberty rites, which help “bridge” the transition from childhood to adulthood, from the security in the ritual house to strife and freedom, from innocent ignorance to responsibility.

The separation from the mother, the fasting of many days’ duration, the painful tattoos, the inflicting of pain, for example, knocking out the teeth, and then the bestowing of a new name, as well as the rituals of being devoured and eaten up, with the ensuing salvation and rebirth, as reported by Lévy-Bruhl, Frobenius, and others, all these symbolize the transition, the passing into a new phase in life.

The performance of these rites of passage helps to safely master the transition into the new life situation.

Although our dreamer is not devoured by a giant monster, only to be dragged out of its belly again, she falls prey to another uncanny element that scares her: the water.

The dream situation shows that for the moment she is stuck in the monster’s belly.

Her psychical abilities of bridging, of walking across, are obviously insufficiently developed.

Her bridge fails, it does not stretch to the other side, and she is afraid, “because she knows what will happen.”

She is in the middle of a process that befalls her with fateful irreversibility, she is at its mercy.

Her failure can either be determined by a lack of vitality, caused by an artificial attitude toward life, a one-sidedly accentuated persona stemming from an incorrect education, or it can be determined by the fact that the child’s problem makes such great demands that involuntarily she flinches from addressing it, because she is not yet able to cope with it.

It seems that the indication of the soter snake in the child’s vision discussed earlier, symbolizes the problem of growing up, the transition in puberty, and at the same time the religious problem of transgressing transience to immortality, from sorrowful to sorrowless existence, and also being reborn of water and the spirit.

The child is afraid “because she knows what will happen,” the unconscious senses the danger, the inability to cope with the problems she is confronted with.

“Suddenly, between Bauschänzli and the quay bridge, I fall into the water in an upright position.”

F or the dreamer, these are not the bright waters of the river Limmat, but the uncanny floods with their frightening depths and dangers, commonly seen as a symbol of the unconscious.

Like the unconscious, the water is the element of being transported away, of change, of the secret.

It wells from unknown depths, floods with torrential force, possesses overwhelming power, devours its victims and covers them.

Because of its unfathomable depth, the water is a symbol of the unconscious, and a symbol of life because of its flowing changeability.

In this dream, the accent is on its depth; therefore, we may reasonably assume that here it is rather a representation of the unconscious.

The waters of the rivers Styx and Acheron carry the dead to the other side, from the upper world to the underworld.

The dead haunt fathomless lakes, such as the Mumel lake or the legendary Pilatus lake.

According to Virgil, the entrance to the realm of the dead is at the Lago d’Averno.

Poets and fairy tales tell of the dangers of the depths; the Lorelei draws ships into the vortices of the river Rhine, “half drew she him, half sank he down.”

The water is also the place of transformation: Proteus, the water god, turns into a lion, a snake, a tree; Thetis, the Nereid, transforms herself into a bird and a tree while courting Peleus.

As far as the situation of the dreamer at that moment is concerned, it seems as if only the negative aspects of the water would have to be taken into account; for just as she fled from the snake in her vision, she here is afraid of the water and nearly drowns in it.

At the moment it has, just like the snake, a frightening and nearly destructive influence.

If we focus our interest on the possibilities of a later solution of the problem, however, we will have to consider also some positive aspects of the water, above all its changeability and healing power.

In Zimmer's book Maya we find the following passage referring to this: "The waters are the Gegenwelt [counterworld] to the dry sphere of the waking day, into which the eye looks outward; in them the hidden nature of things is mirrored to the inner view. . . . Down into the water means down into knowledge.

The ageless waters, taking all forms of nature, circulating as its life, know everything, they have been present since the beginning and conserve everything in their liveliness—nothing is forgotten.

Thus Vishnu speaks to the holy Naranda: Immerse yourself in water, and you will know about my Maya."

In another place he writes:

The waters of life are the womb of all forms of the world, as well as their grave in which they are reborn, they circulate in and build, they carry and dissolve every form, they are the palpable element of the all divine Maya, whose nature the saints and seers tentatively try to grasp.

They hold the secret of this Maya as the force of their own, versatile nature, and do not yield it, but let it be tasted when someone opens up to them.

How the world comes into being, every hour, outside as world gestalt in the flow of coming into being and happening, coming to the fore, as gestalt of the inner world, from the darkness of the unconsciousness into the light of consciousness—all this can be experienced, but how could it be fathomed?

Zimmer also quotes the wondrous motif of someone who immerses himself in water and emerges into a new life, sinking from life dream to life dream in doing so:

The Brahmin Sutapas went into the sacred waters in Benares.

The Brahmin turned into a girl of a Chandala family that dwelled near the sacred bathing place at the mouth of the Koka.

The girl was beautiful, grew up, and was married to an unsightly man.

She bore him two sons, who were both blind, and later a daughter, who was deaf.

Her husband was poor.

The young, naive woman went to the river, and there she always sat and cried.

Once, however, when she had gone to the river to fetch water with her jug, she went down in the water to bathe—and out of the water reemerged that Brahmin Supata, the pious, agile ascetic.

The Chandala came to look for his wife and wept for her; the Brahmin comforted him and taught him also to dive into the metamorphosed waters; he had barely dived into the water when he was freed of all stigma, thanks to the magical power of the sacred bathing place.

On a carriage of the gods he went heavenward before the eyes of the Brahmin, light as the moon.

The Brahmin, however, full of sorrow, also went into the waters of the Koka, and ascended into the highest heaven, only to come to earth again and live in a middle-class family.

Being ill and suffering, he recalled his former life, went again into the waters of the Koka to ascend into heaven, to be reborn again, and to tell this story as Prince Kamadamana.

The cleansing, healing power of the water is also known in Christianity, as the baptismal water that washes away original sin and admits the baptized child into the Church, the Corpus Christi.

The Jews also baptized, and admitted the proselytes into the community.

The Gospel of John quotes Christ's words to Nicodemus: "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born again [of water and the spirit], he cannot see the kingdom of God."

Above all, however, we would like to refer to the Revelation of John: "And he shewed me a pure river of water of life, clear as crystal . . . on either side of the river, was there the tree of life, which bare twelve manner of fruits, and yielded her fruit every month" (22:1–2).

So far the water, into which our dreamer fell, showed only negative aspects for her.

The possibility is open, however, that what she fears will change and bring her salvation.

Between the Bauschänzli and the quay bridge she suddenly falls into the water in an upright position.

We see from this that she crossed the bridge on the right side.

Could this suggest that she has always been conscious of her difficulties and of her failure? Or that her failure lies in the field of outer reality?

It is striking that she falls into the water "in an upright position," which she expressly mentions.

This can be interpreted in two ways:

it can mean that, despite everything, she "keeps her head held high," or that the heavy weight that pulls her down is not in her head, but rather in the instinctual sphere.

I do not know if we may interpret that circumstance—her falling into the water in an upright position—in this way.

"Slowly I am sinking deeper and deeper."

This might symbolize a slowly progressing process of being flooded by the unconscious. “I nearly drown” has a parallel in the story about the vision of the snake:

“I no longer dare move in the bed, because even when awake, everywhere in the room I see the glowing eyes of the snake that wants to bite me.”

Her light consciousness of the day is flooded and disturbed by the frightening snake image from the unconscious, so she is deprived of her freedom of movement.

Here, she nearly drowns—the capabilities of her senses are minimized by the unconscious content entering in her ears, nose, and mouth.

She is prevented from seeing, hearing, and speaking, and can hardly breathe at all.

So she is in an extremely reduced state; there is hardly any possibility left to contact the outer world, life.

Psychologically speaking, this could indicate a nearly autistic state, or a very great introversion, which severely restricts the possibilities of her moving or expressing herself.

Without the word nearly (she says: “I nearly drown”) we would have to fear the worst.

This little word, however, extenuates the seriousness of the prognosis a bit—it leaves a door open, and is a mere hint of the possibility of salvation.

We can’t exactly deduce the dreamer’s difficulties from this dream, but it can be assumed that she will have a hard time in her fight against powerful psychical forces, not only as a child, but also in her later life.

The dream indicates, by its frequent recurrence and by the intensity of the images and the danger, that this is not about just a temporary difficulty in finding the way from childhood to adulthood; these elements symbolize the fateful meaning of a great life task, and grave problems that touch on her innermost being.

Her future prospects may well be alarming, being threatened by the archetypal powers of the snake and the water; both of them, however, also hold great possibilities of healing and rebirth.

There is legitimate hope that she will reach the other side after all.

Professor Jung: The dream is of the girl whose snake vision we discussed last time.

Again it is a dream that has a surprising effect in its simplicity.

But precisely these “simple” dreams are not simple at all.

Here we will practice the art of making simple dreams “complicated.”

To do so, we first of all have to take into account the language of the images used in the dream.

We do this with the help of mythological parallels and amplifications, which may sometimes seem somewhat superfluous to us.

We so often believe that children think in a very simple way, but that is precisely the error.

The language used by children is much, much older than they themselves.

The whole mental and spiritual culture is handed down in language, and in language lies the whole prehistory of man.

When we speak in this language, we also speak this prehistory.

So if we do not find out and are not clear about the meaning or the connotations of the images in this language, we won’t be able to approach the meaning of the dream.

It is not always easy to comprehend these linguistic images, the more so as the German language shows a certain primitiveness: its most important terms are ambiguous and fluoresce in all kinds of colors.

You can imagine what happens when these images are dreamed to boot, the various meanings coalesce, and a complex mix-up of images ensues.

So if, for instance, as in our dream, the quay bridge appears, at first it seems natural to us to assume that this is the quay bridge—and nothing else.

But we forget that this is a dream image that emerged from the richness of the unconscious.

This makes even our unpretentious quay bridge a bridge, a bridge of a highly general meaning.

In dreams, that is, in the language of the unconscious, even the best-known and most mundane bridge, and be it a little footbridge, is after all “the bridge.”

The same is true of many concrete objects we are dreaming of: banal as they may seem, they refer to all kinds of philosophical and religious problems, or to dark places in human nature.

We can observe this phenomenon also in psychopathology; in cases of schizophrenia, psychical problems of a definitely complex nature are often expressed in quite banal images.

The patients can’t help but think that way; they have only their appalling platitudes at their disposal.

If we were able to understand the general meaning of these images, however, we would be able to grasp the meaning of the psychoses.

50 We could even heal a patient if we succeeded in making the general meaning of his images clear to him.

Then we'd have to tell him, for example: "Well, look, this isn't about this quay bridge at all, it's about the bridge as such."

And what does bridge mean?

This idea refers to a great multiplicity of possibilities of psychic experience.

It can mean: "To get to the other side," "Crossing the great water," or "Everything is transition."

It can contain the simplest meaning as well as the deepest wisdom.

If a general symbol like the bridge appears, we must not let ourselves be misled by any commonplace views.

But then, are we actually familiar with anything else but commonplace views today? Who is crossing the quay bridge, thinking: "Everything is transition"?

In the Middle Ages this was different.

At that time, people still had a relation to the symbol.

So a chapel was built on the bridge, and a sanctuary lamp was put in it.

There was a Saint Nepomuk and other saintly figures who guarded the bridge.

They reminded the people of the fact that each bridge is "the bridge," that everything is transition.

At that time these things were experienced as real.

They gave the medieval mind a strange aura, which we can no longer completely understand.

Anything banal was, at the same time, also something general, and a part of the whole.

For them, a stone is not just a stone, but it can also be the soul of an ancestor, ancestors can live in it; and an animal is not necessarily simply an animal, but it is also an ancestor, a totem father.

The whole landscape is like the open book of your unconscious.

Everything is ensouled by the unconscious of the people.

When you walk through the landscape with a Negro, you don’t just take a walk in the “topography,” where everything is abstract and scientific, but you will experience mythology.

When you climb a mountain or go into the bamboo woods with him, this is no ordinary venture, because you will come into the realm of the secluded spirits.

In the soundless, green silence of the wood we feel as if we were immersed in the water of the sea.

Then there is no more botany; the whisper of the bamboo leaves, the gentle murmur of the wind—these are the voices of the spirits, and they give people the shivers.

This is an awe-inspiring experience.

We all know this magic from childhood, when the world still had a certain golden glow and everything was still very strange.

For the child, the world is mythology, as it is for primitive man, and this is also the atmosphere out of which dreams have to be understood.

For this reason, I insist that in each dream analysis the whole spectrum of the linguistic symbol be staked out.

This method is not without danger, because at first it leads you away from the personal psychology of the dream, and we are in danger of going astray.

The wealth of the material can seduce us to such an extent that we no longer know where we are.

We have to be very sure of our ground, otherwise we will become enmeshed in a formidable entanglement of possibilities.

The dream analysis has eventually to come back, after all, to the child Patron saint of Bohemia, a martyr (d. 1393). He is also called John Nepomucen.

He was vicar general of Bohemia under King Wenceslaus IV (later Holy Roman Emperor Wenceslaus).

When the king wished uncanonically to convert an abbey into a cathedral, St. John opposed him, in spite of torture.

The king had him drowned in the Moldava (trans.) who dreamed these dreams in order to assess the meaning of the individual contents.

The particular motivation of the dream cannot be derived from the general spectrum of meanings of the images, but can only be deduced from the personal amplification, from the context, and from the individual situation of the child.

Only if we know the whole psychological situation of the child will we be able to deal with the decision about practical questions.

As I mentioned already, it is only in the most exceptional cases that we are in a situation to ask the child him or herself about the context, considering that we are dealing with a remembered dream or that the child is still too little to answer.

From a certain age onward, however, children are indeed able to answer.

I once had a consultation with an eight-year-old girl.

She came dolled up like a little monkey with a little purse, and told her dreams with all the tricks of the trade.

With this little girl it was quite possible to have a conversation.

So let us suppose you are told the present dream by the child herself.

What would you say to her?

Of course, you must not disclose your mythological knowledge to her, for these are just your theoretical tools, and the practical side is quite a different thing.

So imagine her to be an intelligent girl. What would you ask the child?

Participant: If she were afraid of the water?

Professor Jung: It would be more to the point if you asked her whether she were afraid of bridges.

Participant: If she had ever nearly drowned, or if she had ever had a frightening experience on the quay bridge?

Professor Jung: Yes indeed, we do have to ask such practical questions.

Often it is only because of dreams that our attention is called to such experiences.

If, for instance, an anxiety dream—and this is a typical anxiety dream—always happens at the same location, we have to ask ourselves why this place is so emphasized, if there is perhaps something special about it.

Let us assume that this is not the case here.

Then our next consideration has to be that the child’s route leads from Bellevue to Bauschänzli.

What questions could be tied to this fact?

Participant: I'd ask where she lives.

Professor Jung: Yes, it would be important to know if she is leaving home or going home.

Participant: Or could one also ask: "Where do you actually want to go?"

Professor Jung: Yes, this could make her recall special experiences.

But we don't know anything about all that.

So we can't ascertain the specific meaning that the dream had for the child at the time.

Something else can probably be stated about the dream, however. With what justification?

Participant: The dream recurred repeatedly, although the specific situation was different each time.

Professor Jung: Yes, we have to conclude that there is an inner constellation that did not change over the years.

When a dream recurs so frequently, I usually refrain from searching for the specific motives.

Moreover, I quite generally take the view that a neurosis is not of traumatic origin, that is, that it can't be traced back to a singular frightening experience; I try to understand it in the context of its present meaning.

For what lives and takes effect today is also recreated today, again and again.

I also relate frequently recurring dreams to what is currently going on, therefore, and to what is recreated over and over again, and not to something that lies many years back.

So this dream, too, refers to an inner constellation, which has not changed over the years.

We already know from the previous dream that there exists a certain splitting in the dreamer, that is, that consciousness and the unconscious are split off from each other. We further saw that the unconscious and consciousness even attract each other, as expressed in the threat that the snake poses to the dreamer.

This dream goes a step further than the mere threat; the danger becomes manifest: the dreamer falls into the water, in which she is, so to speak, completely swallowed by the monster of the unconscious.

We have to take into account a peculiar detail, the fact that she falls down in an upright position.

This is very unusual, because usually one falls sideways one way or the other.

When someone, as in this case, falls down with the hands on the body and with the feet first, this expresses a certain stiffness, as if one were enclosed by something.

The feeling of suffocation the dreamer experiences when sinking also points to this tight enclosure.

It is as if she were pulled into the mouth of a monster and swallowed.

Myths express the sucking and suffocating aspect of water by populating it with monsters, dragons, or other water creatures.

Many primitive heroic myths also tell the story that the hero is devoured by the dragon, complete with his ship.

In the monster's belly he is pressed to such an extent that, so as not to be crushed, he pushes the remains of the ship against the walls of the stomach.

The experience of being pressed is a very important motif.

In our dream it also finds expression in the feeling of suffocating.

To what does this refer?

From where do we have such a direct experience?

Participant: From birth.

Professor Jung: Although the newborn is not consciously aware of it, the nervous system registers these events.

Dreams that refer back to birth, and seem to be based on a perfect knowledge of anatomy, are not infrequent.

This led Rank to the assumption, for instance, that all neuroses can be traced back to the trauma of birth.

Birth is indeed a trauma, an impressive moment, and it is also possible that such an impression continues to have an effect throughout life, especially if there were complications at birth.

But we must not generalize this fact.

Participant: Is this dream not about a “reversed” birth?

Professor Jung: That’s right, it is like a retrogressive birth, a going back into the womb, into the prenatal state.

This immersion into the unconscious actually represents a figurative death, a frequent motif of the transformation process, standing in close connection to the symbolism of rebirth.

This is not at all evident from the dream at first sight, but we may add it from our knowledge.

The dream itself describes only the danger; it shows that in each transformation, and whenever a transition occurs, the ground may cave in, so that we fall down into an unconscious state.

When are there such transitions in practical life?

Participant: At the beginning of school, at the development from childhood to adulthood, at the beginning of professional life.

Professor Jung: These are transitions, transformations in life, in which we change from one state into another, from a previous situation into a new one.

This we can only achieve if we are at one with ourselves.

A split personality will have difficulties in all these transitions, comparable to a sinking in water. What does this mean in concrete terms?

Participant: That we are in over our head.

Professor Jung: Quite right.

We also say: “I can’t keep my head above water,” or “In such a situation you’ll go under.”

The difficulties may vary greatly, it could be overwhelming affects, or experiences we can’t cope with, but these are always very deep experiences into which we sink, so to speak. It is a fact, by the way, that persons with splits are particularly destined to have such very deep-going experiences.

Why?

Participant: So that the split may be overcome.

Professor Jung: Yes, fate imposes hard experiences on them, to hit them in their innermost being, where they are still at one with themselves, that is, in the instinct.

With their split, such persons will always blunder into split situations.

They will have to endure things that stand in sharpest contrast to each other.

So, for example, they will have friends of completely different characters.

In all these cases, those persons never know who they actually are.

They don’t know: Am I white or am I black?

I’m actually both, because I’m the friend of A and of B.

Something is bound to happen here.

This situation downright invites fate to intervene with a blow, so that deep regions are touched and may grow again as a unity.

Split persons always generate split situations, conflict situations.

To such persons in particular, to those who do not know who they are, it happens that they are particularly confronted with decisions, whereas other people can go on living in their unambiguous situations.

The treatment of such split persons is not easy.

We often simply do not manage to reunite the halves, which have come apart, into a whole.

We can only say:

Hopefully something really overwhelming will happen to them, so that they realize who they are.

So this dream points to the fateful necessity of having ultimate experiences, so that the point is touched where the person is still one.

Such a person has to be completely torn apart at first to recompose himself anew.

This last unity has to be found, and this will happen only if the person is wounded in his innermost being, most often by someone chosen by fate to be the hammer, because as a rule he can’t do it on his own.

1. Dream of a Five- to Six-Year-Old Boy of a Pyramid and a Glass House Presented by Aniela Jaffé

Text: I see a pyramid in front of me.

On its top there is a house made of glass. There is somebody in it.

As I come nearer, I realize that it's me.

Mrs. Jaffé: In this dream we have to distinguish between a vision, as also stressed by the introductory words ("I see . . . in front of me"), and an action, which confines itself to seeing—approaching—realizing.

The locale of the events is not specified.

Certainly a strange or remote place is implied, because pyramids are quite unfamiliar in the boy's environment, and still completely unknown to him at this age.

Dramatis personae:

The dreamer and his ego.

Exposition: "I see a pyramid in front of me. On its top there is a house made of glass. There is somebody in it."

Peripateia: "I come nearer."

Lysis: "I realize that it's me."

If we let ourselves be affected by the dream image, we will get the feeling that nature somehow speaks with friendly irony here.

Seen from an inner perspective, that is, from how the little dreamer experiences it, something extremely important happens to him: he encounters himself; he sees himself far away, at the top of an immense edifice, and, moreover, in a glass house, a veritable castle in the air—and yet at the same time he is standing below.

From an outer perspective, that is, from a reflective or critical observer's view, the image of the little "Johnny Look-in-the-Air" gives us the impression of a little helpless child, who will perhaps soon trip over some minor obstacle, with his eyes astray up on high.

And when this same little child is simultaneously enthroned on top of the pyramid, even as if imprisoned in a very transparent, though not fully comprehensible glass house, we can leave aside the seriousness of the events for the moment, and take pleasure in the serenity of the image, the meeting of the great and the little, of the above and the below.

Obviously, this vision of himself is meant to convey to the dreamer in insight into his own nature.

This image seems to tell him: This is you. Leaving aside all amplifications, the image and the language say something like this: You are sitting up there, high in the sky, and it's terribly difficult, perhaps even impossible, to come up and reach you.

It is also doubtful if you yourself can come down; you may be doomed to stay up there forever in your proud solitude, and to spend your life in this all-too-bright little attic room.

In addition, you are imprisoned in a glass cage, which protects you from all direct contact; but woe betide you if you move too suddenly in it, or, as boys do, throw stones—everything will go to pieces.

When the sun shines it will probably get unbearably hot in your hothouse, and you will start to sweat and suffer.

Certainly you can look far into the distance from up there, and no light will be able to conjure up your shadow on the walls of your castle; and should it appear far down below on the ground, you will probably not be able to make it out.

It is beautiful and important to live on top of this mysterious giant edifice, and yet it is remote, lonely, and enigmatic.

And, on top of all that, you must not forget that you are actually standing down there, helpless and little.

But now the uncanny question arises: where is reality to be found here?—So that's what the image and the words seem to suggest.

Now I would like to come to the amplifications.

We are dealing with the symbols of the pyramid, the glass house, and the encounter with oneself.

Let us deal with the pyramid first.

In the dream text it only says: "I see a pyramid in front of me"—no further details about its form or dimension are revealed.

But we will hardly prejudice the meaning of the dream if we assume that this is a building of immense proportions—there is room for a whole house on its top, and in most cases the term pyramid generally indicates, in common usage, a high building that rises above a quadratic base.

In addition, most often there is still another qualification: a pyramid as it is found in Egypt is a tomb of a Pharaoh.

Pyramids as sacred buildings, however, have been erected not only in Egypt, but also in Mexico, China, and Java, in completely different cultural environments.

They are an expression of an archetypal image.

Of the many observations that have been made on the construction of those pyramids, so mysterious to this day, I would like to single out only those that seem to be important for the understanding of the dream, acting on the assumption that this is about the Egyptian pyramid.

It has been observed that the pyramids, in whose interior the mummy of a Pharaoh was conserved in a burial chamber, had a glossy, polished, and reflecting surface.

The rising triangular areas acted like gigantic mirrors that during the day reflected the sunlight onto the land like a gigantic cone of light, and at night showed the stellar constellations.

The hieroglyph for certain pyramids, therefore, means source of light, and various inscriptions indicate its light symbolism.

Something very strange or even contradictory seems to lie in the fact that these of all buildings symbolize light and radiance, because with all the impact of their completely unstructured, immense surfaces they seem to represent the impenetrability of stone and the epitome of structured matter.

This double aspect is also expressed in the composition of the form: with their greatest width, the surface areas solidly rest on the ground, and then narrow more and more toward the top; they seem almost to dematerialize.

Finally, coming from four sides, the surfaces meet in one single point of no square dimension at all.

This point has always been considered the crowning feature of the whole edifice, however, its most sacred and mystic place.

Often the tops of Egyptian pyramids were gilded or made of a specially gleaming stone. It was assumed that after the Pharaoh’s death his soul, that is, his image, the Ka soul, would travel through the underworld and then be transformed into the god Osiris, or rise to Atum, the highest god of light, exactly at this top of his grave.

In the pyramid of Borobudur in Java, the picture of Buddha is clearly visible on the lower terraces, surrounded by scenes from his life.

On the middle terraces it stands alone, without any narrative framework.

Higher up still, its portrayal is hardly visible any longer, and finally completely eludes the human eye on the uppermost terrace.

The pyramids are huge central edifices rising above a quadratic base, with a strong emphasis on the top as the actual center of the towering rock mass.

Such a central edifice is a body mandala, that is, a sacred area that offers not only protection, but also a place in whose center the god is born or has his home.

These royal tombs, deliberately built for eternity in the third millennium B.C.

(the Cheops pyramid was built around 2800 B.C.), make an immense, if remote, impression even today; they are perfect and inaccessible at the same time, and, like something final or absolute, extend from the dim and distant past into our age.

In such a perfect form, which cannot be surpassed in its simplicity, there is no twilight zone in which fairy tales or legends could emerge.

As if in awe, neither language nor popular belief have taken possession of these monuments, and dealt with or shaped their meaning.

With great aplomb, however, Goethe wrote to Lavater in 1780, at the age of thirty one: “the desire to acuminate the pyramid of my existence, whose base was given to me as a foundation, as high up into the air as possible, prevails over everything else, and makes immediate forgetting nearly impossible.

I must not tarry, for I am already far advanced in years, and perhaps fate breaks me in two in the middle, and the Babylonian Tower will remain blunt and unfinished.

At least it should be said: He was of audacious design; and if I live the forces shall reach, God willing, up to the top.”

To conclude, the symbol of the pyramid provides the following indications for our dream: it is an archetypal image, a body mandala, in whose depths the body of the king rests as a mummy, and at whose summit the glorification of the soul takes place.

The composition of the form displays how matter becomes dematerialized, and the arrangement of the reflecting surfaces shows how mass reflects the Eternal Light.

Before I consider the psychological conclusions for the dream or the dreamer’s personality, I would like to say a few things about the house of glass on top, because this house will not alter the meaning, but only reinforce what has been found out so far.

Referring to the eternal Jerusalem, lying quadratically on top of the mountain, it says in the Revelation of John: “and the street of the city was pure gold, as it were, transparent glass” (Revelation 21:21).

As Professor Jung told us last year, this corresponds to the alchemical idea of the vitrum aureum, the golden glass, by which the lapis, the eternal stone, was meant.

We remember that the tops of the pyramids were gilded in antiquity, or made of a gleaming stone, and we are surprised that a child’s unconscious puts the glass house of the eternal city at the one and only correct place.

Just as the enormous mass of the pyramid leads up to the highest point, whose nature was experienced as spiritual, there occurs the slow transformation—as we learned last year—of the heavy, dark earth into the diamond, which in its transparency and invariability stands for the true nature of man, his eternal home and his boundary, his self.

Seen as a whole, the pyramid and the glass house with someone in it on top become a symbol for man in his uniqueness.

I envisage it as follows: deep down, far below the burial tomb of the king, there is a cistern, remotely connected to the river that bestows growth and life upon the land, following the changing rhythm of the river's rising and sinking—an image of man's deepest roots in the unconscious, which also connects him with transhuman life, far beyond his personal boundaries.

Above this there rests the body of the king, man's image of his ancestors, of his totem that is indestructible and lives within him like the mummy.

The externally visible edifice rises in four planes (corresponding to the four functions) that eventually come together at one point at the top—an image of the bodily here and now, of daily material existence which, however, reflects the sun, the light, and the stars as a medium, thus bearing witness to them.

The point at the top has no dimension, and yet it is of the hardest, indestructible quality, a crystal, a glasshouse, both an expression for consciousness of individuated man in its most developed form.

By its astronomical orientation the edifice of the pyramid is set in time, yet its five-thousand-year old existence seems to transcend time and announce eternity.

This image also roughly corresponds to the developmental line that Professor Jung mentioned in his lecture: the pyramid rises as a mountain, or as the world mountain Meru, from the quadratic base that corresponds to the division into four quarters.

On its top there is again a rectangular base, the quaternitas, the glass house, the monastery, in which there lives the child of the union, the living being, the "someone" of the dream.

But now back to the dream text, in which it says: "as I come nearer, I realize that it's me."

What occurs here is the following: what up to that moment had been intuition, a vision of someone, of homo, now suddenly concerns the dreamer directly.

It is no longer a general problem, but his own.

Simultaneously, the image changes in that it no longer represents something absolute, or some final state, but is subject to the dynamics of life and of change.

To understand this image better, we have to revert once again to the meaning of the glass house. It is not only the eternal house in celestial Jerusalem or the lapis, but also means—as in the developmental line I just mentioned—the vessel, the vas, the retort, in which the transformation of man happens.

In fairy tales this vessel also appears as a glass casket, in which the soul slumbers, waiting for salvation (Snow White in the casket of glass).

In the Visio Arislei, an alchemical text, a triple glass house is the place where the heroes are condemned to death in great heat, only to find new life again.

This vessel corresponds to the uterus, the place of realization, in which the homunculus, the light man, is created, and which is often depicted at the center of a mandala.

In the language of symbols, triangles standing on a base—in our case, the surfaces of the pyramid that rise from a broad base up to the glass—are licking flames; and thus the vision says that flames erupt from the earthen depths of man, giving birth to the spiritual body, to what is eternal within him.

For the child, this image seems to be like something that points to his own future.

A comparison with the suffering of the heroes in the glass house of the Visio Arislei shows how much pain and sacrifice of light day consciousness this process will cost.

Another parallel may confirm this.

The Aztecs had the following custom: a man had to slowly climb the steps of a temple pyramid, symbolizing the slow rise of the sun.

Once he reached the top, however, he was sacrificed: the sun begins to set.

With the insight in the dream: “I realize that it’s me,” the problem of the dreamer and his double also arises, and with it, finally, the whole spectrum of questions concerning the current situation of the child and the dreamer’s peculiarities and difficulties.

As Professor Jung explained to us last winter, in the first years of life the child still lives in a very close relation to the prenatal stage, the Bardo life.

The child is, so to speak, not yet fully born into reality, but still much closer to the primordial ideas than the adult, the realistic person.

Invasions of the unconscious may happen, and images or symbols may appear, which far exceed the comprehension of infantile consciousness—like the image of the vision of the pyramid in our example.

As we heard last winter, because of the great susceptibility of children, such invasions of the unconscious always represent a grave danger of splitting and of disintegration.

The child is so fascinated by the archetypal image that hardly any other reality can exist beside it.

If looking into a mirror appears in a dream after such archetypal images, in most cases this will signify a way of rescue, leading into reality.

The mirror is the rational intellect, which clarifies and structures the seemingly overwhelming situation; when you look into it, you will have to believe in your own existence and will no longer be able to lose yourself.

It seems strange that in this dream the healing look at oneself looks like an enormous split, so that doom and salvation coincide, so to speak.

This may be due to the following: although the child below sees his ego far removed from himself and at a very great height, this ego is in a very special place, namely, at the center of a mandala, which not only offers protection, but—similar to the North Pole in a dream discussed in the last seminar—also has centralizing power and thus averts the danger of splitting, although it may not eliminate it altogether.

But what does this image mean, the image of the child appearing at the top of the pyramid while simultaneously standing on the ground?

We are reminded here of the Germanic figures of the Fylgjas, the “following spirits” that accompanied a person either as his double, or sometimes in the form of an animal, and which protected him or warned him of danger; we are reminded of accounts of witches who slept in their beds at night, yet were seen to ride to the Brocken; of appearances of persons who in reality were somewhere else entirely; and of reports of persons living or dead.

The idea of a double ego is not alien to children; when they illustrate their dreams, for example, they often draw themselves not only in the dream scene, but also a second time on the side as they sleep in the bed.

The Egyptians, according to whose belief the soul consisted of about fourteen parts or forces, know a part of the soul they called the Ka soul.

It was immortal and its body, conceived as half physical and half spiritual, was absolutely identical with the person, even after his death. It was his double, his Doppelgänger.

The hieroglyph for Ka shows the hands raised in prayer, which perhaps already indicate the desire for height and light with their movement.

Paracelsus, too, hypothesized another body besides the physical one, called the sidereal body by him, a half-material body that represented the reversed image of its counterpart.

In De lunaticis, he writes: “so there are two bodies in man, one composed of the elements, the other of the stars; therefore, these two have to be well distinguished from each other.

In death the elementary body is buried together with its spirit, the ethereal ones are consumed in the firmament, and the spirit of the God-image goes to Him of which it is the image.”

Paracelsus assumes that even after death a person’s sidereal body will roam, and simulate the appearance of the dead person.

It is like the inner mirror image of man, a body whose flesh is, in his words, subtle flesh, and which does not depend on doors or holes, but walks through walls without breaking anything. Long after the dissolution of the elementary body in the earth, this sideric body will be slowly consumed by the stars.

The alchemists also knew about this second body, the incorruptible body, which is taken out of the physical body in the opus and transformed to perfection.

Here I would like to quote a passage from Professor Jung's "Representations of Redemption in Alchemy."

There it says: "Ruland says, 'Imagination is the star in man, the celestial or superceles-tial body.'

This astounding definition throws a quite special light on the fantasy processes connected with the opus.

We have to conceive of these processes not as the immaterial phantoms we readily take fantasy-pictures to be, but as something corporeal, a 'subtle body,' semi-spiritual in nature."

And later it says about this imagination, according to an alchemical text: "since divine wisdom is only partly enclosed in the body of the world, the greater part of it is outside, and it imagines far higher things than the body of the world could conceive (concipere). And these things are outside nature: God's own secrets. The soul is an example of this: it too imagines many things [ . . . ] outside the body, just as God does."

And, finally: imagination is, therefore, not "a question of actualizing those contents of the unconscious that are outside nature, that is, not a datum of our empirical world, and therefore a priori of archetypal character.

The place or the medium of realization is neither mind nor matter, but that intermediate realm of subtle reality that can be adequately expressed [only] by the symbol."

When we apply this to our dream we could say that the Ka soul, the sidereal or subtle body of the child, sits on top of the pyramid: in general terms, the desire for perfection and boundlessness, for salvation and immortality, embodied in the dreamer.

But let us not forget that at the same the child is still standing on the ground, in all the reality of his little helpless body, looking up at himself.

The result is an image of the insoluble tension between limitedness and eternity, reality and dream, actuality and ideal, body and soul, mortality and immortality.

From time immemorial the motif of man's encounter with himself has existed, of the fateful and ominous appearance of the Doppelgänger.

While the dual motif, for example, of the Dioscuri or the two friends in the Upanishads, also expresses this dichotomy, these myths also give an indication of how the conflict can be sustained, even show that the two poles actually belong together, and that the two can form a unity only with each other, despite their dissimilarity.

Both unite their forces in a joint act, in which each of them does what he can do best, and the two complement each other.

Together the Dioscuri fight for the cattle herds, and despite all vicissitudes evoked by their past, Zeus grants them the final victory.

In the Upanishads, for example, the two connected friends embrace one and the same tree; one eats the berries, while the other just looks down, to experience the tree in that way.

It is different if the problem is expressed by the double; this always indicates that the problem is experienced in all its tragedy, nearly without a possible solution: the person who encounters his own ego no longer actually knows where his own reality is, but tries to identify first with the one ego, then with the other, only soon to experience the painful disappointment that he is at home neither here nor there, neither above nor below, neither within nor without.

It is probably no coincidence that in Romanticism a great number of stories about doubles came into being. Tieck, Jean Paul, E.T.A. Hoffmann, Chamisso, and Heine write about this topic as an expression of the suffering from outer reality, which stands in a seemingly irreconcilable contrast with the experienced inner world.

Unfortunately, it would lead too far to list all the Doppelgänger motifs here, and to give an account of the partly comical, partly tragic experiences and entanglements of the heroes and their mirror-egos, shadow-egos, or wax figure-egos.

I would just like to mention that there was a renaissance of the literature on the Doppelgänger or double ego around the turn of the century; Dostoevsky, Oscar Wilde, Stefan George, later Franz Werfel and, in modified form, also Herman Hesse and Hofmannsthal wrote about this topic.

While the romanticists seem to have identified rather with inner reality, the turn of the century was a time when the development of consciousness “peaked” (to stay in the image of the vision), when one was about to tackle the solution to the riddles of the world with the intellect, and the intellect only, and when man, blinded by the results, identified only too readily with this efficient consciousness. In such one-sidedness, however, the double appears and will again have to lead man to the other side, which lies in the shade, in the night, in the unconscious.

To conclude, I would like to try to draw inferences from the dream image regarding the personality of the dreamer and his problem situation.

As the dream recurred repeatedly, we are justified in assuming that something of special importance to the dreamer’s life is expressed in it, something that the unconscious repeatedly shows him by this.

This importance is further underlined by the location where the child has the vision in the dream; although it is not specified, it is surely a remote and alien place, where important and meaningful things happen.

I have tried at first to draw conclusions from the image of the vision alone, without any amplifications, regarding the child’s personality and his difficulties.

This could be summarized as follows: this is a child who is up very “high,” in the glass house, meaning he is not yet fully in reality, but still very close to Bardo life.

He is, so to speak, still in a supernatural uterus, with the possible effect that he lives in his fantasies and intuitions.

To his environment the child will perhaps not let show too much—in the dream he is also standing on the ground.

Basically, however, his adaptation to reality is only superficial, a pseudo-adaptation, because his soul is somewhere else entirely.

But this inhibits the whole development of the personality, so that the child seems infantile.

Being enclosed in the glass house intensifies the importance of the isolation.

He will have difficulty getting in touch with other children, and he will radiate a chilly atmosphere, which in turn will make it difficult for others to reach out to him.

Naturally the child will suffer for it, but in a way he will also feel important.

He may be one of the many children who believe that they secretly descend from a royal couple, which gives them an inner feeling of superiority.

The glass house could also indicate that the enclosure was reinforced by the parents’ spoiling the child, by an all-too-pointed education, which spoils the child—the glass house is also the hothouse—and produces a delicate, shrinking violet, instead of letting the child see the world of street life early enough.

Soon enough the fear of his own evil will rise in the dreamer; for in his glass house he can be seen from all sides, he is under constant observation, and he does not have that wonderful place where children keep their secrets.

This is his actual poverty.

From the frequent recurrence of the dream we may probably conclude that the tension between the two egos, between inner and outer reality, expressed therein, will still remain the problem of the grown man in much later years.

When, in the development of this child, the great amnesia will have obscured the Bardo world with its primeval images, such a dream will shine like a spark from the lost paradise, and remind him that he, who lives down on earth, also has an immortal, versatile soul of divine nature.

From the image, in which he sees this soul out there, far away, split off from him, and nearly unreachable, we might conclude that later on in life he will identify too one-sidedly with the conscious ego.

Then, in the revealing look up to the high ego on the pyramid, however, he will be fascinated like a Narcissus by his own mirror image and by inner reality, blinded by the boundless possibilities of the soul.

In fantasies and daydreams he will, for instance, climb heights that are denied to him by reality.

Such a superior, light, and yet outwardly experienced image of the inner ego, however, will act as a frightening and ever-present demand for perfection, that is, to adjust to his height as well as possible.

Each deviation from that will be experienced as a painful disappointment, through which the remoteness and dreamlike unreality of the ideal will be felt again and again.

The results will be a feeling of his own inferiority and fear of life.

This image of the oppositeness of inner and outer reality, of ego and double-ego, however, also expresses the dreamer's potentiality to reach greater consciousness despite all the dangers.

Novalis says that no one knows himself if he knows only himself, and if he is not also somebody else.

As Professor Jung said at the last meeting, each creation is preceded by being split in two.

Here the dream has portrayed the soul in its two great opposites and, in addition, has indicated the way to change.

Thus we may hope that this tension between the two souls will lead the dreamer—or has led him already—to the place where he will be able to tolerate the dichotomy, that is, to himself.

Professor Jung: The dream was told by a man whom I came to know when he was between forty-five and fifty years old.

He was a man who had been on the "quest" all his life, and in the course of this search finally had come to me.

Already when he was a child he was unable to take the world as completely real, but was eccentric and dreamy.

Later he had difficulty in choosing a profession; he finally chose jurisprudence, but only half-heartedly, and only because he had to do something, after all.

He then was a judge in the colonies for a couple of years, and worked in this capacity after a fashion and with more or less success.

He greatly suffered in this life, because basically he was not interested in his job.

He did not want to accept that being a jurist or a judge, with more or less chance of promotion, would be the great thing about life.

So he never put his heart and soul into it.

It was as if he had more than one string to his bow.

After much hesitation, he married; the marriage was not a good one, however, but full of difficulties.

But then he only put half his heart in it, and who knows where he put the other half.

Generally, deep down he was unconscious of this whole other side.

Only sporadically he had some little philosophical adventures, in which he looked for what his profession did not offer him.

On one of these occasions he came across one of my books, which made a great impact.

So then he came to me.

The dream clearly shows the other side of his nature.

He himself, however, never made the connection to his state.

From this you can see the extent of his split.

With one foot he seemingly stood in eternity, with the other in reality.

As the dream recurred many times, we may assume that it was very important to him and quite characteristic for the course his life took.

It is actually a vision that contains, similar to the dreams already discussed, something completely unchildlike.

The dream is very abstract and of a very general and extremely typical character.

What do you think this implies for the dreamer?

Participant: That he has a normal constitution.

Professor Jung: Yes, that is correct.

Or, in case there should be a neurosis, it would certainly not be serious, because the vision is not chaotic at all.

On the contrary, the archetype is expressed with remarkable precision.

But what is the difference from the previous dream of the bridge, which also was of a general nature?

Participant: Here the connection to everyday life is missing completely.

Professor Jung: Yes, this is an image you won't encounter in reality; it is completely unreal, as opposed to the image of the quay bridge, which in its entirety is taken from the experiential sphere.

The vision of the glass house is taken from a completely different experiential world, and even appears to be fabricated.

If I hadn't known the man personally, I'd be in doubt whether the image hadn't been invented.

Participant: Does the dream perhaps stem from such a deep psychical layer that it is hardly possible to link its images with the outer world?

Professor Jung: Yes, the dream is a pure product of the prenatal psyche, and belongs, so to speak, to a virginal layer that hasn't had any contact yet with the outer world. In such cases the images persist in their original form.

This glass house does not correspond to any experience; otherwise, the dreamer might perhaps have rather talked of a "lantern," and then tried to make a connection between this strange object and some known form.

Here, however, it remains completely unreal.

Even if he had once seen a pyramid, there certainly was no glass house on top.

During this winter term we will deal with some more of those abstract dreams.

The dream in which four gods rise from the four corners also comes from layers that had not been in touch with the world before. In all these cases with such remote images, we have to consult an extremely multilayered symbolism to reach an understanding.

Let us only add some few remarks to the exhaustive paper of Mrs. Jaffé.

It was mentioned that the glass house standing on top of the pyramid represents its center.

We also find this idea of the vessel as the center of the pyramid elsewhere, for example, in the Maya culture.

During the excavations of the great pyramid, a lime vessel was found beneath the altar inside, there where the ancient temple had stood.

It contained a wonderful work of art in the form of a mandala, made of about three thousand small turquoise stones.

It portrays four snakes aligned in such a way that they point to the four world regions.

The vessel also plays a crucial role in alchemy, where it appears in the most varied forms.

As you have heard, it can also be a glass house, the domus vitrea.

Often an old man sits in it, the senex, sweating, for the glass house is a sweat house.

In the Visio Arislei,64 the king’s daughter and son are imprisoned in the triple glass house under the sea.

It is unbearably hot there.

In this heat the transformation of the dead prince takes place.

To perform such transubstantiations, the alchemists often used round glass bowls, called uteri, whose roundness indicated perfection.

A beautiful parallel can be found in the Mountain Chant of the Navajo Indians.

It is a healing ceremony to which they subject themselves when they have had a bad dream, for instance, or do not feel well for some other reason. In this ceremony, a circle of about 650 to 1,000 feet in diameter is staked out.

In the center of this circle, which represents a mandala, there is the medicine lodge with the sweat lodge at its side.

The latter is a little round hut built of branches and earth.

Often the rainbow goddess is drawn with colored sand on its top, leaning over the hut as over her own uterus.

The hut is heated up and the man to be healed crawls into it and starts to sweat.

Do you know of a parallel in the heroic myths?

Participant: The night sea journey in the womb of the whale.

Professor Jung: Yes, there the hero sweats so much that he loses all his hair and reemerges bald-headed, like a newborn child.

As a matter of fact, he is reborn indeed.

In India the sweating corresponds to the tapas.

This is a kind of self-brooding.

By the concentration of the soul powers on this one point, on the central point of the self, it is hatched like an egg.

One is enclosed in it oneself, as in the retort or in the uterus.

Where do we find similar ideas on transubstantiation?

Participant: In the Christian church, in the ritual of consecrating the baptismal water.

Professor Jung: Yes, this ritual of the benedictio fontis was performed on Holy Saturday.

It goes back to the seventh or eighth century and is full of mysterious things.

The regulations for this ritual are laid down in the Missale Romanum.

After certain preparations of the water, for example, separating the water in the form of a cross, exorcizing, and benediction, there follows the fertilization with the help of the Paschal Candle.

It is thrice dipped into the baptismal font, which contains the sacral water, the third time down to the fundus, the bottom of the font.

This imparts the facultas regerandi to the baptismal water, the power to give new birth to man.

Man is reborn into a new childhood through being touched by this magic water and is completely purified.

This fertilization of the uterus ecclesia is a veritable coniunctio, because the candle represents Christ Himself, and the baptismal water the mater gratia, the Mother of Grace.

In this union the transformation of the water to the aqua permanens occurs, the eternal divine water, as it is called in alchemy.

So here, too, we find that wondrous vessel in which a transformation takes place.

Do you know of another parallel in the older literature?

Participant: The kratér of Zosimos.

Professor Jung: Exactly, we find this vessel of transformation in the writings of Zosimos, an alchemist of the third century a.d. It probably goes back to the fourth tract of the Corpus Hermeticum, in which it is said that God had sent a vessel from heaven to earth, in which the humans could submerge in order to reemerge renewed in the state of ennoia.

A medieval variation of this kratér is the Grail.

It is a miraculous bowl from which Christ is said to have taken the Last Supper.

Another legend says that Joseph of Arimathea had collected Christ's blood in it.

It is also a blood vessel, filled with the blood of Christ, with the spirit of God.

The power of giving man new life by filling him with its spirit is inherent in both the kratér and the Grail. Wolfram von Eschenbach brings another version of the story of the Grail.

Do you know about it?

Participant: He talks about the Grail as a stone.

Professor Jung: Yes, for him it is a stone. Wolfram von Eschenbach quotes a very strange expression in connection with the Grail, namely, lapsit exillis.

Now this is bungled Latin; he himself did not understand Latin. Philologists have tried their hands at its interpretation in all kinds of ways. One of them interpreted it as "ex illis," "from those" (i.e., "from those eternal stars"); another as "ex coelis," "from the heavens."

In my view, however, this "lapsit exillis" could refer to the lapis.

There is evidence for this.

Arnoldus de Villanova, a doctor living around the year 1250, left some alchemical texts, in which the stone is called "lapis exilis" in a hexameter, meaning that the stone is one that can be had vili pretio, cheaply.

It is found everywhere, in the streets, in dung, in toilets.

An alchemist held that people would sell it at a quite different price if they only knew its value.

This stone is, of course, the cornerstone that was discarded by the builders, and that is an allegoria Christi.

The Christian Church also knew about the secret similarity between the stone and Christ.

In the ritual of striking fire, the new fire, which is an image of Christ, is struck out of the cornerstone, the lapis angularis.

In 1330, Petrus Bonus for the first time expressed the idea that the stone was an allegory of Christ.

So this enigmatic expression, “lapsit exillis,” can be interpreted as “lapis exilis,” that insignificant, unimportant stone, to which nobody pays attention, although it is the greatest treasure.

Do you know about a passage in the Old Testament where the stone plays a role?

Participant: The rolling stone in the dream of Nebuchadnezzar in the Book of Daniel.

Professor Jung: Yes, that dream speaks about a great, tall, and bright image of a terrible form.

It was made of four different materials—gold, silver, brass, and iron—and its feet were of clay.

While the king looked at the image, a stone rolled down the mountain and smote the image upon its feet, so that this great being collapsed.

The strange thing about it is that the stone broke away from the mountain “without hands,” without being touched by anybody.

In the Book of Daniel this stone became a great mountain, and filled the whole earth.

Daniel’s prophecy that this stone will smite and destroy all kingdoms, but shall stand forever itself, might well have been why Christ was compared to it in the patristic literature.

Where else does the mountain appear in connection with the precious stone?

Participant: In your lecture you mentioned that the city of Meru is on top of the mountain.

Professor Jung: Yes, this connection is found in the Indian Shri-Chakra-Sambhara Tantra. We also find it in alchemy, where the city, the vas hermeticum, is lying on top of the mons.

Often the image of the vitrum aureum, the golden glass, appears in connection with the idea of the eternal city.

As you have heard in the paper, it says in the Revelation of John: “and the city was pure gold, like unto clear glass” (21:18).

What does this glass indicate?

Participant: Something hard and indestructible.

Professor Jung: This is characteristic not of the glass, but of stone in general. The wondrous thing about glass is the diaphanitas, its transparency.

One has also tried to express the spiritual nature of the stone or the vessel with the help of this characteristic.

The same is true when we talk about the lapis spiritualis, the lapis invisibilitatis, or the lapis aethereus, or about the diamond stone light as water.

All these expressions are meant to illustrate the spiritual existence of the stone; they are about an object that is a body, yet at the same time transparent.

The glass house in the present dream also points to this spiritual existence.

Mrs. Jaffé quite correctly interprets the Doppelgänger in the glass house as corpus subtile, as a subtle body, a spiritual mirror image, so to speak.

One creates oneself in this transparent vessel; the double in the glass house is like a second one, who is also there, and who awaits his preparation there.

This is a vision of what we have to call the Self.

There the transformation to one's own self occurs, the other within us is consolidated there.

This other has miraculous qualities:

he is transparent and has a subtle and incorruptible body.

For the time being, he is still in a suspended state; he has not yet become.

Through the union with the human being, he is clothed in matter, thus acquiring actual existence in actu and is saved from his potential existence.

This idea is also at the base of the homunculus, that miraculous being that, so to speak, creates himself in the stone.

In the dream, the glass house is on top of the pyramid, and so there is also a connection between the double and the king, resting in the tomb as a mummy.

The lapis is thus related to the grave, to death.

Do you know anything from alchemy about this?

Participant: Before the lapis comes into being, the old king, the old sun, has to die.

Professor Jung: What does that mean—the old king, the old sun?

Participant: The prevailing opinions have to be overcome before something new can be adopted.

Professor Jung: Yes, what has ruled until then has to die and be buried so that the lapis can come into being.

A basic idea in alchemy is expressed therein: the ruling principle, that which had been sun, consciousness, the aurum vulgare, has to sink like the grain of wheat in the earth, so that it will be transformed into the eternal substance, into the incorruptible body.

This suffering ruling principle is very often personified in the king, who, for example, calls from the depths: “Help me!”

Often he greatly suffers from water, be it that he suffers from dropsy, or be it that he lies half-drowned in the sea.

How do we have to conceive this state in psychological terms? When are we saturated with water to such an extent?

Participant: When we are unconscious.

Professor Jung: Yes, when we have sunk completely into the unconscious we suffer from “dropsy.”

It can also happen that somebody sort of drowns himself by drinking a vast quantity of water.

This happened to the king in the Aenigma Merlini, for example.

Before he rode into the battle, he drank so much water that he dissolved himself.

Afterward he was put together again by Egyptian doctors.

These are illustrations of the fact that what rules has to go under, to make room for a different, renewed consciousness.

As we have seen, this other consciousness is personified by the double, enclosed in the glass house.

As you know, it is crucial that the dreamer unite himself with this corpus subtile.

What does the dream tell about that?

Participant: The child stands on the ground beside the pyramid, so he is far away from it.

Professor Jung: Yes, there is a split.

The dreamer has never really known who he is, where he actually belongs.

You will find such a doubleness in those numerous people in whose soul prenatal remnants still exist.

These may rise in visions or dreams, but mostly sink back into the unconscious again.

It is only in a psychological treatment that these images are again remembered.

The dreamer told me the dream more or less as a curiosity, but I could infer the core of his whole life from it.

He lacked precisely this self-realization, the spiritual existence.

His change subsequently showed that this was exactly what he had needed.

The proof was that he then became a contented man.

When he was told the meaning of the dream, both currents flowed together.

Up to then they had never come together, and he had never really known: am I in this one or in the other one?

Now he became a whole. He had found his soul.

The two halves that were united were the man of consciousness, the ego, the mortal being, so to speak, and that other side, that complex of emotional values and attributes which accompanies us as a vague anxiety as long as we have not extracted the eternal being, the spark, the spinther in it.

Such a dream can be an experience of the greatest importance for somebody.

If he grasps its meaning, it will become an experience for him that he will value more than all the kingdoms on earth.

These are experiences we cannot rationalize.

Neither can we argue about them, just as we cannot argue about Paul and the great vision he had on the road to Damascus.

The transformation occurs when that inner growth, with all its original values and implicit meanings, enters into the empirical world.

The experience of this wholeness can be so allembracing that it has actually been called the medicina catholica, the panacea, the alexipharmakon, the antitoxin against all toxins.

The highest attributes have always been ascribed to this idea, not out of rational consideration but because it expresses the deepest inner experiences of man.

1. Dream of a Five-Year-Old Boy of the Beloved Girl Presented by Dr. Emma Steiner

Text: He sees a girl in the toilet, washing her hands.

He loved her very much, but was very shy. He feels a pain of separation.

The dream recurred again and again until his thirtieth year.

Dr. Steiner: This is not an actual dream, but a vision.

Let us make a note of the fact that the dreamer himself only watches, that he is passive.

This passivity will be the starting point of our interpretation in the second part. The dream has no lysis, therefore, and that is probably the reason for its perpetual recurrence.

Locale: The toilet.

Dramatis personae: The dreamer and the girl.

Peripateia: The dreamer watches the girl wash her hands.

Let us proceed to the amplification. In the toilet:

Even if we have to assume that it is a modern, hygienic, sparkling restroom, the place is still somehow suspect.

The toilet has always been considered a gloomy and uncanny place, full of dangers, full of uncanny events.

This is one of the reasons, apart from the obvious hygienic ones, why our ancestors did not include the toilet in the main house; a separate small hut, the Hüsli, was erected in the yard.

Gradually, the toilet was built nearer and nearer to the house, until it became an annex.

But even so, the toilet was considered a haunted place, where ghosts and devils were up to their tricks, and which one did not dare to enter alone at night.

In Iceland, Scandinavia, Germany, and Arabia, too, to mention only a few examples, the toilet is seen as the place where the spirits of the dead and the devils appear.

In an Irish monastic regulation the toilet is described as such a place, and the monks are given a blessing formula that they have to speak when entering it.

This concept of the toilet as an ominous place can also be found in various Nordic myths.

In the saga of Thorstein, King Olaf expressly warns his guest against going to the toilet alone at night.

Thorstein does it nevertheless and has to survive a dangerous adventure with a devil, who reveals himself as the spirit of a dead knight fallen in battle.

Thorstein is saved only by the fact that at the last moment the church bells begin to ring.

In a Sigurd legend, too, the shadows of death spirits appear in the toilet.

The same idea—that this place is full of spirits—is widespread in Germany.

A report by Thietmar von Merseburg tells how uncanny demons rose from the toilet in the sickroom of a monastery, much to the horror of a gravely ill man.

In the Canton of Aargau, people often say that if you let the child sit alone in the toilet, the Hoggema will come and get it. Healing magic and popular medicine also have often made use of the toilet.

But let us come back to our modern [German] word Toilette.

In German it is synonymous with Abort, while in French it has a different meaning.

Toilette is derived from toile, a small linen blanket, which originally probably covered the lady’s dressing table and referred to her dressing room.

Despite the modern term used by the boy, and despite the sparkling hygiene associated with the word today, this place is still taboo for us.

Even today, refined and enlightened persons who otherwise speak quite explicitly about biological processes talk in paraphrases or enigmatic abbreviations about this place.

There are the elegant foreign words Toilette and water closet, there is the flüsternde

Örtli, the Locus, or, in the mysterious language of runes, the WC or the AB, still whispered today like the blessing formula of the Irish monks.

So even today this place is something suspect, mysterious, taboo, forbidden, a secretive place one avoids mentioning by name, because it serves the lower needs of man.

What does the boy see in the toilet? He sees a girl.

He does not give more details about the girl in the dream, in this vision, but the context and the explanations the young person later gives about the girl show that he sees a specific type of girl before him.

She is a girl with dark-brown hair, with a tinge of red, with a skin and blood complexion that is characteristic of certain Englishwomen, and considered, I dare say, the ideal by the average Englishman.

A person from the continent knows this type from the illustrations by Rackham, and also from the portrayals by the Pre-Raphaelites, in which this type tends to have decadent features.

So what the boy sees is not an everyday figure, but a kind of fairy-tale creature, an elfish being.

According to Jung, these elfish beings are a preliminary stage of a magical female being that we call anima.

Elfen, or Elben in Middle High German (from the English elf or ælf) are often creatures of the light with both human and divine features.

According to Grimm, the blessed virgins can be classified in this category, the wise women who sunbathe, comb their hair, and bathe; the Lorelei, the Greek Sirens, the mermaids and fair water beings who are in need of salvation.

These elfish beings, these elevated fair ones, however, have nothing to do with the fairy figures that rather indicate a mother symbol.

The word Fee (fairy) is derived from feie, fine; fata, fate.

These are goddesses of fate, the Nornes, who hold the life string in their hands.

Our elves, however, are beguiling, enchanting beings who often dance at night in a clearing in the woods, moving seductively to a sweet melody, beguiling young people, pulling them toward those light regions where there is neither death nor sin.

Certainly these beings are very often able to change; the fascinating attraction emanating from this light creature can give way to the lamia, to the empusa, to those man-eating monsters, to those succubae who consume men from within and put straw and wood in place of their hearts.

With this description we have at the same time characterized the archetype of the anima; it is not identical with the dogmatic notion of soul.

Soul, in Gothic saivalo, is movement and oscillation par excellence, in short, everything that constitutes life in all its aspects.

It is this moving and lively force in its roguishness and artfulness that drives man, and this mixture of wisdom and roguishness appears, to quote Jung, as one and the same in the elfish being.

We have shown the connection between the nature of the girl and the elves.

Elves don’t have souls.  In her playful way, the girl now does something very significant: she washes her hands.

Washing one’s hands has always been connected with a great and magnificent ceremony.

At first, washing one’s hands was probably done out of politeness and custom, but it is also a symbolic act.

Thus the priest in Catholic mass prays for moral lustration during the washing of hands, the introductory part of mass.

In Matthew 27:24, there is the well-known passage: “When Pilate saw that he could prevail nothing, but that rather a tumult was made, he took water, and washed his hands before the multitude, saying, I am innocent of the blood of this just person: see ye to it.”

Something similar is found in Deuteronomy, where the following is demanded after a manslaughter:

“And all the elders of that city, that are next unto the slain man, shall wash their hands” (21:6).

In Cornwall, according to the biblical tradition, washing one’s hands was the sign of innocence of a certain crime.

An Icelandic prayer says: “I remove my enemies and adversaries from me by washing.”

In this context let us also remember the statement of Lady Macbeth: “A little water clears us of this deed:

How easy is it, then!”

Who can forget the scene in which Lady Macbeth enters the hall after the bloody deed at midnight, watched by the doctor and the gentlewoman: “Look, how she rubs her hands—It is an accustomed action with her, to seem thus washing her hands.”

In ancient customs, too, washing one’s hands is considered necessary in extraordinary circumstances, for example, in Silesia, one has to wash one’s hands after a burial to avoid dying or losing one’s teeth.

In the Rhineland, you should wash your hands after a sudden fright to prevent lasting harm.

In Southern Germany and in Switzerland, special blessings by washing the hands are customary, which impressively show the importance of this act.

In all cultures, washing one’s hands is a symbolic act, an integral part of the ritual.

The Egyptian priest, for example, is called uibu, the washed one, or uibu totui, the clean one with both hands.

In alchemy, too, we know of the ablutio, when the pure white color emerges after the nigredo, the blackness.

The boy felt a pain of separation.

This pain felt in separation is not an unambiguous feeling, because one would like to, indeed would have to, separate from such an elfish being—this would be the quite appropriate, instinctive feeling of the dreamer.

At the same time, this pain of separation generates a half-lustful, half-world-weary feeling, and a wish to remain in this state.

In contrast to the previous dream of the pyramid, this dream absolutely corresponds to the scope of the boy's personal experiences.

Seen superficially, this is nothing but a very banal vision, explicable by the boy's personal unconscious, but the enrichment of the dream material should disabuse us of this assumption.

Despite its banality—"washing her hands in a toilet"—this dream reaches far down into the collective unconscious.

For one, it was shown that the girl in her elfish nature is an instinctual, preliminary stage of the anima; and this playful, elfish being does something very meaningful, symbolic, and ritualistic: she washes her hands, and she does so in a somewhat suspect place, in a forbidden place, for which we may substitute the unconscious here.

This place, where the lower functions of human life happen, is taboo.

What we have here is also a pair of opposites:

black–white; the haunted place where spirits and devils dwell, where black demons rise, on the one hand, and the light figure, the elf, who washes her hands with an ironic smile or in a gesture reminiscent of Pilate, on the other.

We now come to the interpretation of the dream.

To begin with, we have to ask why it recurred so often.

For one, the dream does not have a solution, and is dreamed again and again to demonstrate to the dreamer that he should finally deal with his anima.

This the dreamer does not do; he remains in his passivity, and this passivity gives us the key to understand the vision.

There can be no solution in this vision because the dreamer does not confront the elfish girl, his anima; thus, the archetype of the anima becomes autonomous.

What is fascinating in the elf—to fascinate derives from fascere actually becomes a decisive factor.

Metaphorically speaking, the oscillating, elusive, effortless quality turns into something beguiling, a lamia, a fiend, an empusa.

To stay in the picture: it turns into the succubus that sucks the marrow out of the young man's bones, or, to put it psychologically, the anima turns into an autonomous being that exercises an absolutely dominating influence.

Professor Jung: The dream is of an approximately five-year-old boy.

It has recurred for a long period of time in one version or another, and the cause for these recurrences was always the motif of the separation pain.

This went on until about the thirtieth year.

Then something happened that we could have guessed already from the dream itself: he fell in love with a girl who absolutely resembled the dream figure.

This love affair dragged on for quite some time, up and down, back and forth, with great indecisiveness.

One moment he thought he should marry her, the next he shied away from this thought.

She was a fairly enigmatic girl, and he could never find out any actual details concerning her family and her background.

Eventually it all ended with a break-up after all.

He suffered greatly from this fascination, and the relationship gave him many a sleepless night.

She also caused him great difficulties with his parents.

This girl resembled the above-mentioned English type.

Such girls usually radiate something fairylike or elfish, that certain something that makes a man feel at a loss.

To characterize this type I'd like to tell you a story: A Danish pastor once went across the moor; there was only one path leading through it, and whoever deviated from it wouldddrown in the mud.

He had a long way to go across the country, because he had been called to a dying man.

When he was on his way back in the middle of the night, he faintly heard some music, and wondered: "What is this?"

Then he saw two little figures coming toward him on the moor, going where no human being would have been able to.

When they stood in front of him, he realized that they were elves.

They asked him who he was. He answered: "The pastor."

They asked what a pastor was. "Someone who has to pray with the people so that their souls are saved."

They moaned that they had no souls, to which he replied that he could not help them; they would have to ask God to give them immortal souls.

He wanted to teach them how to pray and said to them: "Our Father which art in heaven . . ."

They said, however: "Our Father which art not in heaven . . . "—They simply could not repeat it otherwise. So he had to dismiss them again.

And that is why they never received immortal souls.

We have to imagine the girl in the dream as such an elfish being.

In contrast to the dream discussed in the previous session, this is not an image, but a vision; because a vision usually has a synthetic character and is a kind of composition.

Each part derives from the other, so that all of them together form a complete synthesis.

The present dream, however, is essentially composed of material drawn from experience, which stems from the most varied sources, and is not connected by inner evidence.

It does not follow at all from the character of the dream image that the girl necessarily had to be in the toilet.

We can distinguish three elements in this dream: first, the memory of this girl who historically is not linked with the toilet at all.

She had made a deep impression on the boy, and had perhaps for the first time aroused a certain feeling in him—the pain of separation.

This emotional situation is repeated in the dream: the dreamer does not approach the girl, but, if there is movement at all, this movement is nipped in the bud, and, therefore, he experiences the pain of separation.

The second element is the toilet with all its concomitant associations.

It is a place around which the erotic fantasies of the boy revolve.

This is quite normal, because the beginnings of sexuality lie in the cloacal area.

These two sources, the memory of the girl and the toilet, originally have nothing to do with each other, because the dreamer did not associate any sexual fantasies with this girl until he was an adult.

So we have to state that it was not the girl who was the object of his sexual fantasies, but the toilet.

It is very important, therefore, that these two elements appear together in the dream.

The third element is washing the hands.

The girl washes her hands because she has used the toilet.

This is a completely natural activity, appropriate for this place.

It shows that a functional relationship has been established between the anima and the toilet.

For the time being, we are not able to give more details about this, but instead will deal more closely at first with the dream.

The toilet is a very meaningful place, and I am glad we can once seize the opportunity to speak about it.

True, it is not a very savory subject, but it is of great importance to children.

That place is always haunted because the functions that are exercised there are the natural functions par excellence.

In every place where humans are natural, and can't help but be natural, the ancient natural demons are also still nearby.

It is quite understandable, therefore, that the toilet becomes the taboo place par excellence, in which obsessions, phobias, and a plethora of neurotic symptoms have their origins, because it is precisely the natural functions that are disturbed in the neurotic.

The fascination of this place is also immensely increased by the fact that the first beginnings of sexuality are linked to these functions.

Now, there is always a close relation between instinctual processes and the collective unconscious, which reaches deep down into our nature and offers a view, so to speak, of our primordial nature.

So we are completely justified in calling the toilet the collective unconscious, as Dr. Steiner has quite correctly interpreted.

Now we also understand that the anima, that enigmatic figure of the unconscious, just like a spirit, a devil, or a fiend, is up to her mischief in exactly this place.

Are there other places where one is afraid of apparitions?

Participant: The cemetery.

Professor Jung: Yes, cemeteries are classic haunted places, because death also is part of the natural, irrevocable processes.

This is also the reason why dying is accompanied by fears and psychical phenomena.

There, too, nature simply forces its way, and we cannot avoid it, just as we can't avoid dealing with all the other natural bodily functions.

Do you know in which cases the dream language makes use of these processes?

Participant: In case of natural necessities.

Professor Jung: Yes, if we dream, for example, that we have to pass water in the company of other people, or that we have to get up immediately and go to that place.

This means that nature cannot be stopped. It must get out after all.

If, for instance, someone constantly avoids talking about certain things, about which he should talk, he will perhaps have such a dream sometime, in which he suddenly has to go to the toilet or something like that.

In alchemy, too, the toilet plays a not inconsiderable role, insofar as the prima materia or the lapis can also be found in the privies or in excrement.

Meyrink reports on one of his own alchemical experiments in the translation of a tract that has been attributed to Thomas Aquinas.

For this purpose he had bought an old privy, had it emptied, and put the base, the "peculiar juice," into an alchemical pot.

On this he applied a coat of clay and sealed it "hermetically"—obviously quite well, because when he slowly heated the pot over the fire, the lid of the pot all of a sudden blew up.

He claimed that a strange, yellowish matter had formed in it.

The experiment still did not convince him that one couldn't make gold out of the sediment of a sterquilinium after all!

When we study these things we shake our heads and think: there has to be something in it after all, if people are so fascinated by it unconsciously.

We have to consider the claim, therefore, that the prima materia, that earth of paradise, that primordial chaos, is hidden in the fecal matter, as a significant contribution to the psychology of this place.

In our dream the anima appears in the toilet, in precisely that taboo place. Is this alright? Does it fit?

Participant: No.

Participant: Perhaps it does after all, because the toilet represents the unconscious.

And the anima mediates between consciousness and the unconscious.

Professor Jung: But doesn't it strike you as extraordinary or strange that the anima appears in this of all places?

Participant: That's all right as it is, but it still seems to me that the anima belongs more in nature, while the toilet is like a distortion of nature, which gives the situation a moralistic aftertaste.

Professor Jung: Let us disregard the unpleasant and repulsive character of this place for the moment, and focus on the fact that it represents the unconscious.

We can then simply state that the anima is in the unconscious. Is that abnormal?

Participant: On the contrary, it is the place of creativity, where something is created.

Professor Jung: Yes, this is quite in order, or at least it can be in order, because the toilet isn't just "nothing but," but, on the other and, it also has the meaning of a creative place.

As a matter of fact, something is really created there. Children know this very well.

One of my children once stayed in the toilet for a long time.

When my wife asked: "What're you doing in there?" a voice answered: "The carriage and two ponies!"

You probably know the so-called Dukatenscheißer.

The relation between the absolutely worthless and the absolutely valuable is, as we already saw in the previous meeting, a basic idea in alchemy: it is the thesaurus thesaurorum, and at the same time the cheapest of all objects that you can find even in the street.

If we keep this in mind it is not surprising that we come across the anima in this place of creativity and of the unconscious, because the anima is a figure of the collective unconscious.

It is the soul image of a man, that inner personality that is compensatory to the conscious attitude.

As long as it remains unconscious—as it usually does until the second half of life—it is experienced in projection only.

But how is it experienced by the child?

Participant: The child at first projects the soul image onto the mother.

Professor Jung: Yes, the mother is the female figure that plays the greatest role in the lives of children.

Children project their unconscious onto her.

But as they are still completely living in the collective, they cannot experience the mother as real, but above all as an archetype, by which she gains that superhuman, fateful importance.

She can become the witch, the demon, the all-powerful, all of which she is not in reality; or also the all-loving and all-understanding mother.

In dreams she often appears as someone menacing and uncanny, as a ghost or some other monster.

Naturally, it may also be the case that projections of such archetypal images are facilitated by the psychical structure of the mother.

I remember the case of a mother driven by instincts, who could not understand her children at all.

She was infatuated with both her daughters, and the daughters adored her.

But at night they had terrible nightmares in which the mother appeared as a witch, a persecutor, or as an evil animal.

The younger girl once told her fourteen-year-old sister about it, who confessed to having similar dreams of their mother.

Later it turned out that these dreams did not come out of the blue, but were in fact related to the mother’s psyche.

In menopause she fell ill with a depression with fugue states, in which she turned into the same wild animals the children had dreamed of!

She crawled on all fours and accused herself of being a wolf, a bear, and so on.

So the dreams of the children had been a reflection of the mother’s instinctuality, which she would have to realize.

The mother had been too much “up there,” and had played the role of saintly motherhood.

Her daughters had reinforced the mother’s attitude.

The depression was meant to bring her down to earth again.

But even if the dream figures were facilitated by the mother, we must not overlook that they belong to the archetypal world of the children; they are their own archetypes, and must not be taken away from them.

In the present it is not the mother, but a girl who appears.

Why is the anima shown as a girl here?

Participant: Because the anima already appears in connection with sexual fantasies.

Professor Jung: Exactly.

What consequences does the emergence of the sexual fantasies have for the relation of the boy to his mother?

Participant:

These sexual fantasies separate him from the mother, because he cannot approach her with them.

Professor Jung: Yes, otherwise incest would be the result.

But why can’t he simply have an incest fantasy? Why can’t we commit incest?

Participant: Perhaps the father prevents us from committing it?

Professor Jung: No, for one, the father isn’t always at home.

One could commit incest twenty times if one really wanted.

Incest is something quite doable, and it does happen.

But why should it not be committed? What is the reason?

Participant: There is the incest taboo, isn’t there?

Professor Jung: Of course.

Where does this incest taboo, which has been there for thousands of years, come from?

It cannot be observed, as such, in animals, but it exists in all kinds of variations in humans.

The main reason is a psychological one, because this is a highly symbolic matter.

If it were possible that a man could commit incest just like that, he’d have everything at his fingertips and would never leave his home. His initiative would be completely paralyzed, and a psychical incapability would be the result.

The primitive, of course, does not have such considerations.

His own nature stands in the way of incest.

The attraction of something new is so overwhelming that it will always chase him out of his cramped nest.

Primitive man created his marital laws and customs out of his inner needs, such as the marriage castes, the custom of abducting the women, and so on.

We can assume that in children, too, such instinctual forces are effective, so that they do not become involved in incest.

How does their sexuality normally develop?

Participant: It is transferred to a person who does not belong to the family.

Professor Jung: Yes, this also happens with our dreamer.

He had seen this girl in reality, she made a strong impression on him, and in the dream he then brought her up in connection with the toilet, with his cloacal, sexual fantasies.

This helped him circumnavigate the dangerous cliffs of incest.

This connection is only correlative, however, not interdependent.

The latter would have to be expressed by a movement toward the girl.

In the dream the boy feels only separation pain with regard to her, because his sexual fantasies are still attached to the toilet, and will remain split off from the girl for some time to come. Why?

Participant: Because he is still attached to his mother.

Professor Jung: For such a child the mother is not real at all, as we have seen.

She is the bearer of the soul image, she is anima.

So we have to investigate the question why the boy splits off his sexuality on the basis of the psychology of the anima.

Participant: Perhaps another girl is the reason.

Professor Jung: No, these things pose many riddles.

I have to point out that we have to be very cautious in the case of little children, when we think in terms of the personality and try to find a rational explanation.

We must never forget that the infantile soul is no tabula rasa—this would be the greatest misconception—but we always have to keep a door open—to what?

Participant: To the collective unconscious.

Professor Jung: Yes, quite right.

This is also the reason why the anima does not unite with the cloacal fantasy.

Can you tell me why?

Participant: Perhaps the dreamer is too self-centered?

Professor Jung: He certainly is.

The toilet represents his autoerotic attitude. Like so many children, he is curious what adults do in the toilet, and this arouses distinct sexual feelings in him.

But this merely confirms that he got stuck in his cloacal fantasies and was not able to reunite them with the anima figure.

Participant: Would it have been alright for him to link the sexual fantasies with the girl?

Participant: No, because the anima is a figure of his soul.

Professor Jung: Yes, this girl has actually all the advantages of a soul image, and the noblest feelings have been associated with her.

So it was impossible for him to associate her with the other side—his anima image would have been soiled.

This is also the deeper reason for the anima to wash her hands.

She shows him that she cleanses herself of all impurity.

It is as if she said to him: “Your sexual fantasies are about unclean things, with which I don’t want to have anything to do.”

Naturally, this also throws some light on the dreamer’s sexuality.

We have to conclude from his behavior that the image of the anima is, a priori, such that it does not want to merge with the other side, that is, with his budding sexuality.

This actually causes the beginning of a split between the lower and the higher spheres in him.

He has to part with what is high and pure, and it is because of this separation pain that he remembered that dream.

Why is this separation necessary?

Participant: Because otherwise he would never be able to approach the dark side.

Professor Jung: What would happen if he could not separate from the girl?

He would for ever have remained the little boy in whom an image lingers on, and his instinctuality would remain completely undeveloped.

He has to be separated, therefore, from the anima image.

In the dream it is the anima herself who keeps the distance. She actively intervenes.

We must not conceive of the anima as a passive image that the dreamer could control as he wishes; she is autonomous to a great extent.

When she appears in the projection, she is usually extremely overpowering, and the man in question falls prey to her hook, line, and sinker.

Rider Haggard clearly saw this: “She that must be obeyed.”

The anima can be a terrible tyrant!—Pierre Benoit has also described this anima type in his Atlantide.

In a woman, the analogous figure is the animus, which can dominate her and completely bring her to ruin.

The fatefulness of the soul image announces itself very early.

Whenever the anima figure appears in a boy’s dream we have to be careful, because she represents life as such: that which moves herself as well as the dreamer.

In the present dream, the anima washes her hands, which psychologically means that she doesn’t want to have anything to do with sexuality, but wants to preserve her purity.

This attitude of the anima has played a great role in the later life of the dreamer.

The ensuing split between sexuality and the anima is, by the way, frequently found in men, and often manifests itself as a neglect of Eros, which is the essence of the anima.

Men are rarely split off from sexuality, because it is too evident for them, but what they lack is Eros, the relational function.

Men often think they can replace the relational function with reason.

They are proud that they don’t let themselves be controlled by affect, because this would be womanly, tantamount to weak.

No Eros, for God’s sake!

This lack is what women most complain of in marriage, and is what so disappoints them.

For what they seek in a man is the Eros, the capacity to relate.

This is exactly what is missing in our dreamer!

The anima withdraws; she does not want to mingle with the unclean place, does not want to enter into the instinctual turmoil.

But then this is a quite natural attitude for someone whose sexuality is still bound to the cloacal sphere.

At this age it is not yet possible to have a different attitude; sexuality cannot but develop out of this cloacal sphere.

It is the place in which it originates, in which man is born. “Inter faeces et urinas nascimur,” as St. Augustine put it.

For the boy, sexuality belongs in this region, and he should not feel otherwise because then he would be in danger of becoming obsessed.

By what?

Participant: By the soul image.

Professor Jung: Yes, precisely by the anima.

And this would have the psychological consequence that he would remain the cute little boy, tied to his mother’s apron strings, a nice kiddie who never gets into mischief, and to whom the mother says: “Promise that you will never hurt your mommy and kiss a girl.”

Then the little boy is a puppet on the anima’s strings.

This is the sweetness we have to renounce over and over again.

The result would be that sad, nice boy who is good for nothing, whose sexuality is repressed and therefore remains confined to the privy pit.

These are men who foolishly might be taken in by prostitutes, maybe even acquire syphilis. And why?

Because they didn’t notice anything and have never developed out of this toilet into the world.

Then they cannot distinguish between what is dirty and what is clean.

Doctors see all kinds of things in this respect.

Homosexuality plays a great role in these men, because a homosexual is identical with the anima, which brings about his aesthetic femininity, with all of the virtues of the feminine.

He sees a heterosexual relationship in the light of the aspect that exists within himself, which is that undeveloped sexuality—and acts accordingly.

I saw a typical case, a very refined, cultured, amiable adolescent, who was identical with his anima.

Of course he was affectionately attached to his mother, who had taken him on her lap too much when he was a child.

Unfortunately he agreed to undergo a treatment, lost his homosexuality, and wanted to be a “real man.”

But what did that get him into?

He fell for a terrible woman, a potential whore suffering from lues, who was afflicted with a bone syphilis in the nose, a syphilitic ozena, a “stinky nose,” that suppurated all the time.

This was the “toilet” alright, and this was the woman he married and had a child with, who then suffered from hereditary syphilis.

These terrible things could happen because this boy suddenly fell out of the perfumed atmosphere of the mother—she herself an anima child—and into his undeveloped toilet-manliness.

His wife reeked of the stench that had fascinated him.

It is part of the normal instinctual development of man that it begins in the cloacal sphere and has to pass through this dark valley.

The instinctual development is a development “per vias naturales.”

If it only concerns sexuality, however, without the inclusion of Eros, this will be the source of the most bitter disappointment in women.

Most men, however, are not aware of this.

So when the anima says in our dream: “I’m not coming with you,”

this means that the dreamer has to develop into the world.

Fortunately, he cannot give up the toilet fantasies, and fortunately he cannot transfer them onto the anima figure.

Unfortunately, he later succeeded in doing so, leading to bitter disappointment.

Life had to demonstrate to him that he must not transfer sexuality onto the anima.

In falling in love with the anima, he forcibly tried to circumvent the laws of development.

This was a concession to his mother complex.

He was not man enough to withstand seduction, partly due to the fact that he also had a father complex.

His father never allowed him to assert himself against him.

The father was too powerful and did not leave enough room for the son to develop into a man.

As a consequence, the latter was forced to that side of his feelings where he fell victim to his own weakness, and no longer had the strength to escape the anima.

A man proves his moral strength by running away from the image of his anima.

When he falls prey to the anima, he has lost a battle.

This is also the reason why most normal men flee the anima by marrying a woman who does not correspond to that type.

The constellation of this anima type always entails the risk of a concession to the mother complex, but it also brings about the danger that the anima itself will violate its bounds and come out of the unconscious to enter into the world.

The relational function with the unconscious must not be transformed into a relational function with the conscious world!

The anima must always establish the relation with the unconscious, even when the man begins to consciously experience it as a function.

If it tries to represent the relation to the world of consciousness, however, the person concerned will become effeminate.

Unfortunately, their insecure social status forces many men today to function via the anima, that is, to use the anima as a relational function with the environment.

An employee has to know about the whims of his boss, know what to say to him, and so has to acquire quite feminine traits.

Such a man has to become a nice “office sissy”!

This femininity is of no advantage to him, but secures his existence.

That’s the reason why so many men are so unconditionally enthusiastic about the war, because finally they can—“thank God!”—swear, hit, and be real men.

For how can one be a man in a pussyfooting, moralistic society?

Vice versa, the same is true for today's woman, who is often forced into an animus adaptation.

She would prefer to be feminine, and not to take possession of the world head first.

For the boy, the whole extent of the anima problem is hinted at in the dream, but of course his consciousness at that age is not capable of understanding the problem.

The dream image does evoke a certain feeling, however, leaving at least an emotional imprint: here my toilet fantasy and the attached sexuality, there the beautiful child from whom I have to separate.

Let us return to the previous question: why this separation pain?

Why does his anima indicate from the very beginning: "Alas, I have to leave you?"

The moment he has discovered her, he has to leave her again. What is the reason?

Something must have happened before, something occurring entirely in the unconscious, which might provide the explanation for why he has to take leave from this figure.

Participant: He has the inner conviction that the anima is too grand.

Professor Jung: Yes, that's what I meant.

The first anima experience of the boy is a very high idea, something incomprehensibly grand and beautiful.

It is so beautiful that he just knows that he can only lose it.

It is like the farewell to paradise, that wonderful thing, just beginning, filled with the pain: it is lost!

This is connected with those golden memories, those prenatal images, which are still sensed by the hild.

The boy's separation pain shows that he is attached to those magical images, that he comes from that world which, however, he has to leave behind.

The dream shows him that now he has to choose the dirty path, just as eating dust comes after the loss of paradise.

It is outright dangerous to remain attached to this lost world, because in that case one refuses to get in touch with the earth—and will never be born.

Quite recently I met such an unborn man, who constantly had to dream of his own birth.

He had got stuck in his anima.

Such people give the impression of a strangely arrested development.

They cannot touch the world and take it into their hands—but if we want to live we have to take hold of it, and not be anxious about getting our hands dirty.

The world isn’t clean.

Our dreamer has the greatest difficulties imaginable in touching the world, because he has been fascinated by the anima over and over again.

This arrested his development and he became inefficient.

He couldn’t take the dream’s repeated warning to heart.

Participant: It is not clear to me why the girl is a collective figure.

Isn’t she rather a personal figure?

Professor Jung: Yes, it is a girl he knows.

However, she has certain traits of the Anglo-Saxon race and, therefore, represents a type that he will frequently come across in his later life.

This is crucial in this case.

Women, as it is, like to act a type, for instance, that of the coquette; in this respect, one woman is like another, they are interchangeable.

This is only possible, however, if it concerns the man’s anima, and not the woman as a personality.

Men with some insight into their eroticism can easily tell what their anima looks like.

The can say: this is she, and nobody else.

It is strange that there are not many kinds of anima in a man’s soul, but only one anima.

Women, on the other hand, have a multiplicity of animuses.

Often they appear in combination.

There is an excellent description in the book by H. G. Wells, Christina Alberta’s Father.

There a whole “court of old men” is concerned with the moral behavior of the young woman.

The same phenomenon is described in the occult literature.

Among the spirits of William James’s well-known medium, Mrs. Piper, there was a special group of controls, called the “Imperator group” by her.

The animus very often appears as a power animus. In contrast, the anima is essentially a unity, at least in a man whose development proceeds normally.

Such a man will get married and have sexual relations with his wife.

In addition, he will perhaps have the image of a woman whom he adores from a great distance.

If his quiet course of life is unsettled, whether by inexplicable mood swings or by external events, doubt about the past will arise.

He is thrown back onto himself, and has to try to solve the conflict within himself, meaning that he has to establish a relation to his unconscious, and this is only achieved if the anima becomes conscious.

The result of its becoming conscious is that distinctions are being made: the paradoxical and, as it were, completely amoral anima has to be split, because otherwise it would remain inexplicable and not comprehensible for consciousness.

Then it occurs that the man experiences the white and the black anima, the saint and the witch or the evil Circe.

The anima is an absolutely paradoxical being which, however, is basically always one and the same.

It is precisely her ambiguous nature that fascinates man, attracts him until he perishes, and that he has to escape.

Read the novels of Rider Haggard and you will get an impression of what the anima is.

Once he met her in South Africa; he was so impressed that he had to write a large number of books about her.

He accurately sensed that a supernatural being is concealed behind this phenomenon, and that it radiates that strange and powerful magic that also was effective in the ancient goddesses.

These divine figures live on in the anima, with all their attributes of motherhood and pleasure, as well as with all their demonic features, their depravity and magnificence.

Participant: Does the anima remain the same throughout a man's whole life?

Professor Jung: No, the anima is by no means unchangeable.

If the individuation process sets in, for instance, the anima, too, is subject to a change.

She is a personification of the unconscious and consequently modifies her character when the conscious attitude changes.

Participant: Does this change of the anima coincide with the climacteric period, the age between thirty-six and forty?

Professor Jung: This is indeed so, or, I'd better say this would normally be the case, if only the transformation processes were uncomplicated.

In the primitives, these processes are made much more concrete, so that they can be read, so to speak. I'd like to tell you an example from the Indians.

A very bellicose chief dreamed in his fortieth year that he turned into a woman, and had to dress in women's clothes and eat their food—in our eyes an absolutely ridiculous transformation.

But he followed the dream's command and nonetheless remained as respected in his tribe as before, enjoying the reputation of being surrounded by magic.

It was a great dream, a dream of being called. Old men are considered sages by the primitives.

They are the guardians of the teachings of the tribe, of the great secrets that alone make the existence of the tribe possible.

If this wisdom is lost, the tribe will dissolve.

Old Jews had a similar position. In the Old Testament it says: "Your old men shall dream dreams."

They had a wise anima who could open their inner ears.

You see what natural forms the inner transformation assumes in the primitives. In our own case, this is usually much more complicated, because we are no longer able to make the inner processes as concrete. The reason for this lies partly in the fact that the cultural process inhibits natural development, causing certain shifts.

This has the effect that we cannot live what we would have long lived already under primitive circumstances.

Thus a man of fifty or sixty may have to make up for what he should have experienced at the age of twenty-eight.

Then highly infantile things come to the fore in an unnatural way; these are, so to speak, worn out children's shoes—all this because conventions prevent a natural realization.

Then such belated developments happen.

As you can see it is difficult to lay down the general rule that this change is always linked to the turn of life, as it can also happen much later or not at all.

In the case of a highly civilized man in particular, it is possible that he goes on leading an absolutely abstract, unreal existence, and that the whole development takes place in the unconscious.

This nevertheless makes itself felt in consciousness, for example, in the form of a nervous breakdown or of depressive phases.

It can also have the effect that such a person goes under, becomes demoralized, a snivelling woman, full of resentment and with all the symptoms of "female logic."

He then is nothing but anima.

In creative persons we can observe changes in the form of their creative production during these phases.

Nietzsche, for instance, had the dramatic Zarathustra experience at the age of thirty-eight, which stood in remarkable contrast to his previous intellectualistic manner.

True, it is hard to find the female element in Zarathustra, but if you read the work with a critical eye, you will discover the anima at the end.

This experience, however, led him into insanity.

All his anima eroticism is contained in the texts that were found in Turin by Overbeck, and were burned by Mrs. Foerster-Nietzsche because she found them too unsavory.

From a psychological viewpoint, it would have been extremely interesting to learn something about his development in precisely this period.

The Gnostics already knew about the transformations of the anima.

In their writings we find a kind of development of the anima, from its most primitive stage up to wisdom.

The most primitive anima is Chawwa, the earth.

She is Eve, who represents the all-motherly and the receiving.

At this stage, the anima is still a purely sexual being, a kind of earth goddess in a nearly prehuman developmental form.

A further stage is Helen.

According to a Gnostic legend, Simon Magus discovered a girl in a brothel in Tyrus (Phoenicia), in whom he recognized a reincarnation of Helen of Troy, and whom he therefore named after her.

Helen of Troy was an adulteress and the lover of many a hero of those times.

She was actually the type of the “femme qui se fait suivre.”

The link between these two women is that both of them carry a light within them, regardless of their bad reputation.

Helen of Troy means beauty to the man, the Gnostic Helena ennoia (consciousness).

At this stage, man still experiences the anima as a collective figure, but a certain concentration on the one woman has already taken place.

This is a very human stage, partly conducive to cultural development.

The next stage of the anima is Mary, who was also an extraordinary person.

She was the lover of the Holy Spirit and so become the mother of God.

The humiliation by illegitimate motherhood is compensated by the symbolism of her being the mother of God.

Although this stage still bears human traits, it already points to the spiritual.

For the Gnostics, the highest developmental stage of the anima is Sophia.

She is one-half of the divine syzygy (Greek, “pair,” “yoked together”; conjunction and opposition of sun and moon).

She is the most spiritual form of the universal mother.

Any human or personal aspect has disappeared.

The anima as a friend or soror mystica has always played a great role in history.

In the cours d’amour of René d’Anjou she even takes precedence over the wife.

The term maîtresse actually means mistress or master.

In the Middle Ages, for example, the worship of the anima led to courtly love, in which the knight was committed to his lady and was at her service.

In later history we know of women such as Madame de Maintenon, Ninon de Lenclos, or Madame de Guyon.

The latter was a woman of the highest spiritual eroticism and of a strangely deep wisdom.

She deserved being called a saint. It is no sign of culture if a woman is only a daughter, or only a pregnant mother, or only a whore.

The primitives and also the apes do act out this onesidedness.

But should she become the femme inspiratrice, oscillating between goddess and whore, representing all the doubtfulness and diversity of life, the highest skills and the highest Eros are called for.

Such women are manifestations of a much more developed culture, and this was known in the Middle Ages and also in Greece in its heyday.

You know, of course, about Aspasia, the mistress of Pericles and of many cultured men of her time.

Participant: Is it a specific quality in a woman that makes such relationships possible at all?

Professor Jung: Many anima types have something masculine about them. But then, it is after all the soul image of a man.

It is probably the unconscious feminine side in man which, however, does not completely lack maleness.

That's why a man projects his anima onto a suitable woman who shows some male characteristics.

For then she can also be a friend; the relationship is not just a heterosexual experience, but also friendship, and this is very important.

Participant: But then we cannot say in general that it is a sign of strength if the man flees the anima.

Professor Jung: No, this only refers to the young man.

He has to flee this type, so that he may develop into the world. The real confrontation with the anima is one of the problems of the second half of life.

What was right before now dies down; the former ideals are burned.

This is also how we have to understand Nietzsche's dictum of the revaluation of values:

man destroys the values of his youth and prepares his own descent.

1. Dream of a Seven-Year-Old Boy of a Dead Girl in the Water Presented by Mrs. A. Leuzinger

Text: I went to the lake to the steamboat jetty.

There two tree trunks were rammed into the ground to moor the ships.

I had already fished at this place.

When I looked into the water, I saw a schoolmate, on whom I had a bit of a crush, in the water.

She lay dead in the water. Her face was still completely fresh.

She was dressed in a red and white checkered apron.

When I kept on looking, I saw that her face disintegrated. It got criss-crossed with wide red cracks.

I didn't have an uncanny feeling at all, as I later had when I dreamed of corpses.

Mrs. Leuzinger: The dramatic structure of this dream is as follows: the beginning indicates the situation and the locale: the lake, at the steamboat jetty.

The persons are the dreamer and the girl in the water.

The exposition shows the dreamer's activity and the topic: earlier the topic had been fishing, now it is looking into the water.

The peripateia: the face disintegrates, there are wide red cracks in it.

The lysis is contained in the sentence: "I didn't have an uncanny feeling at all, as I later had when I dreamed of corpses."

The dream could also be divided into two halves or dream images: in the first part, the dreamer stands on the steamboat jetty, looking into the water.

In the second part, the focus shifts from the dreamer to the girl in the water; the dreamer becomes only an onlooker.

Some of the symbols, for example, the steamboat jetty and the girl, come from the dreamer's personal experience and state of consciousness.

Around the eighth year there is a transition to ego consciousness, as we have already seen in previous children's dreams.

The child breaks away from the extremely close relatedness with the familial milieu; he has already acquired a certain experience of the world, and the libido, which had up to then been tied to the parents, detaches itself from them and often is introverted.

In our dream there are already some indications of this experienced reality: the girl in the water is a schoolmate—the one he's got a bit of a crush on.

The steamboat jetty is a place known to the dreamer, where he had already gone fishing.

Seen from the perspective of consciousness, the steamboat jetty is a place that exerts a great attraction for boys at the age of seven or eight in their first school years; it has a touch of life in foreign countries and adventure, ships moor and cast off, fishermen cast out their lines or prepare their nets.

It is also possible to stand there oneself with a fishing pole and fish.

There are also other strange and exciting things in the water at the steamboat jetty: bicycles, old tires, things made of tin or iron, sometimes there are also dead fish at the bottom; in short, for an enterprising boy who seeks his first adventures, the steamboat jetty exerts a great attraction.

In the dream, the boy goes to the lake, to the water.

The lake or the water are among the most common symbols for the unconscious.

So I would just like to mention its two main aspects: first, the destructive quality of water—we can sink and drown in it; second, the aspect of healing and salvation, of transparency and spirituality, culminating in the rebirth out of water.

The dreamer approaches the water, but stays at or on the steamboat jetty, as can be deduced from the fishing.

The steamboat jetty has some similarity with the symbol of the bridge, with which we have dealt in detail in one of the previous children's dreams.

If the bridge stands for the continuity of consciousness, however, the steamboat jetty indicates a certain state of consciousness: while the bridge connects two sides, the steamboat jetty abruptly ends in empty space.

The only possible further connection is by boat, with which one can travel the waters, the unconscious depths.

The steamboat jetty that ends in empty space is like a still isolated fragment of consciousness, which could be flooded by a wave of the unconscious, just as the pier could be flooded in a storm by the waves of the lake.

The steamboat jetty is a much less secure place than the bridge; we also say: on shaky ground.

It is suspended between the sky and the water, one no longer has firm ground under one's feet, but stands above the water in a slightly elevated position.

It is a place in consciousness from which one can easily sink into the unconscious.

The steamboat jetty is a kind of link between the ground and the water.

All this leads to a kind of suspended situation, which beautifully illustrates the psychological situation of the dreamer.

A child at his age is indeed suspended between consciousness and the unconscious;

he does not yet have a firm foundation of consciousness.

The child is still rooted in the unconscious, just like the pilings of the pier that are rammed into the bottom of the lake.

What Professor Jung said about consciousness in the primitives is also true for children: their consciousness is still insecure and rests on shaky foundations; it is still childlike, having just emerged of the primordial waters.

A wave of the unconscious can easily run over it.

The dreamer is a contemplative onlooker, which is in perfect line with his uncertain, suspended situation.

The actual drama, the action, begins in the water, in the unconscious.

This time the dreamer does not fish, but looks down into the water, that is, he immerses himself in the unconscious, being attracted by the depths of his own unconscious.

Looking into the water is equivalent to going to oneself.

Professor Jung has elaborated on this process at length; let me quote the relevant passage here:

True, whoever looks into the mirror of the water will see first of all his own face. Whoever goes to himself risks a confrontation with himself. . . . The meeting with oneself is, at first, the meeting with one's own shadow.

The shadow is a tight passage, a narrow door, whose painful constriction no one is spared who goes down to the deep well.

But one must learn to know oneself in order to know who one is.

For what comes after the door is, surprisingly enough, a boundless expanse full of unprecedented uncertainty, with apparently no inside and no outside, no above and no below, no here and no there, no mine and no thine, no good and no bad.

It is the world of water, where all life floats in suspension; where the realm of the sympathetic system, the soul of everything living, begins; where I am indivisibly this and that; where I experience the other in myself and the other-than-myself experiences me. . . . Our concern with the unconscious has become a vital question, a question of spiritual being or non-being.

All those who have had an experience like that mentioned in the dream know that the treasure lies in the depths of the water and will try to salvage it.

As they must never forget who they are, they must on no account imperil their consciousness.

They will keep their standpoint firmly anchored to the earth, and will thus—to preserve the metaphor—become fishers who catch with hook and net what swims in the water. . . . Whoever looks into the water sees his own image, but behind it living creatures soon loom up; fishes, presumably, harmless dwellers of the deep—harmless, if only the lake were not haunted.

They are water-beings of a peculiar sort.

Sometimes a nixie gets into the fisherman's net, a female, half-human fish.

Nixies are entrancing creatures.

According to Grimm's Teutonic Mythology, the mermaid is a magical water creature that has much in common with wood nymphs, elves, water and fountain ghosts, Mrs. Holle, sea nymphs, virgins, and so on. As is shown in many fairy tales (of the water nixie, the nixie in the pond, the little mermaid, the beautiful Melusine, etc.), these are all creatures in need of salvation.

The nixies appear as they sit in the sun, comb their long hair, and with the upper part of their bodies—which is of great beauty—rise out of the water.

When they go ashore, they are dressed like human maidens; they can be recognized only by the wet hemlines of their skirts or the wet tails of their aprons.

Like the siren, the nixie draws the listening youth into the depths with her singing.

According to German fairy tales, children who fall into the well fall into the hands of the water nixie, and have to spin matted flax as in the fairy tale of Mrs. Holle.

But nixies also appear as helpful beings and accompany the drowned humans into the home of the water nixie.

Characteristically, the nixie beguiles man with her singing, fascinates him with her beauty, renders him weak-willed, and pulls him down to her.

Something iridescent and seductive is inherent in the nixie, as was convincingly portrayed by Böcklin in his Mermaid of the Calm Sea.

Professor Jung defines the nixie in the Eranos Yearbook of 1934: “The nixie is a still-instinctual stage, a preliminary stage of a magical female being, which we call anima.”

This nixie-elf-anima represents the soul in its entirety, uniting the good and the bad; it is moving, iridescent like a butterfly.

The soul is a life-giving demon, and plays its elfish game beneath and above human existence.

So what the boy sees at the bottom of the lake, and what fascinates him so much that he loses himself in it, is his unconscious soul, his anima.

Before this sight he stands as if spellbound.

It would only be natural for him to try to rescue and pull this girl up to him, this girl who is his classmate and with whom he has an emotional bond, his “crush.”

But he remains as if paralyzed, unable to actively intervene—a motif often found in dreams.

Nevertheless, he registers the details of her appearance: the still fresh face and the red and white checkered apron.

The apron is a somewhat strange dress for the anima, who otherwise prefers ancient dresses.

Moreover, it is the girl’s school apron, a somewhat dowdy piece of clothing.

It is an exquisitely feminine piece of clothing, designed to protect one’s dress.

In popular superstition (according to the Handbook of German Superstition), the apron has various meanings: on working days it is worn as protection, on Sundays as an adornment.

The color of the apron is not without significance: in many regions girls, brides, wives, and widows are distinguished by the color of their aprons; in Upper Austria, bride and bridesmaids are dressed in white aprons as a sign of their innocence.

Very often the apron has a distinctly sexual meaning, as in the case of the “pubic cover,” called Skamskyte on the Swedish island of Öland.

The loss of the apron means loss of virginity; that’s why we talk of a “skirt chaser,” who is after the skirts like the devil.

The apron has become the attribute of the feminine as such.

Sometimes the apron has a protective and exorcizing function.

According to an Upper Austrian legend, the Holy Virgin catches the pilgrims who fell in the Danube in her apron, so that only one soul is left for the devil who had made the whirl.

When people, and in particular little children, fall down somewhere without getting hurt, the Magyars say that they had fallen into the apron of the Virgin Mother; such an apron is called the “lap of the Virgin Mother.”

The apron is also the place of transformation: in fairy tales it often turns leaves and wood, which had been carried home in it, to pure gold.

In the apron of St. Elizabeth, the food for the poor turns into roses.

The apron is also the place where girls hide something.

I remind you of the dream of the little girl who rode on a lion and had the magic mirror hidden in the pocket of her apron.

On that occasion Professor Jung called the apron the region of the Muladhara, the dark instinctual region, the lowest psychical center.

The Schürze [apron] is also a synonym of Schoß; in dialect we call the Schürze “d’Schoß.” Schoß—lap or womb—has a maternal meaning.

“To rest in the womb of the earth” is an expression we use for the earth as the Mother of All Living Beings.

So a maternal secret is hidden in the apron.

In summarizing, we can say that the apron has a protective and transforming meaning that refers to the female sex.

The color of the apron is also important in our dream; the girl wears a red and white checkered apron.

White and red are a pair of opposites.

The queen in “Little Snow-White” wants to have a child white as snow and red as blood. White symbolizes innocence, red instinct and passion. In alchemical symbolism, white means the feminine, the femina alba; red means the masculine, the servus rubeus.

In our discussion of Peucer, we came across a dream from antiquity in which the pair of opposites white/red appeared.

An old woman, a Sibyl, who kept the old religious sacrificial laws, had to be found between a yew (taxus), which has red berries, and a myrtle with its white blossoms.

The maternal secret lay hidden between the pair of opposites.

I think that the apron in our dream, checkered red and white, refers to something similar.

Checkered red and white means that the red and white lines intersect, so that the pair of opposites of male and female is united in these crossing lines, so that the opposites are united in a center.

In this unity there lies the secret of the maternal womb, in which all new life has its origin.

The dream continues: the girl, the classmate, lies dead in the water, but her face is still completely fresh.

Through the transparency of the water, the dreamer looks at the bottom of the lake, where the girl is lying like Snow-White in the glass coffin, of whom it is also said that after three days, “she still looked as if she were living, and still had her pretty red cheeks.”

But whereas Snow White lay in her coffin for a long time without decaying, in the dream there is a sudden change:

“When I kept on looking, I saw that her face disintegrated. It got crisscrossed with wide red cracks.”

Here something starts in the dream that Jung calls enantiodromia, the fact that the events take an opposite course. In the philosophy of Heraclitus, this term signifies the play of opposites in an action, the assumption that everything that exists will turn into its opposite.

What lives will become dead, what is dead will live, what is young will become old, the old young, what is awake will sleep, and what sleeps will awake.

The flow of creation and destruction never ends.

One moment the face of the girl was fresh and her colored apron glistened in the water, the next her face starts to disintegrate, and there are wide red cracks in it.

Disintegration is an eerie process.

Children generally dread these processes of decay and dying.

The cracks in the face remind us at first of old paintings with their cracks and tears; these, however, are wide red cracks, rather reminiscent of the stigmata of saints, which are linked to suffering and death.

The cracks, signs of disintegration and decomposition, bring the process of dying as it were to life and make it observable to us.

Dying means to pass from the living state into the dead state.

The dead body unites the opposites of life and death in itself.

In popular belief, the corpse still shows signs of life; there are still connections between the living and the dead, which are only severed as the dead person undergoes several transitional stages.

In the Tibetan Book of the Dead, this transitional stage is expressed by the symbolic forty-nine days, which is the period of time between death and rebirth.

It is significant that the greatest chance of salvation occurs in the direct process of dying.

So here we have to conceive of the dead body as the direct expression and the symbol of the magical transformational capacity of the soul, the anima.

This leads us to the actual meaning of the dream.

The steamboat jetty portrays the psychical situation of the dreamer.

Looking into the water is his approach toward the unconscious.

The figure of the girl on the bottom of the lake means that the dreamer's anima is entirely situated in the unconscious.

The attribute of the apron signifies that, with regard to the figure of the girl, the emphasis lies on instinctuality and sexuality.

This is also the reason why the anima has been separated from the mother and transferred onto the classmate.

As Jung has explained in the definitions in Psychological Types, the soul, our inner attitude, is represented in the unconscious by certain persons who show the characteristics that are commensurate with the soul.

The character of the soul would in general complement the outer character and contain all those attributes missing in the conscious attitude.

In his consciousness the dreamer has "a bit of a crush" on the girl, thus something entranced and ethereal; the unconscious, however, shows him exactly the instinctual, sexual side of this figure.

Jung says that the personification of the anima (here represented by the classmate) psychologically always denotes a relative autonomy of the personified content.

Such a content spontaneously either reproduces itself or withdraws from consciousness.

Such a split may develop if the ego and a certain complex are incompatible.

Experience shows that this split often occurs between the ego and the sexual complex.

In the case of a seven- to eight-year-old boy, this will probably not concern a repressed content; the boy was not yet consciously aware of the content at all, and the content now confronts him for the first time in a different form, the form of the anima.

The present dream could be seen as complementary, because it stresses the other side.

The dream brings to light a very specific aspect of the unconscious, the instinctual character of this anima—in this sense it is probably a direct expression of the opposition between the dreamer's ego and his instinctual nature.

The anima makes the dreamer look down into the water, where the unconscious reigns, and where human consciousness wanes like the notion of time in the realm of the water spirits and nixies.

Here a natural process—dying—takes place; viewing it in this light, we could also characterize this dream as a process in which something is partially brought into consciousness, as the nixie/anima is hidden wisdom and secret knowledge.

One moment the girl, with her fresh face and the red and white checkered apron, has all the attributes of freshness and liveliness; the next she turns into a corpse and disintegrates and decays.

This dying is not a completed process, however, but a transition and a transformation, and also includes the possibility of a rebirth.

This is why the nixie/anima of the dream also has the aspects of life and transformation; her element, the water, is at the same time the element of rebirth.

The disintegration and death of the anima demonstrates that what had been valid before—the old still-infantile position—is now dying to be changed into something new.

The dream represents the tensions between the opposites of above and below—between the dreamer's ego, which stands above on the steamboat jetty in a somewhat insecure and precarious state and is threatened by the danger of the unconscious, and the anima, which haunts the bottom of the lake and leads her own spectral life there.

By looking into the depths and approaching himself, the dreamer has probably chosen the right path, although, like so many heroes in fairy tales, he stops halfway, entranced by the all-powerful anima.

When he says of his dream: "I didn't have an uncanny feeling at all," he obviously sees the process of dying as something natural and inevitable.

For the time being, he remains observant and assimilating in his attitude, and does not interfere.

His problem, in all likelihood the confrontation of his ego with his instinctual nature, as it is represented by the anima, is actually not tackled and solved, so the later dreams of corpses are much more threatening.

Professor Jung: In the paper we have heard about interesting mythological parallels to the single symbols.

The real message of the dream, however, seems not to have become entirely clear yet in my view.

What might the message of the dream be?

Participant: The boy is told that his little friend is dead.

Professor Jung: At least you have to say: “Well, something has happened.”

You have to imagine the situation: the boy has a crush on somebody.

He has the first presentiments of tender feelings, and now he discovers his little friend dead in the water.

This should actually frighten him, and the astonishing thing is that this is not so.

Isn’t it a bit suspicious when he states that it made no impression on him, because especially when they were scared shitless, boys usually say: “Oh, that was really nothing.”—But the dream shows us that a little drama actually happened, and that the girl lies half-rotten in the later.

What does that mean?

You’d best approach this dream with as little prejudgment as possible, and ask yourselves: what does the dream tell?

What it says is: wherever you may go fishing, you will discover that the girl whom you love is lying dead in the water.

That is the message, but how do we interpret it? The dream is like nature: it puts a bug in your ear, but you just dismiss it—“Yuck, that’s a bug!”

And you forget how complicated this actually is.

Just try once and exhaust all the secrets of a bug!

We will never understand this secret of life and this cosmos, it is much too complicated, and the same is true for dreams.

They fall like nuts from the tree of life, and yet they are so hard to crack.

So in order to understand the meaning of this seemingly simple message, at first we have to take a look at each detail.

Let us begin with the locale of the events.

The steamboat jetty connects the firm ground with the water.

The former is the place where we feel that we are standing on firm ground, and where we can see and breathe.

The fact that the boy is on the steamboat jetty in the dream means that he approaches the border between consciousness and unconsciousness.

What does this mean for the dreamer in reality?

We have to keep it very simple and stick to the image: he is on the land and comes to the brink of a large lake or the sea.

What will happen if he keeps on going?

Participant: But he can't go further.

Professor Jung: Well, but if he went further anyway?

Participant: He'd come into a new world.

Professor Jung: You call that a new world when someone falls into the water?

He comes into the beyond.

There is a danger, and therefore the dream says: here you're coming to the edge, to an end.

Now it's getting hot and you'll have to be very careful.

Here the risk begins, the uncertain element of water.

This is the first statement in the dream.

But then he stands on a jetty on which steamboats can land, which adds a new twist to the situation: it contains the possibility of leaving, of traveling the unsafe waters and of cruising the lake.

This is the primordial image of the courageous venture.

For the dreamer this implies that he must do something.

He has come to the edge of the steamboat jetty, in other words, to the edge of his consciousness; just as we say that we are on the "brink" of something.

At that very moment, what was common and usual ceases and an adventure starts.

What has he done so far?

Participant: He went fishing.

Professor Jung: And what does this mean for a little boy?

Participant: He hauls out images of the unconscious.

Professor Jung: At this age, fishing is more like a game, it is a game and nothing professional.

Up to that moment he has played with it, and in doing so has hauled out various objects, various possibilities, from those vague and indefinite regions.

Fishing, and also hunting, are old symbols of a more or less playful involvement with adventure.

This continues until it gets serious.

Do you possibly know an example where hunting went wrong and became serious?

Participant: The story of St. Hubert.

Professor Jung: Yes, this gives you an idea.

It is the story of a hunter who on a Sunday sees a white stag, which he wants to bag by all means.

All of a sudden he perceives a shining crucifix between its antlers.

This is a prey he hasn't dreamed of: it is the Holy Spirit itself whom he meets in the forest.

The same story is told of St. Eustace, another Hubert, so to speak.

Many people interact playfully with their unconscious.

They are like fishermen who daily fish in the unconscious and even "nourish" themselves on it: they take all kinds of good and evil things from the treasure of the unconscious, they can have a cultured conversation about them, can philosophize this or that and even write newspaper articles about them.

One day, however, it happens that they catch a golden fish, just as in fairy tales.

What can that mean?

Participant: It could be the anima.

Professor Jung: Yes, it's the old story of the nixie or the mermaid who gets caught in his net. It is the being that has no soul and therefore strives after it.

And that’s where the problem begins.

In the dream, too, the boy’s fishing is a playful occupation with something of which he is not yet aware that this is an adventure and involves danger.

At this moment the dream tells him: “Attention!

Today you won’t catch any fish, today you will see something for a change, something wonderful.”

What can we see in the water that is so fascinating?

Participant: We can see ourselves.

Participant: When we look into the water we see our own images.

Professor Jung: In hydromancy, for instance, a dark bowl filled with water is used, as is still today the custom in India.

Little boys have to look into a water bowl, whereupon they fall into a trance and report what they see.

A similar fascination can be observed in looking into a crystal.

There is a parallel to this self-mirroring, the strange vision in the Gnostic myth of nous and physis.

Nous is the divine spirit that comes from above and looks down into the mirror of physis.

He sees his own wonderful picture in it; at that moment physis clasps him and does not let him go, he is captured in her.

The physis is like the mirror of the water, into which he looks.

She is the waters with the thousand arms, the danger of the unconscious.

Now our dreamer does not see his own mirror image in the water, but the girl on whom he has a crush.

With that the water reveals its secret; the girl is the physis that wants to pull him down with a thousand arms.

But the girl is dressed in a very rustic apron. What kind of apron is this?

Participant: A cooking apron.

Professor Jung: Yes, the cook at home probably has such an apron.

But why does the girl wear the apron of the cook and not, say, of the mother?

What is the cook in contrast to the mother?

Participant: She is the counter mother and subordinate to her.

Professor Jung: Yes, she is the one at whom the boy's affection is directed.

She secretly gives him the forbidden candy that the mother wouldn't give him.

As Wilhelm Busch has put it: "Each young laddie will get hooked on the beautiful kitchen cook."

The cook is a subordinate woman who can on certain occasions perfectly correspond to the anima.

The cook also prepares the food in the kitchen, and this is the place where everything is prepared in mysterious ways.

It is the uterus, the place of coming into being, which is often brought into connection with cooking, baking, or roasting in folkloric tradition.

Just think of the oven or the cooking pot in which the little children are made!

So the cook is a maternal figure, who can represent the anima figure to the boy at a certain age.

At our last meeting we saw that the mother is the bearer of the soul image.

Normally she remains so until the beginnings of sexuality make themselves felt, and the boy has to go down a step.

Then he will often go into the kitchen, because there he finds something more appropriate, something which corresponds to his level of relationship.

He finds it easier to deal with the cook than with the mother, because there is no incest barrier.

As a result, however, the mother is more and more elevated, until she rises into heaven, so to speak.

But the boy also looks for someone less difficult to deal with—no education, for God's sake!

It is extremely convenient for the boy to be spoiled, but not educated, by a woman.

That’s why boys get so easily attached to the kitchen personnel; the kitchen is le lieu de raccrochage for them.

Later, of course, it is the school; there are female classmates among whom one can find a suitable one.

The figure in the water was also a little schoolgirl who, moreover, wore the kitchen apron as a distinction.

With the apron she also possesses the whole secret hidden behind it.

But the child is dead.

We might therefore say that this whole hopeful development breaks off.

What does this mean?

Participant: It is like in the previous dream: the dreamer has to separate from the anima.

Professor Jung: Of course, it’s exactly the same here.

The previous dream gives us the key to this dream.

In both cases, the dream is about the farewell to the anima.

In the previous dream, the dreamer had to separate from the anima he met in the toilet.

This is even farther down than in this dream, which is about the kitchen.

From a certain, perhaps more liberal, viewpoint we could consider this development of such an anima relation as something desirable.

Exactly this development is stopped, however, and a strangely longing atmosphere ensues.

The image of the dead girl seems to tell him: “The sweetest dream of your life” is lying down there and is shattered.

The girl wears that mysterious kitchen apron, checkered white and red. Mrs. Leuzinger has rightly traced the meaning of these two colors.

Red and white are a union of opposites.

Among others, they are the symbol of the medieval mystical marriage, which represents a union of these two, of the white and the red.

There are alchemical tracts in which this union takes place in the depths of the water, for example, in the Visio Arislei.

There the couple, Thabritius and Beya (that is, the red slave and Albeida, the white one), are locked into a triple glass house on the bottom of the sea.

It is terribly hot, and they sweat profusely.

This is done with the help of Arisleus, the ancient natural philosopher (Arisleus is Archelaos, the disciple of Anaxagoras), and his companions, who are also locked in the glass house.

They have to bring the couple to life again.

The philosophers describe consciousness, which activates the latent opposites in the unconscious and leads them toward the mystical union.

As a place of rebirth, the glass house is a symbol of the uterus.

To understand the colors white and red, we also have to take into account something else: they are also the colors of the underworld, as we know from the so-called Apocalypse of Peter.

In the Mabinogion, there are white dogs with red noses and eyes in the underworld.

Just like the uterus, the underworld is also a symbol of the unconscious.

Both indicate a state of unconsciousness that, however, simultaneously represents a potential state—in utero—before birth.

The dichotomy of the two colors is contained in yet another detail in the dream, namely, in the peculiar disintegration of the corpse, in which red cracks appear.

This is a very graphic image: the white skin dissolves, and the red flesh appears.

We might say that the whole girl herself becomes that apron, representing the dissolution of the opposites.

She returns to the state of dissolution and is now herself like a white and red being of the underworld.

This process of decay also occurs in alchemy, where putrefactio leads to rebirth.

Putrefaction is linked to nigredo, blackness; like the darkness of the underworld, it is a state of complete unconsciousness.

If we apply this to the dream, we could say that the girl simply dissolves into the unconscious.

This seems to be a negative ending but, quite to the contrary, this end means something positive: it is only by this that the dreamer can sepduring the intercourse, and dissolves into atoms in her body.

Separate from the attachment to the anima.  Why did he have to have such a dream?

Participant: Because he was in danger of being possessed by the anima.

Professor Jung: What would that have meant for him?

Participant: He would have got stuck in the anima image and he would not have developed into the world.

Professor Jung: From what does the boy suffer so that he has to receive this message?—It is a mother complex; he is still much too attached to the image of the “mother.”

This is a typical dream of a boy with a mother complex. It could lead to the strongest anima possession.

The more somebody clings to the “mother,” the more dependent he is on the processes going on in his unconscious, the stronger their archetypal power and their demonic power will become.

In girls something analogous happens.

In their case, however, it is the father who can become such a demonic power, while the mother plays a different, although not unimportant, role.

For a woman the mother is not the anima—for the anima is always the object of longing desire—but actually the sexual organ, the uterus. In the case of a negative mother complex in a woman, there often are various disturbances of the sexual function, for instance, menstrual disorders and similar disturbances.

In our dream there is too much of the mother in the anima.

The boy has “too much mother.”

For him to be able to distance himself from the “mother,” the dream has to tell him:

Now you’re coming to the edge.

Now comes the adventure of life, with which you have just played so far.

Now it could be expected that this would cause him great pain.

But we should not be surprised that this is allegedly not so; as we have already remarked, many boys won’t admit—God forbid!—that they were impressed by something.

Participant: But if the mother is meant, why does the classmate appear in the dream?

Professor Jung: This is due to his age. I have shown you how the anima gradually becomes this classmate.

For certain reasons, the mother can no longer represent the anima figure; the cook takes her place, or any other female being wearing an apron, thus also that girl.

As a representative of the mother, she has to die.

And this is desirable.

If it were not for that apron, that ridiculous detail, we might well doubt whether this lysis is desirable.

Then we could ask ourselves, if it hadn't been preferable that the boy had fallen into love with this little girl after all, and if it weren't sad and alarming that such a normal expression of love had been cut off.

This would truly be a problem—if the girl did not wear this apron!

The apron reveals the secret connections, reaching to the mother via the cook.

Obviously, the girl is his anima, and this constitutes the difference from a normal relationship.

An anima relationship is never a normal relationship, but always something fantastical.

A man sees his female face in the anima, and that is dangerous; the anima transforms everything it touches.

Wherever it is active, it visualizes one's own image, a man's own image, and this is his female being, an invisible minority that he carries inside himself.

1. Dream of a Three-Year-Old Girl of Jack Frost Presented by Dr. Waller

Text: Jack Frost is coming. She is scared. He pinches her everywhere in the belly.

She awakens and realizes that she has pinched herself.

Professor Jung: This dream is connected to early masturbation, which already started at the age of three, but then stopped again soon afterward.

The dream was dreamed by a three-year-old girl and is the earliest to be remembered.

There are some medical questions involved.

The dreamer has a strong hereditary taint. An aunt suffered from schizophrenia.

Her own psychosis remained latent for many years, and first surfaced in the form of a severe obsessional neurosis.

An obsessional neurosis is one of the most distinct phenomena of dissociation we know of.

It can mean a complete split of the personality, in which one part wishes as passionately to stay healthy as the other wishes to remain ill.

The dramatic structure of the dream has been described quite correctly, but the question of the lysis has not yet been cleared up.

Can we speak of a lysis here?

Participant: Perhaps it lies in the fact that the dreamer wakes up from pinching herself.

Professor Jung: No, because this no longer belongs to the dream action.

Participant: Is it the anxiety the child feels?

Professor Jung: No, because this would mean the exact opposite of a lysis.

The final thing the dream expresses is just anxiety, and surely anxiety can’t represent the solution of the problem.

Moreover, it is nothing extraordinary to wake up from a dream in a state of anxiety.

Many anxiety dreams can have an actual lysis; often, however, it is only hinted at, for instance, if in the dream we know that it is an anxiety dream.

But sometimes the lysis is completely missing, and this is the case in this dream.

Do you remember what we said about dreams without a lysis?

Participant: They point to an unfavorable prognosis.

Professor Jung: Yes, but we must not generalize this.

Not every dream without a lysis has an unfavorable prognosis, for instance, if the danger does not reach you in the dream, or if there is something like a comforting allusion.

But why do we have to suspect an unfavorable prognosis here, after all?

Participant: It is a dream from earliest childhood.

Professor Jung: Yes, and it has been remembered throughout her whole life.

If such an important dream has no lysis, we will have to be attentive, because then a vital problem of the dreamer has found no solution.

Naturally, a dream without a lysis always gives an unsatisfactory impression, particularly if it is of a catastrophic character.

When we hear such a dream, we are actually frightened and would like to maintain silence.

In the last seminar on children's dreams we discussed two such dreams, and I also told you about two catastrophic dreams of a fifteen-year-old girl that ended without lysis.

In all these dreams, the climax, the catastrophe, coincided with the end.

In addition, the present dream seems rather unremarkable, and such meager dreams often have an unfavorable prognosis.

But we must not avoid such examples, because they do happen in reality.

When you ask: "What kind of a lousy dream is this?" you have already noticed something important.

Then, however, you have to go on asking: "Why is this so?"

Only if we take the simplest things seriously will we have the key to wisdom.

A dream is like a piece of nature, and of course we have to react to it.

So we may well swear now and then and say: "Such a piece of shit of a dream. That's really pathetically poor; such poverty is enormously saddening."

We have to let this poverty of nature affect us. Dreams are not always full of fancy details.

If a rich fantasy had blossomed, we could say: "All hell broke loose."

Here nothing broke loose, which confirms the unfavorable prognosis.

The dream contains hardly any possibility of appropriately reacting to it.

It is much too meager compared to its importance.

The figure of Jack Frost appears in the dream.

He is a figure from English folklore, and there are similar figures in German popular belief.

There is St. Nicholas, the icily gray and cold one; he is the old man symbolizing the beginning of winter.

St. Nicholas, however, is a benevolent figure. Why?

Participant: He's like the Erinyes, who are evil and benevolent at the same time.

Professor Jung: Yes, often a good name stands for an evil cause.

Participant: St. Nicholas is also split into two figures.

He usually is accompanied by Knecht Ruprecht, who represents the devil.

He comes with a rod and a sack, in which there are the children he has already taken.

Professor Jung: Where does he carry the bad children?

Participant: Into the forest.

Professor Jung: Yes, into the forest. And what happens there? What is the forest?

Participant: It is a dark place, full of dangers.

Professor Jung: You know the saying "To hell with him!"

This means that the devil takes you to the place of darkness and terror, actually to the place of the dead.

St. Nicholas, too, takes the children to the place of darkness.

As the gray one, who appears at the beginning of December, he is also death, who takes man into the world beyond.

He is a kind of judge of the dead, who punishes the bad and rewards the good, similar to Osiris, the judge of the underworld.

So a very serious meaning is concealed behind the figure of St. Nicholas.

Jack Frost corresponds to St. Nicholas, although he is much less incorporated into folkloric culture.

He, too, appears at the beginning of winter and represents coldness, which implies a memento mori.

A white ghost, he seems to be covered by the shroud of snow. What does Jack Frost in our dream signify?

Participant: Death wants to get to the dreamer.

Professor Jung: Yes, it is not yet spring, and winter is here already.

Participant: Do we have to see the figure of Jack Frost in such a negative light? If he wants to take the dreamer into the forest, this might perhaps only mean a state of introversion, out of which a new content could arise.

Professor Jung: Such an optimistic interpretation is not appropriate here.

We must not forget that the dream has no lysis, and that it is extremely meager.

It is impossible to conceive of the figure of Jack Frost, therefore, as positive.

Even if the Samichlaus appeared in his place, it would be misleading to think of a joyous children's party or any other merry event.

We have to try to grasp Jack Frost in his ominous meaning, as the one who freezes all life.

We also have to stick to the dream, in which the child does not experience joy, but fear of the ghost of coldness.

And this figure touches her!

Participant: This increases the negative effect of this figure. It is similar to the Erlking.

Professor Jung: Yes, the Erlking is also such a ghost.

In Goethe's poem the increasing anxiety of the child is beautifully expressed, until the moment where he says:

"Dear father, oh father, he seizes my arm! The Erlking, father, has done me harm!"

Then the child dies.

Participant: It also seems very dangerous to me that Jack Frost touches the girl on her belly.

Professor Jung: Yes, the belly is the kitchen, the stove, radiating warmth.

In the belly we are sheltered as long as we are embryos.

If we are cold, we'd like to crawl into our own belly to warm up.

This place of warmth is also the origin and the center of all life; this is expressed in the word "liver," the main organ in the abdomen.

It is "the liver," he who lives.

Participant: Can we see from the dream if this is about a psychical or physical death?

Professor Jung: This is not easy to see.

Let us assume that the child told this dream at the age of ten, that is, at a time when there was no visible sign of a neurosis yet. In this case, I would really have been in doubt whether it referred to a physical or a spiritual death.

I would have been able to say only that the dream indicated something extremely alarming, but I would not have been able to decide if this would later lead to an obsessional neurosis, to a psychosis, or to suicide.

But then the dreamer took her own life at the age of thirty-six in a mental institution!

The psychosis began with extreme anxiety states that intensified until the fatal end.

The dream does contain a detail that could point to the suicide.

She herself intervened in her life with a cold hand.

Participant: Was this the reason why she escaped into masturbation? Was it an attempt to keep herself warm?

Professor Jung: Yes, for her it was a defensive move, an apotropaic magic, a stress on life in aspectu mortis, just as people may become sexually aroused when they are in mortal danger or confronted with hopeless, life-threatening situations.

There was ample evidence of this desperate eroticism in the earthquake at Messina.

It is as if the life instinct asserted itself, and as if life tried to affirm itself in a quand-même.

So, you see, the dream is very tragic. I would not hesitate to make a connection between the fact that the dreamer pinched herself and the suicidal outcome. Any more questions?

Participant: You mentioned that the dreamer at first fell ill with an obsessional neurosis, which masked a latent psychosis. How did the psychosis become manifest?

Professor Jung: Behind each classical obsessional neurosis a psychosis is hidden.

In the dreamer the mental illness broke out when the voices began to become audible.

From then on the process could not be arrested by anything.

Participant: Doesn’t emotion also originate in the belly?

Professor Jung: Yes, of course, it is the seat of the solar plexus, where the psychical and the physical are still one.

But you must not conceive of the belly as too complicated. It is merely the center of warmth, the seat of life.

Because the psychical and the physical are still one in it, it is hard to tell if it was a physical or a psychical illness that prematurely destroyed the dreamer.

The unconscious actually does not seem to care one way or the other.

Moreover, the unconscious has a different relation to death than we ourselves have.

For example, it is very surprising in which way dreams anticipate death.

Often this does not happen the way we look at death, but in a completely different manner.

You will find something analogous in astrology or also in chiromancy and other ancient "mancies," in which the indications for death are also very questionable.

It is as if death was something other than what we think.

That is, approximately, how we could put it. It might be linked to the fact that the unconscious has a different relation to time than we have.

In the unconscious there exist, so to speak, an elastic space and an elastic time.

It seems as if these deeper layers of the psyche were characterized by particularly strange features, and this, of course, is also expressed in dreams.

So I would not have dared to predict from the dream's character if a physical or psychical death was implied.

Participant: Wouldn't it have helped the dreamer if she had later gone to a female analyst? What she missed was probably primitive, vital warmth.

Perhaps she never received enough maternal love; moreover, the dream expresses a very negative attitude toward men.

Professor Jung: If we are dealing, as in this dream, with such deep-reaching and life-threatening affairs, the sex is no longer of importance.

In these cases, a physical force has to intervene, a force that pulls the person out of the predicament and saves her from drowning, so to speak.

These fine details no longer play a role, and it doesn't make any difference at all if it is a man or a woman who tries to come to the rescue.

1. Dream of a Ten-Year-Old Girl of a Transparent Mouse Presented by Cornelia Brunner

Text: The Transparent Mouse. In the dream I imagined a mouse; once worms came into it, and the mouse turned gray, then snakes, and it turned red, then fish, and it turned blue, then people, and it turned into a human being itself.

That's how all men and women develop.

Mrs. Brunner: This is an extraordinary dream, seemingly childlike at the beginning, and then purely archetypal.

The details, seen for themselves, could be based on day residues; the context and the structure, however, do not correspond to any experience of the outer world, but, down to the last detail, to experiences of the inner world.

This "development of man" cannot be the phylogenetic development, because the sequence—mouse, worms, snakes, fish—does not correspond to the biological line of development.

Biologically speaking, the fish would have to appear before the snakes, and the mouse afterward.

Let us try to structure the dream:

Locale: In a world of envisaged images.

Time: Once (as in fairy tales, "once upon a time," thus again in the realm of the prenatal imaginary world).

Dramatis personae: Mouse, worms, snakes, fish, humans, one human being.

Exposition: "In the dream I imagined a mouse."

Peripateia: Animals and people enter into the mouse.

Lysis: The transformation of the mouse.

Final realization: "That's how all men and women develop."

So it actually is a drama in four acts, with a prologue and an epilogue.

I will now provide the amplifications to each single dream phase, and then try in each case to deduce the meaning of the respective dream part.

Regarding the fourth act, in which the dream deals with man, I will be very brief, but instead provide a few parallels to the whole of the dream, by which the meaning of "man" will be circumscribed.

The girl gave the dream the title "The Transparent Mouse."

This mouse awakens a special emotion in us.

Mouse is a highly suggestive name for a little girl.

Many mothers involuntarily use this term of endearment.

It seems to me that this is a name for a certain kind of child.

Mouse suggests the image of delicate, gray little fur, of a dainty, swift little creature, which scurries past before disappearing into a corner again, of a friendly, warm, and lovable being, shy toward strangers.

That’s how I imagine the little dreamer.

Now to the amplifications: Brehm calls the mouse the most faithful companion of man, which follows him to the farthest north and to the highest Alpine huts.

He describes it as charming, amiable, also curious, crafty, and very skillful.

It runs, jumps, and climbs even on a blade of grass.

It can even run on two legs like a human.

It is very fertile; each year it gives birth to about thirty young, and a newborn female casts its young already after forty-two days.

Young mice are extremely small and nearly transparent, says Brehm.

According to Schrader, the word mouse is derived from an ancient Indian word, mush, which means “to steal.”

Vice versa, mausen means “to nick” in our dialect.

As to the mythology: it says in the Handbook of German Superstition that dwarfs and elves often turn into mice or slip into mouseholes.

Earth-, mountain-, and house spirits help man in the form of mice, and guard treasures.

Bewitched virgins or wise women sometimes appear as mice.

The transformation into a mouse is often a punishment, for instance, because of a fondness for sweet things.

Peucer saw the devil in the form of a mouse, running back and forth underneath a woman’s skin. Witches try to escape from the fire by turning into mice.

While the girl witch is dancing with Faust on the Brocken, a little red mouse jumps out of her mouth.

Innocent children's souls and the souls of the just appear as white mice, those of the godless as red ones.

The souls of unborn children, too, appear as white mice.

There is a very widespread notion that the soul leaves the human body during sleep in the form of a mouse, sometimes to quench its thirst, sometimes to cause nightmares in people, animals, and trees—in that case, it is usually the soul of a girl.

If the mouse does not return, the girl will die.

To whistle after mice means to lure the souls into the afterworld. Mice are often signs of death.

Gray and black mice generally indicate disaster.

They spread the Black Death and other diseases.

The white mouse appears as a fever demon but, on the other hand, also attracts fever.

It is said that mice are created out of earth or putrefaction, or are made by witches.

Because of their gray color they are seen as tempest animals, coming from the clouds or the fog, or being brought by the wind.

The Teutons, Greeks, and Romans named the muscle after the mouse—mus.

The uterus is called mouse sometimes.

There are also etymological links between mouse and girl.

Now let me try to interpret: the mouse is a soul animal, an image of the psychical reality that is difficult to grasp (it disappears into holes).

It is a form of the soul closely connected with muscle, flesh, body, sexuality and fertility, and the devil.

This is probably the reason for the extraordinary fear and excitement it arouses in many women.

As a transparent mouse, it has obviously just been born, something still very little and clumsy.

Let me also give you the amplifications to "transparency."

When we talked about the glass house on the pyramid, Professor Jung mentioned that transparency would be the expression of a spiritual being, of a disembodied, spiritual existence, of the subtle body in a still unmaterialized state.

In India, the subtle body is represented by the lingam, the phallus symbol.

Thus the mouse, in its meaning as a uterus, is also an analogous female symbol of the subtle body.

We may probably interpret the transparent mouse, therefore, as the subtle body of the dreamer.

The girl sees her own, still hardly born soul. Transparent brings to mind glassy.

The transparent mouse probably corresponds to the glass vessel in which the homunculus, the little man, is to come into being, “the Tom Thumb who dwells in the hollow of the heart.”—The fairy tale “The Glass Coffin” tells that the servants of the bewitched princess are captured in glass vessels as blue smoke or as colored spiritus.

“Once worms came into it, and the mouse turned gray.”

Worms represent one of the lowest possible stages of animal life.

They are segmented and their nervous system consists only of chains of ganglia.

They impress us as a bunch of muscles with a mouth and intestine.

We can hardly feel into such a low stage of nervous life.

They blindly devour the fertile ground, in which they originated, and probably know, besides that greed, only a vague feeling of life and movement, and a blind feeling of being confronted with the resistance of matter.

Worms are found in dead bodies, in putrefaction and decay.

African myths explain that the soul stays in the body until the first worm, the soul worm, comes out of it.

As to the interpretation: for a naive observer, the worms eat earth and transform earth into life, into movement, into greed.

They transform matter into soul. They are life originating in death.

Worms symbolize the first, unreflected movements of the soul—contents that are still colorless, still completely undifferentiated and incoherent, without feeling, without reason, the stirrings of the blind life instinct.

Worms are the most primitive forms of psychical reality, hidden in matter.

They belong to an unconscious level, in which the soul is still completely projected onto the outside, onto objects, and in which we experience the world only by blind devouring, by the resistance of the matter, and by involuntary innervation.

Soul is here still little more than a physical-chemical substrate.

The entering worms are the soul of the matter; they take their lement, matter, into the transparent mouse.

This means that the soul, driven by greed, begins to “eat the world,” to get entangled in the world. The subtle mouse becomes a real, gray mouse.

Darkness, impurity, the gray shadow enter into the pure vessel.

“Then snakes came into it, and it turned red.”—The snakes are hermatocryal, scaled reptiles; they breathe with their lungs and have a cerebrospinal nervous system.

According to superstition, “a man’s marrow, especially from the backbone, turns into snakes.”

When someone makes a fire at night in places with many poisonous snakes, he will soon experience how the snakes will be attracted by the fire and come crawling from all sides, so that he will have his hands full for hours fending them off.

Snakes feed almost exclusively on living animals, which they attack and devour in toto.

Snakes are of various colors and markings: green, yellow like sand, depending on their habitat.

Those living underground are often characterized by a beautiful metallic luster.

The Teutons used the same word, ormr, for worm, snake, and dragon.

In the primitive view, the snake is a bigger worm, which creeps out of the earth toward the fire.

Regarding the appearance of the snake in mythology: you remember what Ms. von Franz told us about the snake as an earth demon, as soul of the dead or the heroes, as a dark god of the Ophites, as the snake of the river bed, as movement, as vital force, as time, and as the snake of salvation.

Philo says of the snake that it would be the most spiritual among the animals, that it would move with exceptional speed, and that its nature would be that of fire.

Ninck points to the fact that the expression, “sparkling snake,” is often used for the eye of the hero.

He says of the dragon, “that fire sparkles out of its eye and mouth.”

The dragon blood has the properties of fire: weapons melt and steel is hardened in it.

The mouse turns red because of the intruding snakes.

Red is the color of fire, of blood, of wine, the color of embers and of inebriation.

In the Handbook of German Superstition, red stands for life and death, for fertility and danger.

According to the Hermetic tradition, red is the color of the spirit, of gold, and of the sun.

Let me again try and interpret: snakes force their way into the gray mouse.

Where life stirs in the dark womb of the earth, it will soon come to the light of day and assume a color, that is, the psychical stirring assumes a certain emotional color, which will at first still be identical with the respective environment, just as snakes show the color of their environment.

The snakes force their way from the outside into the mouse.

It is as if it were attacked by the instinctual stirrings that seem to intrude from the objects into the being in the retort.

What comes into being feels attacked, assaulted, devoured, and, at the same time, invaded by sudden, forceful impulses, by sudden wishes and compulsions.

It has no wishing and feeling of its own, but rather wishes and compulsions that attack it from the objects.

These wishes and compulsions finally reach consciousness, because the snakes open up, with their cerebrospinal system, the possibility of a connection between the sympathetic nervous system and the brain.

A knowledge about the wishes is added to the wishes as such.

The more snakes intrude, that is, the more instinctual wishes are accumulated in the retort, the hotter it gets in it.

The black mouse turns red, the blood warms, the fire of passion erupts.

Here alchemy speaks of the “red slave,” and rightly so, because the being in the retort is at the complete mercy of the heat; it does not yet have a counter-magic with which it could fight or control the fire.

Erupting passion calls for action, for attack, assault, and devouring, snake-wise.

The snake symbolizes the freeing of the energy, the aim at an object, aggressiveness, and drive.

The turning red of the mouse shows that the heat of the soul develops out of the material soul, so that passionate wishing is no longer experienced as imposed by the outside, but as an inner compulsion.

Before, the shadow entered into the mouse, now the animus is revived; the male instinctual force is awakened, which wants to conquer the world to possess it.

And each new conquest feeds the fire and the heat.

“Then came fish, and it turned blue.”—Fish are cold-blooded vertebrates with a barely developed cerebrum, but with gill breathing.

Brehm says that fish perhaps surpass all other animals in their endurance.

Salmon can cover a distance of twenty-six feet in one second, and up to 15.5 miles in one hour. It can cut like an arrow through the water. Most fish are predators, voracious, and audacious.

When they rest—the state corresponding to our sleep—their lidless eyes never cease to be receptive to the environment.

The fertility of fish is enormous.

A codfish lays up to nine million eggs.

Fish change their color according to their psychical processes; when sticklebacks, for instance, get enraged or want to conquer a position with regard to the females, they change from a greenish, silver-speckled, matte coloring to a crimson to reddish-yellow and shiny green color.

The habitat of fish is the sea, down to the deepest depths, from the Pole to the equator, and up to the mountain rivers and lakes.

Let us have a look at their mythology: In the fairy tale “The Fisherman and His Wife,” the flounder appears as a wish-fish.

It fulfills all the wishes of Ilsebill.

But when she wants to be God Himself, she plunges back into her old misery.

In Hofmannsthal’s Woman without a Shadow, seven little fish are the souls of unborn children.

The little children, who are gotten out of the well, live as little fish in it.

Three wise women dressed in blue coats appear to an Icelandic wife of a count, and order her to go to a nearby river, to lie down and drink, and to take the trout she will see into her mouth, and then she will become pregnant.

During the Annunciation, Mary is described as fetching water from a well, or as eating a fish.

The fish is Christ, so called after the constellation of Pisces, in which the vernal equinox entered after the beginning of Christianity.

In the mystical epitaph of Bishop Aberkios, there is a passage: “Belief (impersonated as a woman) always went ahead of me and gave me a fish to eat from a well, a gigantic, pure fish that a holy virgin had caught.

This fish she always gave the friends to eat, with well-watered wine, together with bread.”

Aberkios speaks about the Last Supper or about the fish meal on Fridays, an ancient custom that In the fish sanctuaries of Western Asia, the fish were kept in sacred ponds, sometimes adorned with golden jewelry, on which formulas or whole poems were engraved.

A Babylonian god was called fish as well as “writing stone of Bel.”

In an Irish myth, the “salmon of wisdom” plays a great role.

He who eats it will become the wisest seer in the world.

To this day, Irish peasants say: “They will not be able to do justice to the cause unless they have eaten from the ‘salmon of wisdom.”’

The Greek alphabet was ascribed to the mythical Orpheus, whose name is translated as “fisherman” by Eisler.

In a Merovingian liturgical manuscript we can see how the thoughts are held by letters in the form of fish.

The mouse turns blue because of the intruding fish.

The pure clear water is blue, the mountains are blue, the sky is blue.

Romantic longing searched for the “Blue Flower.”

The little boy described by Maeterlinck searches for the bluebird and finds the way to the primordial images.

Blue coats are worn by the wise women who, as swan virgins, are linked to the water, to the mist, and to the sky.

Mist rises from the water, rises up into the blue sky, to fall back on earth as rain.

In alchemy and tarot, blue is the color of the moon, of silver, and of the soul.

Now to the interpretation: fish come swimming, they surface and disappear, effortlessly they float in the waters and slip away, fish of all colors and forms; inconceivably fantastic are the creatures of the deep sea, enchantingly beautiful in their colors, fabulous the goldfish;

some of them shine, others are transparent like glass, others dark and dangerous, silent, lively images that chase one another, devour one another, playing in the boundless element.

They bring their coolness, the diversity of the various colors and forms, the unborn potentialities, into the red-glowing mouse.

Thoughts emerge, ideas, premonitions, and feelings, hard to grasp, vague in their origin and where they go, one idea devours another, new ideas emerge, enormous sowings of clearly contoured images in the indeterminate, undulating change of the spiritual element.

And the voraciousness of the fish?

How easily an impression, a feeling, is swallowed by another content, how easily we ourselves fall prey to an “ism,” an ideal, a primordial, overwhelming image.

The blue, cool flood flows into the mouse with the fish swimming toward the light and with the “salmon of wisdom.”

It turns blue, blue glass or ice, a sapphire, a cleansed mirror of life.

Where previously wanting and compulsion reigned, now the wish and the idea emerge, where the impetus was caused by and directed to the outside, now the nature and the action of the environment intrude, the imaginary world of the unconscious, the thinking that is in the air.

Feeling is no longer bound to the environment; it now becomes a living form of the content, a psychical expression.

Where previously there was fighting and activity, now there is also feeding and passivity.

In the blue mouse the soul becomes the anima, which mirrors the contents.

Life flows in and assumes a solid form. The thoughts become cool and clear.

“Then people came, and it turned into a human being itself.”—Now what shall I tell you about the humans, about the species homo?

That they have an erect posture and thus display their double relatedness, to above and to below?

Or, as Pico della Mirandola says: “So he is free to sink to the deepest layer of the animal world. But he can also rise to the highest spheres of God.”

And which of the myths is the right one here?

In legends, the hero kills the dragon and wins the virgin; frogs, lions, and bears turn into princes.

Deer and swans turn into virgins, fish into nixies, and then new complications arise, bringing suffering with them and calling for decisions.

What is it that distinguishes man from animals? Is it his reason that makes him tell right from wrong? Is it his eros, his potential for faithfulness and loyalty, or for unfaithfulness and treason? Is it the freedom of will that makes him say yes to all that wants to exist? Is it consciousness that experiences: all that is, and I am——? And the one human into which the mouse is transformed?

To begin with, let me give you some parallels to the gradual structure of this dream.

You will then understand that I have little to say about this final, most crucial transformation.

First, an Australian myth: The ancestor of the Unmatjera tribe was a lizard.

He was lying in the sun, stretched his legs, and as he looked around, there was a second lizard beside him.

Surprised, he called: “But this is my spitting image!”

And again he was lying there, and again he looked around, and again there was a new lizard.

In this way he multiplied his existence by watching.

They all came out of his body without his realizing it.

And as he was again lying still, he became a man.

The myths of the Zuni Indians are more elaborate.

They know of four cave worlds, lying on top of one another, through which the humans climb up on a plant from the dark to the light of day, in order to take off their slimy and scaled clothes.

In one version, these worlds have the following names: the inner world of raw dust, the inner world of soot, the inner world of mist, and the inner world of wings.

I think there is a very elaborate parallel in Tantric Yoga.

This visualizing yoga knows seven mandalas, situated one above the other, which correspond to certain body parts, and which are successively to be awakened and meditated by the ascending Kundalini serpent.

The lowest of these mandalas is the earth lotus.

It corresponds to the gray mouse. It is the place of the world-bound souls.

In its center there is the lingam, colored like a fresh sapling, perhaps reminiscent of a worm.

Coiled around the lingam, the Kundalini serpent sleeps.

In it sleeps the essence of the highest experience.

When it awakens, it ascends, passing through all lotuses to bring them to life.

It is the driving force, the compulsion to become conscious.

The animals in our dream can be seen as a transformational form of the Kundalini.

The dragon in the second lotus corresponds to the snakes in our dream.

Above, there is the fire circle, the center of emotions.

This is the navel lotus, in the region of the solar plexus.

The fish correspond to the heart-lotus, with a fleeing antelope.

Nearby there is the place of the “divine wish-tree.” In this lotus thinking begins.

Then follows the ether airspace or firmament-lotus, which reveals its connection with the blue mouse by its blue ovary and by its name, “circle of purification and ablution.”

Above, in the two-leaved, winged circle of knowledge, there are no longer any animals.

There the yogi sees the highest, eternal god, the incarnate, primordial man.

And finally, in the highest, thousand-petaled lotus, the yogi receives the “knowledge of one’s own self.”

The name of this place is “eternal blessedness,” and some call it salvation, Atman knowledge, or knowledge of existence itself.

Another parallel is given by astrology, in the sequence of the historical ages.

About six thousand years ago, the first historical written records were made in the Age of Taurus.

The earth element is assigned to the constellation Taurus.

In ancient Egypt, the spirit found its expression through the medium of matter, the stone, and the earth.

Two thousand years later, the vernal equinox entered the constellation Aries.

With that, a fiery age began, as witnessed by Moses, when he sees God in a fiery bush, or when God appears to His people as a pillar of fire.

Around the birth of Christ, there follows the Age of Pisces. Pisces is a water sign.

That is probably why we have to look for the spirit in the water, in life's flow of images, and in the unconscious.

And now we are on the threshold of the sign of Aquarius.

The air element is assigned to it, and it is symbolized by an angel or a human being, instead of an animal.

Here the spirit is meant to become something subtle again, and man to become who he is.

This juxtaposition shows what is meant by man in general and by the one person in our dream.

These final stages correspond to the lotuses of Atman-, Purusha-, or God-knowledge.

It is a union with Christ and an experience of the self, or an anthropogenesis that will be fully realized only in the coming Age of Aquarius.

I am not able to make this reaching of the final stage clear to you.

Let me quote instead from Meister Eckhart's sermons.

You surely know the words of Meister Eckhart: "All nature means man."

And another one: "All creatures feel an urge to rise from their lives to their inner nature. All creatures carry my reason within themselves, so that they may gain reason in me.

I alone again prepare all creatures for God!" (All creatures—thus also man!)

And about the final transformation: "When the soul has to realize that no creature at all can come into the Kingdom of God, it begins to feel itself, goes its own way and no longer seeks God. Only then does it die its highest death.

In this death the soul loses all desire, all capability of thinking, all form, and is deprived of all essence.

Now at last it finds itself in the highest primordial image, in which God lives and is active, where He is His own kingdom."

Here the soul has found out that it itself is the "Kingdom of God."

That is why the Church Fathers particularly stress "that the humanness of Jesus must not be just adored separately from the deity, but both have to be worshipped together in one single act."

Now let us consider what the dream wants to tell the little girl.

Look, it says, look at this little mouse, this little, subtle, fragile being.

This is the origin of all humans.

This is not about the growth of the body, because it does not start with the parents.

Neither is it about the "Spirit from Above," because the image of God does not stand at the beginning.

What it is about is something very little, the mouse, that elusive, pilfering, devilish little animal.

And for a long time it goes through many transformations.

At first come the worms, disgusting and voracious.

Through greed the soul becomes entangled in the world, it becomes earthen, dark, and evil.

It is touched by the objects and the humans, and everything is gray and dark.

Then come the snakes, uncanny and dangerous.

Fast as lightning they dash forward, devour their victims and disappear in the fire.

Possession by the instincts, obsession, and heat of the blood lead to fiery desire and fervent compulsion.

And now the magical beauty of the playing fish, colorful, shining, transparent, veiled.

They bring the blueness of the sea with them, the feasts of heaven.

Endless are the possibilities of being, the varieties of wishes.

Whence they come we do not know.

Accept them, for they bring coolness, clarity, knowledge, and wisdom. And then the humans: young and old, men and women, ancestors and grandchildren, each burdened with his or her experience, fate, and cross.

Take them into your experience and behold, this becomes the one, the all-encompassing, the all-representing human being.

So this is a reversed Bardo Thödol, beginning with what is lowest and smallest, to bring all creatures home to the blessedness of the soul.

The Tibetan teachings about the dead, however, incessantly remind us: "Realize that you are looking at yourself. This is you. Everything depends on your reality and that image becoming one."

We know that the little girl died one year after this dream.

The dream does not reveal anything pathological to me, it has a lysis.

Although all the animals that appear in it are considered souls of the dead, they stand in logical connection with the inner development.

What is alarming is only the absolute completeness of the archetypal vision, and this at an age when the archetypal images should be covered and suppressed by her own perceptions and experiences.

This openness to the invasion by the unconscious indicates that she is endangered, that the infantile consciousness was profoundly shaken for reasons we do not know.

In our amplifications to the mouse we have heard that the soul leaves the body at night in the form of a mouse, to quench its thirst; it is said that in most cases this is the soul of a girl, and that if the mouse does not come back, the girl will die.

In our dream, the girl sees her soul mouse, but it does not turn toward her.

None of the animals comes to her; all pass by as in a film, and in no instance is she addressed directly or involved in an active way.

On the contrary, it is as if everything living left with the animals for an afterworld of images; thus a process takes place that is appropriate for old age, not for this early childhood.

We can perhaps draw only one conclusion from the amplification for the inner situation of the girl: that her soul is thirsty—thirsty for living water.

And this dream originates in the living water, only she is not able to grasp it.

That is why she confides in the father: maybe he can grasp it.

And when we look at it now in retrospect, we are most unsettled by what she conveys with it: "Father, here you have your little mouse.

I am going to the beyond of the images, and I am leaving you this dream so that you know what happens and how it happens.

I am becoming a subtle vessel, your point of crystallization.

It is still only a pending possibility, but death and dissolution can make real what is only imagined now."

At a Later Meeting of the Seminar [5 February 1940]

Professor Jung: This dream was dreamed one or two years before the death of the child.

I have chosen it from a series of twelve dreams, and we will hear about still another dream from this series.

All of them are extremely peculiar; I have come across only a few such dreams, and was surprised when I read them for the first time.

At first I did not know at all what this might be about.

We have to go through such dreams very thoroughly and carefully to find out pproximately what they might tell.

For this, the only appropriate method is amplification, because nothing of relevance can be deduced by reduction from the relatively meager visual language of the dream.

This Freudian method would lead nowhere; we would finally arrive at some banal conclusion, perhaps something generally known.

Some little misery or other would come to light.

If we conceive of this dream as a message of the unconscious, however, made in an oracular language, so to speak, we make a certain presupposition: we assume that the dream has a meaning.

But as we cannot easily make a coherent whole out of the few visual notions, this meaning remains hidden to us for the moment.

So it will not be immediately evident to us that this dream of the transparent mouse refers to the development of man, although its meaning seems to be expressed in the final sentence: “And that’s how all men and women develop.”

At first this ideational connection strikes us as very strange.

If we did not know anything about the child, it would be hard to realize that there lies a destiny behind this dream, and that the dream does indeed refer to the end, which has already cast its invisible shadow.

I saw the child myself at that time.

She looked fragile, but was in no way ill. I would have never guessed at the time that an exitus letalis might happen in the near future.

The only thing I can say is that the child impressed me as a bit precocious.

There was no neurosis, no hereditary taint by mental illnesses.

I know the father and the mother and practically all the details about the family, so that I can exclude such a possibility.

In the case of such strange dreams it is by no means absurd to think of a schizophrenia and to inquire after the hereditary taint; in any case this is a sign to be careful!

Such dreams, which surprise us by their strangeness, also occur in other cases, namely, in children who have a touch of genius themselves or come from families of geniuses.

But in that case the dreams are of a different kind, and show a greater richness.

The series from which this dream was taken, however, is not characterized by a very powerful fantasy; every single dream is actually meager and not drawn from the abundant wealth of the unconscious.

It rather seems as if the child had sunk into the unconscious with a part of herself—perhaps favored by her weakness—and was subsequently permeated by thoughts and images that she then could grasp only in her childlike language.

In this dream, the essence is expressed in the final sentence: “That’s how all men and women develop.”

This is the leitmotif of the dream, so to speak.

Without any doubt this is a general idea, a conclusion that the dreamer herself draws.

We now have to ask ourselves:

What does it mean for the child when such an idea rises from the unconscious? What psychical state does this imply?

Participant: Perhaps the child's development did not proceed undisturbed, so that it has to be brought to her attention somehow.

Professor Jung: At first we have to take the generality of the idea as our starting point, and disregard the particularity of the development for the moment.

Obviously, it is the dream's tendency to acquaint the child with the general idea that all humans develop.

What does this mean for the child's consciousness?

Participant: The dream sounds like a primitive myth.

Professor Jung: This is correct, but this refers to the "how" of development, and not to the fact that development, as such, takes place.

What could this mean: "That's how all men and women develop"?

What meaning does this have? What does it imply?

You always have to imagine a dream as like a conversation you overhear on the radio or the phone.

Somebody says something, you hear a sentence of conversation, then the conversation breaks off again, and now you should reconstruct what had been said.

That's how you should think of dreams.

It is always a "listening in."

You just overhear something for a moment.

Something becomes clear subliminally.

You wake up with a sentence on your lips, but perhaps you've even forgotten the dream, too.

We have to try to understand such a dream as an answer to the conscious situation of the child. What question may have preoccupied the child? Perhaps she asked herself: "How do people actually come into being?" Do you think that this is the question here?

Participant: No.

Professor Jung: Why not?

Participant: Because the sequence of the images in the dream is no biological developmental line.

If this were the question, the dream would have to start with the parents.

Professor Jung: Yes, this is not about the question: where have I come from?

The dream does not show a biological, but a completely different developmental line.

At first we have to clarify the psychical situation of the child, because none of all that existed in her consciousness.

Participant: It seems as if she hadn't had the time to wait for the real development.

Participant: Perhaps the child felt she was somebody special, so that she had to be told: "You, too, are just one of all those."

Participant: Often persons whose death is imminent undergo an accelerated development. A whole life unrolls in a very short time. So it could be that the dreamer has experiences that anticipate her development, because she is marked by death.

Professor Jung: I have already mentioned a couple of times that we cannot apply our notion of time to the unconscious.

Our consciousness can conceive of things only in temporal succession, our time is, therefore, essentially linked to the chronological sequence.

In the unconscious this is different, because there everything lies together, so to speak.

To some extent, in the unconscious we all still live in the past; in a way we are still very little children, and often only very little is needed for the "child" to come to the surface.

At the same time, we are standing in the shadow cast by a future, of which we still know nothing, but which is already somehow anticipated by the unconscious.

So if the child is going to leave this world in the relatively near future, it is conceivable the unconscious has already in some way anticipated death.

We can assume that the closeness of death has already cast its shadow on the soul of the child, and has raised questions in her such as: "Why did it come into being in the first place, if it will end anyway?" Or: "Why did it come into being? For what reason?"

It must have been a philosophical question, because the answer is also philosophical.

It is a question that we ask before we die: "Now what was this really all about?"

Like the question that Newton himself answered on his deathbed—he said that he had played on the beach with the other boys, and had found a shell more beautiful than those of the others.

This is such a philosophical answer to a philosophical question.

The dream, too, also leads a kind of philosophical conversation, and the philosophical answer is: “That’s how all men and women develop,” meaning: “That’s how humans, as such, come into being.”

If we apply this hypothesis to the other dreams of the series, we will realize that actually each of the dreams is of a philosophical nature and contains the answer to a philosophical question.

There is a dream, for example, that the dreamer titles “Heaven and Hell,” which goes as follows:

Once I went to heaven with a man.

There were people there who danced heathen dances.

Then we went to hell. There were angels, who did all the good.

This dream contains the idea of the relativity of good and evil.

In a similar manner, this peculiar philosophical character recurs in all the dreams of this dream series, so that we find confirmation of our assumption that the present dream contains an answer to a philosophical question.

The single dreams of a series are logically linked to one another, they express a common content and refer to one and the same psychical situation.

When we have the key to one of these dreams, we will usually understand the whole series.

What is surprising in this series is the strangely impersonal character of the individual dreams.

The events are observed as from a distance of a million light years.

It is very hard to feel into this; but then the dreams are so instructive precisely because they demonstrate man’s existential questions without any reference to the ego.

This is especially clear in the dream titled “The Evil Animal,” which we will discuss in our next meeting.

Also the dream called “The Island” by the dreamer has this strange, objective character:

Once I was on an island, and it was full of little animals that crawled in all directions.

This really scared me.

Then they got terribly big, and one sassy bastard ate me up.

In all these dreams, the dreamer states quite matter-of-factly that that's how it was.

But the situations are such that we would have to expect a much stronger emotional reaction, if, that is, there had been a connection to ego-consciousness.

How does the present dream portray the way men and women develop?

It gives a description as we might find in the tribal lore of the primitives.

A primitive cosmogonic fairy tale could sound quite similar.

The dream is along the lines of ancient patterns, and, therefore, Mrs. Brunner has quite correctly traced these correspondences.

Four different forms of transformation are distinguished, to which different colors are attributed.

They correspond to a certain sequence of stages from animal to man.

Here these stages are characterized by the gray mouse with the worms, the red mouse with the snakes, and the blue mouse with the fish; the final stage is man, to whom no color is assigned any longer.

This sequence is quite imperfect, and seems to be a bit contradictory at first sight.

So the stage of the fish, for example, comes after that of the snakes.

What might be the reason for that?

Participant: For children and primitives the worms and the snakes belong together.

Professor Jung: Yes, of course.

In former times the snake was also called worm, as, for instance, in blindworm.

Certain superficial similarities may have been the reason for this: they are of similar shape, they creep in the earth and in secret holes.

Both are chthonic animals.

Their equation is an expression of a very primitive view, however, because the anatomy of the snake is much more sophisticated than that of the worm.

In phylogenesis, the snakes come after the fish, in accordance with their more highly developed nervous and respiratory systems.

The transformational forms of the mouse imply the idea of different worlds: the worms live in the earth, the fish in the water, and man actually belongs to the air world, because he carries his head in the air (what is missing, however, is the world of fire).

Man's erect posture has already given rise to many philosophical reflections.

It is not easy to classify the snakes in this context.

Apparently, they did not always creep with their bellies on the ground, but were only later cursed to do so, as it says in the Bible: "Upon thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life" (Genesis 3:14).

But why is it the mouse, of all animals, that is the medium of the development?

We cannot give any compelling reasons for this, but Mrs. Brunner has given you enough evidence that the mouse is a soul animal. She has also quite correctly pointed to the transparency of the mouse and interpreted it as spirituality.

Transparency is a criterion for the spirituality of matter.

So the lapis philosophorum is also called vitrum (glass), precisely because it is of a spiritual nature, or lapis aethereus.

So we have to imagine that the mouse, by virtue of its transparency, can form the spiritual vessel, in which the various transformations from animal to man take place.

The starting point of this development is the gray mouse.

The gray mouse is, as Mrs. Brunner has mentioned, an animal that stands in connection to the darkness of the soul; it represents that fleetingly glimpsed, dark nature of man that makes itself unpleasantly felt from time to time, above all at night. Mice are also allegories of gnawing thoughts, therefore, of pricks of conscience, that haunt us like spirits at night.

These are chthonic animals with a certain relation to death.

As deathly animals, they are brought in connection with Apollo.

The Greeks worshipped Phoebus Smintheus, that is, the Mouse-Apollo, in whose temple mice were kept under the altar.

There they were looked after and cared for, and in a way this had the meaning of apotropaic magic.

We might ask what, for heaven's sake, Apollo, the sun god, should have to do with mice.

Now we know that Apollo is not only the god of light, but also the bearer of death, because his arrows can bring the plague, which is an illness that is spread by animals such as mice and rats.

The mouse in general is an uncanny, deathly messenger.

A great mouse plague is an evil omen for a country.

This is understandable, because there were times when veritable mice epidemics broke out, when they multiplied in great numbers, destroyed all the crops, and caused famine and illness.

Participant: In Faust the mice also appear as spirits.

Professor Jung: Where?

Participant: When the pentagram prevents the devil from crossing the threshold.

Professor Jung: Yes, there Mephistopheles calls his assistants, the rats and the mice, that they should gnaw through the pentagram:

“The Lord of Rats and Mice,

Of Flies, Frogs, Bugs, and Lice,

Summons you to venture here,

And gnaw the threshold here.”

Participant: The gray color of the mouse is also the color of the spirits.

Professor Jung: Yes, it is the color of darkness and of the spirits.

So, you see, for all these reasons we may understand the mouse as a dark and enigmatic starting point of the development.

In Greek antiquity, for example, the mice that crept out of graves were considered the spirits of the dead, and were, therefore, taken care of and fed.

The same was true of the snakes.

If such a snake from the grave came into the house, the whole family moved out, because the spirit of the dead had taken possession of the house (the same can also be found in certain primitive tribes!).

In their capacity as spirits of the dead, snakes were even publicly worshipped in Greece.

The snake that was worshipped in the Erechtheion on the Acropolis was considered to be the spirit of King Erechtheus or Erechthonios, who was buried there.

Usually the living spirit of the dead was fed by sacrificed food offered to it through burial holes.

The snake cult also had an apotropaic meaning, because snakes are animals that suddenly appear out of the darkness and, therefore, frighten people.

Moreover, man is incapable of establishing a rapport with them.

They are as enigmatic and frightening as the unconscious, so, since time immemorial, man has protected himself against them as he has done against the unconscious.

Primitives, for example, wear amulets on each joint, and their whole life is completely regulated by an immense number of practices governed by fear.

They live as if imprisoned within walls they have erected out of fear of their unconscious, for it might well play a sudden trick on them.

Snakes, and particularly red ones, are not only spirits of the dead, but can also represent emotional states, as you have heard in the paper.

They stand for the heat of the soul, the fire of passion, and thus represent a more intense stage of development.

The fish, the next transformational form of the mouse, represent the water element.

Here the chthonic quality recedes into the background, and the spiritual begins.

Mrs. Brunner has quite correctly pointed out that fish are like thoughts and premonitions that rise from the unconscious.

There is an analogy in alchemy: when the primordial water, the humidum radicale, is sufficiently heated up, something like fish eyes (that is, steam bubbles) appears in it.

This is what is most precious in fish, that which is capable of being illuminated.

We may here interpret the fish, therefore, as the transition into spiritual element, into the air.

In creation there was only the primordial water at first, which also contained the air.

Then, it says, God divided the waters which were under the firmament from the waters which were above the firmament.

The lower waters border the underworld, but the upper waters are the spirit.

According to alchemical philosophy, the spirit of life becomes visible here, the Holy Spirit.

The upper waters form the body of the pneuma and are a kind of corpus spirituale, or a spiritus corporalis, a subtle spirit.

At the final stage, humans come into being.

As we have heard, different colors correspond to the four stages.

We mentioned already that the color gray is the color of ghosts.

Gray is a combination color; it is semidarkness, in which light just starts to emerge from complete blackness.

In alchemy, nigredo is the initial state, in which death reigns, absolute unconsciousness.

Then follows the albedo, that is, whitening.

The alchemists call it the rising sun that brings the morning and the crack of dawn.

In this respect there is a certain analogy to the stage of the gray mouse.

In alchemy, red comes after white: after dawn comes sunrise, and after sunrise the full sun. In Greek alchemy, the complete constellation is called the “midday position of the sun.”

When the sun reaches its zenith, the meaning of the day is fulfilled.

What has been prepared during the night has now reached its highest perfection.

In other contexts, too, the finished body is called rubinus or carbunculus in alchemy.

It is a more intense state than albedo.

Red, as it is, is an emotional color and stands for blood, passion, and fire.

The blue color is assigned to the following stage.

Blue stands in stark contrast to red and indicates a cool and calming state.

Blue is the color of Mary’s mantle in heaven.

She is the womb in which Christ was born, and has always represented the symbol of a spiritual vessel.

Blue is also the color of water and can thus represent the unconscious:

just as we see the fish in the clear blue of the water, the spiritual contents contrast with the darkness of the unconscious.

The color blue cannot be found in alchemy, but it is found in the East, where it takes the place of black and actually represents a color of the underworld.

In Egypt, too, Osiris in the underworld is portrayed in black or blue.

It is more a bluish-green color that characterizes not only the underworld (Osiris as the “Master of Green”), but also the water world.

This world corresponds to the “lower waters,” in which the animals live as disembodied spirits.

Thus blue is also the bluish green sea that houses the spirits of the dead.

The fourth stage is man, to whom no color is assigned.

So the development occurs in four stages, and this is no coincidence.

This is the most frequently found structure, as, for instance, in a basic law of alchemy, according to which the process of transformation occurs in four stages.

This gives expression to the idea that everything human develops out of something divided into four.

In the legend of paradise, the river that flows out of the Garden of Eden parts and becomes four riverheads.

This image has been taken up by the Gnostics to illustrate the development of the inner human being.

According to Simon Magus, paradise is the uterus, and the Garden of Eden the navel.

Four flows emanate from the navel, two air- and two blood-vessels, so to speak, through which the growing child receives its food, the blood, and the pneuma.

In antiquity, the world was classified into four elements, to which also four temperaments corresponded.

Four reemerges in the work of Schopenhauer in the theorem of the Fourfold Root of the Principle of Sufficient Reason.

In Christianity, the division into four is expressed by the symbol of the cross.

Where else does the division into four appear in Christianity?

Participant: In the benedictio fontis.

Professor Jung: Yes, in it the priest divides the water in the form of the cross, he seemingly divides it into four parts.

In this way he repeats the beginning of creation.

By this act the water becomes the mysterious, eternal, and divine water, by which man is cleansed of all sinfulness and impurity.

The ablution, as it were, puts him back into the primordial state of innocence.

Apart from the four there are, of course, still other sacred numbers, but in each case of totality quaternity plays an important role, be it about the most primitive or the most elaborate ideas.

The four always expresses the coming into being of what is essentially human, the emergence of human consciousness.

Thus, the alchemical process also begins with such a division into the four elements, by which the body is put back into its primordial state and so can undergo transformation.

1. Dream of a Ten-Year-Old Girl of the Evil Animal Presented by Dr. Jolande Jacobi

Text: The Evil Animal. Once I saw an animal in a dream, and it had very many horns. With these it gored other little animals.

It coiled up like a snake, and was up to its tricks.

Then blue smoke came from all four corners, and it stopped eating.

Then came the Good Lord, but actually there were four good gods in the four corners.

Then the animal died, and all the eaten animals came out alive.

Professor Jung: As you have seen, this dream is rather difficult and, given the young age of the dreamer, really remarkable.

It is a product of the unconscious such as we rarely come across.

As in the dream we discussed last time, the expression is basically simple.

But that is precisely the astonishing thing.

At first glance we are nearly unable to form a picture of what it might mean.

Initially one does not have the courage to draw such far-reaching parallels as Dr. Jacobi, and to assume the presence of such fundamental problems of the history of mankind in a child’s mind.

But there’s absolutely no way around it, because we can be sure: the simpler a dream is, the more we are confronted with general and fundamental problems.

For it is only a deceptive simplicity, due to the fact that the dream, despite the importance of its content, has not found enough substance to express itself.

We could compare it to a framework of archetypes, for which there is already a disposition at the beginning of life, and which is gradually filled with substance in the course of development.

If a primordial image forces itself onto consciousness, we have to fill it with as much substance as possible to grasp the whole scope of its meaning.

Basically, in our dream only axes are hinted at, which express the core content of the image in a very general way.

The poverty of the composition strangely contrasts with the importance of the content.

At first there is a horned animal, a kind of dragon, which gores all the other animals.

It is a destructive monster that brings death to all living beings.

We could say: this is death.

Then the deity appears, actually divided into four gods, and reverses the whole process.

The monster dies, and the little animals can come out alive again.

This is a typical enantiodromia, which is already contained in nuce in the two extreme figures of the deity and the dragon.

This is about the age-old confrontation of man with god and devil, these two poles of the world into which he is put.

It is a deep-rooted dream of mankind, which reaches down into unfathomable depths.

Here it could not assume a more complete form, however, because there is still too little experiential material in an infantile mind.

We could ask ourselves: How come a child has such a dream?

It is a completely pagan dream, whose symbols can barely be still detected in Christianity.

We do find such images in the apocalypse, but there they are in such a complex context, and in such cryptic form, that today we are hardly able still to understand them.

So we may assume with reasonable certainty that the child did not get these images from the New Testament.

Moreover, she grew up in a family that did not attach much value to religious education.

The ancient historical images, so immensely attractive to children's fantasy, no longer play any role at all today.

This is a loss for our souls, because we don't give the soul a language to give expression to its contents.

In religious instruction, we more and more refrain from making children acquainted with these images, and instead offer them moral teaching, in which the devil is ignored altogether.

But as this dream concerns an evil animal, which obviously represents the devil, we can be rather sure that the child did not get this image from school.

So we may probably exclude an influence on this picture from the outside.

The infantile soul is no tabula rasa at all, as presumed by modern psychology, but the ancient images are always already there a priori.

Mrs. Jacobi has assembled excellent material, which enabled her to give a nearly complete explanation of the images.

I have nothing basically new to add, and would just like to make a few amendments.

What is remarkable is that the dream is divided into two parts.

We can distinguish a first, "descending" part from a following, "ascending" one.

These two parts correspond to the earlier-mentioned polar structure of the dream.

The dragon as representative of the first part symbolizes the organism in its two aspects of life and destruction.

It represents the being that in China is expressed by the yin principle.

The ascending part, in contrast, leads into the blue smoke, into the air, which by its nature corresponds to the yang principle.

It is the smoke that rises from the earth, and which contains the gods as spiritual beings or smoke figures.

Through them rebirth takes place.

The primordial image of the division into two, preceding each creation, is also found in Genesis; there, the darkness of the depths—the lower waters—is incubated by the spirit of God hovering above it.

Thus they are impregnated, and the creatures of the world emerge from them.

The first, descending part of the dream takes place, so to speak, in the lower waters, that is, in the unconscious.

The dragon gores the many little animals, so they are doomed.

The feature of multiplicity, here in combination with the animals, is an essential characteristic of all inherently unconscious life processes.

This phenomenon is also frequently found in illnesses that are on the border between the psychical and the physical, for instance, disorders of the sympathetic nervous system or also states of intoxication.

In the hallucinations during a delirium tremens often a great number of mice, insects, or also people, appears.

This multiplicity is closely connected to the nature of the sympathetic nervous system, because its function is neither centralizing nor unifying, but branching and disseminating into the individual life of each cell.

The image of the many little animals that are devoured thus indicates a dissolution and a destruction of organic life in this child.

A death is taking place, so to speak.

This process of destruction, by the way, is also hinted at in other dreams of this series, in which there is also a mass of animals, as in the dream entitled “A Severe Illness” by the child.

It goes as follows: Once I dreamed that I had a severe illness. Suddenly many birds came out of my skin, and they all sat down on my legs and on my whole body.

The phenomenon of multiplicity does not necessarily appear only in the case of an organic problem, as in this case, but can also indicate a dissolution of the person, the individual, into the collective environment.

Multiplicity, as such, is characteristic of any inherently unconscious life process.

The more unconsciously a process takes its course in a person, the stronger it is dissolved in the sphere of multiplicity, in the region of the many, of the others, of the mass, of the collective.

In these cases it is often difficult to prove that such a process still belongs at all within the sphere of the individual.

It is rather as if it were “in the air” and belonged to the many; therefore, it is also represented by the many.

I would like to illustrate this with a typical dream:

Someone dreams that he comes to me in my practice.

On the way, he meets lots of acquaintances and relatives, which annoys him.

Now everybody knows that he is going to Dr. Jung.

Then he enters my room, and again there are lots of people, so he can't speak.

Here the unconscious state of the dreamer is hinted at by the multiplicity.

He is "scatterbrained," not centered, that is, not brought together into one.

When someone is in such a state, every psychological process is contagious and leads to peculiar phenomena of participation.

On the one hand, deep psychical stirrings in the individual may then affect the whole environment, and, on the other hand, the individual is carried away when the environment is seized by some psychical momentum.

When you are in a crowd that gets agitated you will be infected, even if you do not share the people's conviction.

You can't do anything against it, because nothing is passed on more easily than emotions.

It goes straight into the unconscious, and then it is nearly impossible to hold out as an individual.

This is also how religious collective experiences work, in which each individual at the same time experiences the many, the others.

All are united with one another, and in all the same state of multiplicity predominates.

There is something destructive in this multiplicity; it turns against the unity of consciousness and dissolves it.

Wherever the multiple occurs, there is a conflict between the unity of the ego and the multiplicity of the persons in the environment.

The person is, in other words, under too much pressure from the environment, from the opinion of other people, and from what is written in the newspaper.

It can very frequently be proven that "the many" represent as many resistances and prejudices, which thwart the unity of the individual.

So in the dream some aunt may say: “Oh dear, now what are you doing, going to Dr. Jung?”

Or the father and the priest raise their objections.

The psyche will then be decomposed into many single units, and we actually will have to put the person together again so that he regains his unity.

So there is a great deal of collective psychology in the motif of the many little animals.

Thus our dream not only concerns the soul of this single child, but it pertains to much more, namely, to her parents, siblings, and the whole environment.

I have to add that the child is from a German family, and that the father was very active politically.

So there is no doubt that there is a great emphasis on the environment, and when exciting things happen there the child will be forced to take part in the emotional state of the family.

The first part of the dream represents the dissolution of the individual into multiplicity; the second part shows the complete reversal of the process: the dissolution is followed by the synthesis.

It occurs in the upper layer as represented by the blue smoke.

It says in the dream: “Then blue smoke came from all four corners,” and then:

“Then came the Good Lord, but actually there were four good gods in the four corners.”

The deity is something like vapor or smoke, rising into the air from below.

Simultaneously the principle of fourness appears: it is the tetras, the quaternity, which is always the symbol of composition, of bringing order into the chaos.

We saw already last hour that dividing the chaos into the four elements is the primeval act of the seeing spirit; it is the attempt to bring order into the chaotic plenitude of phenomena.

The division into four is a principium individuationis; it means to become one or a whole in the face of the many figures that carry the danger of destruction in them.

It is what overcomes death and can bring about rebirth.

In our dream, the appearance of the four gods causes the death of the evil dragon animal, by which life can begin again: the many little animals all come out again.

The dragon as the dominating power in the first part of the dream prepares for the advent of the deity.

It is the devil, the devouring animal of the underworld that swallows everything.

But when it has devoured enough, it will have eaten its way into its own demise.

Events turn, and the second phase reestablishes order.

Thus the devil is a preliminary stage of individuation, in the negative it has the same goal as the divine quaternity, namely, wholeness.

Although it is still darkness, it already carries the germ of light within itself.

Its activities are still dangerous and deadly, but at the same it is like the darkness of earth in which the seed germinates.

In the dream it is, therefore, followed by the blue smoke, which rises from the depths in the four corners, and in which the divine quaternity, the wholeness, becomes visible.

The fact that deity and devil belong together also plays a great role in alchemy.

There the devil appears in the form of the serpens Mercurii, which, however, is at the same time the serpent of the Nous.

For the Naassenes, too, the nachash, the serpent, is the Nous, or the Logos.

Psychologically speaking, the fact that the Logos at first manifests itself as a poisonous snake means that whenever a powerful content emerges from the unconscious, which we cannot yet grasp with our consciousness, there is a danger that the whole ego-consciousness will be pulled down into the unconscious and dissolved.

This introversion process can eventually lead to mental illness.

Consciousness is completely emptied, because its contents are attracted by the unconscious as by a magnet.

This process leads to a complete loss of the ego, so that the person in question becomes a mere automaton.

Such a person is actually no longer there. He makes the impression of a piece of wood that lets itself be pushed around.

He has completely lost his initiative and spontaneity, because his consciousness has been dissolved by a content of the unconscious.

In the process of individuation, too, new contents can announce themselves in this devouring form and darken consciousness; this is experienced as a depression, that is to say, as being pulled downward.

As the unconscious has a tendency to project itself into the outer world, there is a danger that one might get dissipated in the environment, instead of staying with oneself.

That's why the alchemists stress again and again that the alchemical vessel has to remain hermetically closed during the opus.

If the lid springs open, vapor will escape and the process will be disrupted.

Only when we bear our situation and accept our depression will it be possible for us to change internally.

Then the devouring animal will be deprived of its power, and the new content can be grasped by consciousness.

In the dream, the dragon animal appears as a horned figure, although the child does not specify the number of horns.

The image of the horned serpent is very frequent in mythology.

Seven horns stand in connection with the seven days of the week, to each of which a planet is assigned; in seven days the moon completes one phase (one week), and in four times seven days queen Luna, accompanied by the seven planets, wanders across the sky.

The idea of the seven planets also plays a great role in alchemy.

There they sit together in a subterranean cave; they are the seven that are hidden in the womb of the earth. Here the seven are representatives of the metals.

When the dragon has twelve horns, this corresponds to the twelve months or the twelve signs of the zodiac.

So we can say: the animal in the dream carries on its head, like a diadem or a crown, either the hebdomas, the seven planets, or the dodekas, the twelve signs of the zodiac.

In antiquity the image of the horned serpent was projected onto the sky.

It appears in the well-known image of Draco, which meanders as a shining ribbon of stars, as sky serpent, between the Great and the Little Bear and, while always visible, moves around the pole.

The world fire burns in this place, and, therefore, it is also called the fire pole.

There the dragon rotates, eternally watching the objects in the sky.

Now, we must not think that the ancients actually saw bears and snakes in the sky; this is a mythology inherent in all of us, which everybody can, therefore, reproject onto the sky.

Thus our science has started with the stars.

There our world consciousness came into being, and from there we took our science.

Our deepest inner layers are hidden in the stars.

When it is said that old Aratus interpreted the constellations mythologically, this is non-sense.

He did not interpret anything, but everything has always been as it is.

This sky serpent, the Draco, is the reproduction of a primeval image within ourselves.

Later, at the begin of the Christian era, Gnostic natural philosophers tried to incorporate these projections of the serpent into man, and to conceive of them as a part of the human structure.

The body of the serpent became the spinal cord, its head the brain.

This anatomical localization of the archetype contains an excellent interpretation, insofar as the lower psychical centers of the spinal cord In astronomy, the constellation of Corona (crown) is not directly above the head of Draco, but this is irrelevant for the mythological interpretation.

are without doubt the seat of the unconscious.

Already the sky serpent, which winds around the mysterious North Pole, was based on the idea of the serpent as the seat of the unconscious.

It revolves as if around its own center.

The world axis goes through the pole; it is in some sense the center of the world, but also the center of the unconscious around which everything revolves.

There the deity, the ruler of the pole, moves the whole firmament as if he had it on a handle.

The same idea can be found in the Mithraic liturgy, in which God swings the shoulder of a cow in his right hand.

This is the Great Bear, which rotates around the pole like the dragon.

A similar image of rotating serpents is found in the so-called Tantric Yoga, in which the Kundalini serpent winds three and a half times around the lingam, the phallus of Shiva.

So if we take a very close look at the dragon with its mysterious horn, we will see that it also represents the deity, only in a different, dark aspect.

In the dream the dragon is followed by the blue smoke, rising out of the four corners, and thus being divided into four.

It represents the positive aspect of the deity.

To conclude, I would like to make some additions to the important notion of quaternity.

We often find it portrayed in Christian images, although it actually does not belong to the dogma; the latter is the Trinity, the threeness.

Quaternity is basically a pagan notion and much older than Christiantiy.

Originally it goes back to Pythagoras, who saw in quaternity the root of eternal nature.

It is a number that expresses the inner essence of nature.

This meaning has remained preserved through all times.

In Christianity, for example, we have the picture of the rex gloriae, the triumphant Christ, who sits enthroned amidst the four Evangelists.

Frequently their animal symbols are found instead of the Evangelists; three of them are symbolized by an animal, and only John, the fourth Evangelist, by an angel.

There are pictures from the Romanesque age, in which the Evangelists are portrayed with the heads of their respective animals: Mark with the lion head, Matthew with the eagle head, Luke with the head of a calf or an ox.

The four symbols of the Evangelists have also been condensed to one animal, so that a tetramorphous emerged, a fourfold being, which served as the mount of the Church.

In the Gnostics, too, we find a portrayal of the Son of God on a platform on four pillars, the tetrapeza.

The four legs are the four pillars, which represent the four Gospels.

The Gnosis is rich in portrayals of quaternity.

You know, perhaps, the Gnostic “Anthropos,” the primordial man, who is symbolized by the city with the four gates.

He is the Autogenes, the one who gives birth to himself.

He is also surrounded by two parental couples, that is, four persons.

Moreover, in Irenaeus we find the idea of the upper mother (Anometer), the Barbelo.

She is the female appearance of the deity. Her name is interpreted as “in the four there is God.”

In numerous Gnostic systems there are such and similar ideas, sometimes in the form that three further principles are deduced from a basic one.

Or the ideas are more Aristotelian, meaning that originally there are four elements, and the fifth, the quinta essentia, is their center.

For Aristotle this is the ether.

So the four is thought of as 3 1, or simply as 4, or as 4 1. In the latter case, however, the result is not the five—which would be an expression of the state of unconsciousness—but the quinta essentia, which is always the extract or the origin of the four.

In alchemy, the idea of a month is a basic principle.

It is also called the prima materia, and the four elements develop out of it.

Out of these, in turn, the monas develops, which represents the spiritual unity of the four.

Here, too, quaternity is the unfolding of the one; it becomes a system of orientation for consciousness.

An example is the division of the horizon into four parts.

In addition, the four elements provide a first orientation in the world, and the four temperaments are an orientation in the chaotic psychical nature of man.

In accordance with these, the principles of human life were localized in the body in a kind of system of chakras, namely, in the brain, in the heart, in the liver, and in the genitalia.

So, amongst others, reason and the sanguine temperament were associated with the brain, courage and the choleric temperament with the heart, the warmth of life and the melancholic temperament with the liver.

In alchemy, the division into four plays a very special role insofar as the nature of Mercurius is the cross.

In his fourfoldness he expresses the unity of the opposites.

Mercurius is the most peculiar and paradoxical being imaginable; he is also called the servus or cervus fugitivus, he who can never be caught and who runs through the fingers like quicksilver.

Mercurius is composed of four mercurii; their names are:

1. mercurius brutus, the brute Mercurius, that is, common quicksilver (mercury);
2. mercurius sublimatus, Mercurius as a spiritual being;
3. mercurius magnesiae, magnesium as the vera alba, the pure substance, the shining wisdom, and the great light;
4. mercurius unctuosus, the unctuous Mercurius, which gives expression to the darkest darkness that we find in the interior of the earth and of matter.

It is thought of as slimy, gooey, viscous, unctuous matter.

This Mercurius divided into four parts is in accordance with the idea of Mercurius as a hermaphrodite.

For he is the Re-Bis, the malefemale, who holds the new light. In the Middle Ages we find the idea that the unharmed virgin, who in turn is Mercurius, is living in the interior of the earth.

The alchemists were convinced that God had put a spiritual substance into the world, so that it would be transformed by man into the substance that brings salvation.

Regarding the polar appearance of the deity, there is a parallel in the meditations of Przywara, in which God appears as concurrence of the opposites.

When He manifests Himself, this happens in a conflict on the cross.

Here you can see the whole symbolism.

The conflict situation seems to have been the origin out of which consciousness developed, and still develops anew again and again.

We still witness this nowadays, day after day.

Nobody will ever become conscious if he does not hit his head on something.

Now why should the child dream of such problems?

This I don’t know. We can only state that this is what happened.

The child has been told a truth, the absolute, basic truth of humankind, for which there is no proof, of course.

The proof lies in the truth itself.

It is expressed by the soul and by what human beings have thought since time immemorial. These are the truths that live forever.  Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 236-378

[1]Zarathustra Seminar

1934 3 June LECTURE V, Zarathustra Seminar

Dr. Jung:

Here is a question by Miss Hannah: "It seems to me so odd that Zarathustra should use the expression 'bowels of the unknowable One,' as one is more inclined to connect bowels with the earth?"

But this expression seems to me very apt, for "bowels" simply means contents, and in "the Unknowable One," Nietzsche surely refers to the unknown god who, he said, was dead.

It is a funny thing, however, that throughout the whole of Zarathustra you get a feeling as if this god whom he calls dead were not absolutely dead.

He is somehow lurking in the background as the great unknowable one of whom you should not speak; you simply should not take him into consideration: he is too dangerous to be mentioned.

So his peculiar expression that you should not be interested in the bowels of the unknowable one means that there is somebody there, only he is utterly taboo.

You see, that is explained psychologically by the fact that Nietzsche calls himself an atheist, for anybody who calls himself an atheist is a negative theist; naturally he would not deny a thing if he did not think it was there to be denied.

He would not add the a.  It is an admission of God when you call yourself an atheist, because whether you assert a thing or deny it, you confirm that it is:  you cannot deny a thing without giving it a certain existence.

It does exist somewhere even if you assume that it exists only in the minds of other people; that it exists in the minds of other people means that it does exist.

So Nietzsche’s God exists somewhere and has contents but he must be careful not to mention them.

That an atheist is particularly concerned with God is not understood with us because we are still unspeakably barbarous in that respect, but the East is a bit more differentiated in such matters.

They have the saving that a man who loves God needs seven rebirths in order to be redeemed or to reach Nirvana, but a man who hates God needs only three.

And why?

Because a man who hates God will think of him much oftener than a man" who loves God.

So the atheist hates God, but he is in a way a better Christian than the man who loves him; Nietzsche is a better Christian and far more moral than the Christians before and after him.

You see that explains a great deal of Zarathustra, which is a highly moral book.

If anybody should try to live that teaching, he would have astonishing experiences.

He would certainly feel himself to be a better Christian than all those before him.

He could buy a halo for his own private use and make himself the first and only saint of his private church.

It is true of course that we use that expression "the bowels of ...  "rather in connection with the earth, and in a psychological sense we mean the contents of the unconscious, which we think of as below.

But to the Christian era the unconscious was by no means below;  it was a fiery and luminous heaven above.

All the heavenly "powers and principalities" of the Catholic church are really the contents of the unconscious,’ but at that time they projected the unconscious into the world above, and only through the descent which has taken place in the last four hundred years, has it been brought down into the lower regions, the earth, into the real bowels, the intestinal region, the kingdom of the sympathetic nervous system.

Then there is a question by Mrs. Bailward: "Is the artist the person who can frame the here and now of the creative forces? Does the body do the same for the self?-and is the self under the law of the uniqueness of the moment in time?""

That is an exceedingly philosophic question.

The artist can of course frame the here and now of the creative forces; his creative force consists in the fact that he can express the actual creative moment because he is creative, or the instrument of the creative force, which is synonymous.

Through being creative one creates the thing that has come into existence in this moment, that was in a potential existence before.

And the body in a way does the same for the self; the body is the expression of a preexisting uniqueness.

It is as if built up by a preexisting uniqueness; it is the realization of a unit of life. naturally, that is not the biological way of expressing it.

Biological science tries to explain life through a sort of physiological causality, the causality of the chemical transformations of the body, as we try to explain the evolution of certain forms by certain climatic conditions or other physical or physiological conditions.

The success of that explanation is not very great, however, on account of our profound lack of knowledge.

Why, for instance, in a certain geological period should a certain species of animal prevail.

Of course, there has always been a certain amount of sea, but in one period we had water animals and in another land animals; and we only can assume that the water animals moved slowly out of the sea and became amphibious, and then developed into animals that preferred to be on firm ground.

But why and how they could do so remains absolutely dark.

We can not imagine how a fish could suddenly change into an animal that walks on four legs and breathes through lungs; an indescribable fact must have taken place that provided those animals with lungs.

Even the principles of Darwin cannot explain why they did not just die out instead.

If there was a lake or part of a sea, for example, that became more and more shallow and slowly dried up, then the water would become more and more salty and the fish would have perished because they cannot live with more than a certain percentage of salt. In the Red Sea there are no fish, no life can exist with that concentrated amount of salt.

One can assume that the sea was continuously filled with fresh waters and so evaporated slowly, but from what we know, while the lake was drying out, the fish simply perished and they did not develop lungs.

As a matter of fact the strange thing that paleontology now teaches us is that in a new age a huge number of new species appear, perfectly finished and developed; and we can find no traces of the stages where they were half-baked.

It seems as if all those animals were suddenly there.

So, in most recent times, among the people concerned with those problems-the biologists and zoologists and so on-there is a growing inclination to assume a peculiar creativeness in life, able to produce a new species in an unknown way.

We have a certain analogy in the so-called mutation of plants, where a new plant comes into existence, finished, like those famous beeches with red leaves, for example, which suddenly sprang into existence about the middle of the nineteenth century: it just happened.

And there are other well known cases of mutation of trees.

So, such experiences have led modern biologists to think that there is a peculiar creative factor in life.

Now, if we apply that idea generally we come to the conclusion that there is a preexistent uniqueness, or a unit of life, that creates a certain body according to its own peculiar uniqueness, creating it exactly as an artist creates a work of art out of a preexisting vision.

And if the body is created by the self, and the self is called a uniqueness, then we identify this uniqueness with the uniqueness of the moment of creation.

This is substantiated in a way by the very awkward fact that the uniqueness of the particular moment in time in which a thing is created is characterized by certain qualities as is proved by the fact that the horoscope can give the character of an individual-·· If it were impossible to deduce a human character from a horoscope, then of course that whole idea of the identity of the uniqueness of the self with the uniqueness of the moment when a thing comes into existence would not be valid; but as a matter of fact you can deduce from a horoscope, you can show the character of an individual to an amazing extent.

We will now continue our text, the last part of the sermon of the Superman:

It is not your sin-it is your self satisfaction that crieth unto heaven; your very sparingness in sin crieth unto heaven!

The German word for sparingness is Genugsamkeit.

I would call it frugality: your frugality crieth unto heaven.

Where is the lightning to lick you with its tongue? Where is the frenzy with which ye should be inoculated?

Lo I teach you the Superman: he is that lightning, he is that frenzy.

Here again is this term "great contempt."

He says-several paragraphs before this-that the greatest thing one can experience is the hour of great contempt.

He obviously makes rather a point of it, so he must mean some definite psychological fact.

What do you think he means by it here?

Mrs. Baynes: Does it not mean reaching a point of view where you are prepared to give up the most precious thing that you have?

Dr. Jung: We will see whether that hypothesis fits.

When I ask what they desire the most, the most precious thing, plenty of people will say, to be happy.

A whole continent believes in being happy-go-lucky, that is proverbial, we all believe in it to a certain extent.

Then, others will say they desire reason the most.

You know the Goddess of Reason was put upon the throne in Notre Dame instead of God-I think it was in 1796.

Then, virtue is the best you can desire according to certain convictions.

And righteousness is surely praised by many people as the very finest thing they can possibly possess; you also can call it respectability, because if you feel very respectable you are quite righteous.

And the most wonderful of all is pity, because pity is at the bottom of Christian love.

The pity for all things living is the very essence of Buddhism also.

It even goes so far that every morning one of the priests in the temple carefully wipes the floor with a broom, not to remove the dust but the insects that might be trodden upon, so they are invited to leave the sacred precincts to preserve themselves from possible injury to their legs or little bodies.

You see, we have here a series of very noble things which humanity has always held to be the most precious.

So the hypothesis put forward by Mrs. Baynes surely explains this contempt as the contempt of all those virtues.

But why should the hour of this contempt of all the noble ideals, the most desirable precious things, be the greatest moment in life?

Answer: Because these qualities are only the compensation for the shadow.

Dr. Jung: So you would conclude that Nietzsche is really looking for the dark things that lurk behind all these beautiful virtues, as if they surpassed all the good mankind could desire.

This is another hypothesis.

He says: Not your sin but your frugality, your niggardliness even in sin, crieth unto heaven.

So the contempt really comes from the fact that the shadow is so great and thick that one begins to despise all the virtue mankind has praised in the past.

For what is it?

It creates in consequence a shadow as dark as hell, so overpowering that it is really not worthwhile to praise all those virtuous qualities; the greater reality is in the darkness and not in those ideas of beauty and light.

That he says your frugality in sinning cries unto heaven means that he sees those ideals as a sort of pretext or subterfuge over against the overwhelming fact of the sin in man.

Here you see the good Christian but with the a in front of him; he sees all that as sin, which is the way the Christians would speak.

He is still under the shadow of the church; he is within the sacred precincts, and therefore he feels quite blasphemous.

You see, the dark things which are understood to be sin are only sin when you are entirely upon the standpoint of the preceding list of good qualities; if you once imagine that these are really the most wonderful ideals man could aspire to, then naturally everything which is less good seems to be dark and sinful or immoral.

So he wishes for a spark of lightning to sting people out of that idea of despicable ease, to wake them up so that they can see the real truth of man.

And he holds that this lightning which should lick people with its tongue is the Superman.

One could call that a sort of speech metaphor, conveying the idea of a situation in which everybody was more or less asleep, without realization, and then something suddenly happens which wakes them up, a terrible crash or a stinging pain, and for that lightning would be a good simile.

But there is something more in this image of the lightning.

This simile turns up, for instance, in a Chinese inscription, which surely was quite unknown to Nietzsche.

It is a verse and I cannot quote it literally, but the idea is that from time to time mankind gets into an inexplicable state of sleep or of torpor, exactly like the mood in nature before a thunder storm.

The air is heavy and man and beast fall asleep; the trees are without movement; everything becomes like lead.

The Chinese text says that something is spread over the earth like a wonder which cannot be explained, and then follows an invocation to the dragon to rise.

He is lying coiled in the deep, but he should rise and strike with the lightning of his tail so that the whole of nature would wake up again.'"

It is exactly the same metaphor, but the symbolism is more conspicuous.

For that dragon means what?

Mrs. Crowley: If it were Hindu it would suggest the Kundalini.

Dr. Jung: Yes, but what would be the Chinese meaning?

Mrs. Fierz: The Yang principle.

Dr. Jung: Yes, that former condition is the Yin condition, where everything has taken form.

Everything is real, concrete, indubitable; and when things have become, they go to sleep.

That dormant condition means that the Yin principle has swallowed the Yang principle completely.

It is like a dark cloud spread over the earth, but within that cloud is the lightning lying coiled, ready to strike.

Then the Yang strikes and the cloud opens, the rain falls, the air becomes clear, the rivers begin to move, new plants come up from the parched soil, and new life is created.

So that simile most certainly refers to a psychological condition underlying the symbolism, which you see very clearly in the Chinese text.

It is a close analogy, as Mrs. Crowley has just mentioned, to the Kundalini serpent which is called the coiled one; the serpent is coiled in a dormant condition in the depths of the darkness, in the cave, and when the moment comes when something has to happen, the Kundalini suddenly rises and hisses and causes something like a lightning flash, a sudden sting.

This peculiar quality of the Kundalini describes a psychological moment, the breaking up of an old order, and it starts to break up through a sort of intuitive flash; somebody suddenly has an intuition, and that is the first lightning which then dissolves a whole complicated situation which one thought would last forever.

Nietzsche understands the idea of the Superman in that sense.

He holds that man has gotten accustomed to the idea that it is worthwhile to live for all those virtues, for all sorts of ideals and beautiful things, and would always remain the same.

He is in a certain order: he has his position, and it is just as if it had been ordered for eternity.

You know, no treaty is made which people don't suppose to be forever; no state, no church, is founded which is not for eternity: everything should last forever.

It is an apparently desirable condition which has been brought about and which should always last, in spite of the fact that we know very well how long treaties usually last.

But again and again man seeks to establish something for eternity.

And that is not ridiculous because it is the essence of civilization or culture that it can and should resist time; it is the characteristic of anything man-made that it is able to resist the continuous dissolving activity of time and nature.

That is why we build houses instead of having mere shelters under trees, or tents, or any other very transitory contrivance; we make things as durable as possible in order to establish the victory of man over nature and over the transformation of things in nature.

If you should make a philosophy with the idea that it was only for the next fortnight, of course you never would make it; you make a philosophy with the assumption that you are going to bring out a truth that will last for several thousand years at least.

This tendency to create a form of civilization any form, religious, political or social-always has that claim of durability, of resistance against the onslaught of time and nature.

And it is such a condition, the tail end of the Middle Ages, into which Nietzsche was born.

You see the Middle Ages reached right up to the beginning of the great war; we still had the feudal system, we had kings and feudal princes according to the ideas of the Middle Ages-of course in a somewhat different form, but more or less as it always had been during the last two thousand years.

The best proof of that is that we still founded our religious and philosophical convictions upon the New Testament.

That is the highest authority and it has naturally created a certain social form and morality, and certain religious and philosophical convictions; even if these convictions have an a to them, even in the negation of those old beliefs, they are and have remained as they always were.

Nietzsche was born in such a period, as I said, and he felt that it was a dormant condition which had to be exploded by the idea of the Superman, which means that man is not a definite form, a definite entity that remains the same for millions of years, but that he can change, undergo a mutation as it were, and suddenly transform into something else.

Of course, that is again a very Christian idea: it is the idea of Christian conversion.

In the early days of Christianity, they held the same conviction, that when a man had undergone the mysterium or the sacramentum (the two terms are synonymous: in the early church it was called the mysterium and later they preferred to call that old mystery ritual the sacramentum, but the process was exactly the same), he was made sacred, or mana, by a transformation into something else.

He was nearly drowned in water and pulled out of it as if out of a womb.

The baptismal fount in the church was still called the uterus ecclesiae in the Missale Romanum, and the people who had undergone the transformation were quasi modo geniti.

It was understood to be a complete and thorough change of man; he was made into something new, no longer the old Adam.

He put on Christ, the new body, and was made into a child of God, an immortal being.

Without baptism or without taking communion, one misses the pharmakon athanasias, the medicine of immortality, and is merely mortal like the animals; one has no soul.

That belief went so far that old Tertullian was convinced that if a man was baptized he could not sin any longer, and if by chance a man should sin again, something must have been wrong with the baptismal ceremony, so it had to be repeated.

He was enormously surprised to find people who went on sinning in spite of the second baptism; then he thought they were children of Satan and utterly lost: they simply had to be dropped.

Nowadays, when a person in a religious movement is not behaving according to rules and is not saved, he is called neurotic and sent to the analyst.

And then the analyst asks quite justifiably, what can he do, is he greater than God?

This belief that through a religious conversion we become quite different beings, is still alive among us.

Somebody becomes a Christian Scientist, for instance, and is supposed to be an entirely changed man; formerly, he was a rascal, and now look at him: he does not drink or waste his money running about with women, so Christian Science must be the truth.

Then the Methodists and the Baptists and the Salvation Army and the Oxford Movement and four hundred other denominations walk upon the stage and tell you that all their members have become entirely different people.

Therefore, they all contain the truth. Now, what truth?

It is the old belief that that thing is the living truth which changes people completely; the criterion for the truth is that man is changed, proving that there is some secret magic in these forms or convictions.

That was the belief of early Christianity, and it is the same idea which Nietzsche proclaims here: the idea that the Superman would be the lightning which would upset the dormant condition of his world, so that man could change.

It is not exactly the Christian transformation through the grace of God or baptism.

It is due to man, because when God is dead he appears next in the one who kills him:

then the divine creative faculty needs must dwell in man.

And then man has the faculty of transforming into the Superman, by which is not meant a man of greater virtue but a man who is simply beyond this man of today, a different creature obviously, a man who can deal with the darkness in human nature.

Dr. Reichstein: I think the oldest picture of this idea is the Iranian myth of the original primordial man who sleeps and must be awakened.

Dr. Jung: Yes, that is a similar idea, and there are other primitive beliefs that the first couple, or the first god, was asleep and had to be awakened.

When Zarathustra had thus spoken, one of the people called out: "We have now heard enough of the rope-dancer; it is time now for us to see him!”

And all the people laughed at Zarathustra.

But the rope-dancer, who thought the words applied to him, began his performance.

To whom does the rope-dancer refer here?

Remark: To Zarathustra?

Dr. Jung: Well, I must say it is not quite clear.

We only know that there is a man who is really a rope-dancer, and when the people call for the rope-dancer he sets to work.

There is a certain confusion between the real and the symbolic rope-dancer here.

Mrs. Baumann: It might be the Superman.

Dr. Jung: Yes. You see, the ordinary man could not be compared to a rope-dancer; he lives in good houses in safe cities that are watched over by the police, and there are excellent laws, and boundaries to every country, and settled conditions.

But the rope-dancer walks on a very high rope in the air; it is an acrobatic stunt and if he falls down he is killed. It is a tremendous risk, the symbol of a dangerous transitus.

So the Superman could be man in the situation of a rope-dancer, running as great a risk as the rope-dancer who risks his life.

It is as if there were a misunderstanding here between the audience and the speaker.

The people think Zarathustra is speaking of the real rope-dancer while he is really speaking of the Superman of whom the rope-dancer would be a symbol.

Now, we have been reading the sermons or reflections of Zarathustra, and there has been very little action, but here we come upon action again, as in the descent of Zarathustra from the mountain and the meeting of the old wise man.

And whenever talk transforms into action there is a reason for it.

Do you know what it is? Why should talk suddenly become action?

Mrs. Fierz: If what is to be told is not clear, not conscious enough to be said in words, a sort of symbolical action would take the place of the word.

Dr. Reichstein: Speech is always one-sided, and this action could be the reaction from the unconscious brought out by the speech before.

He teaches more the Yang side, and the action might he the reaction of the Yin side.

Dr. Jung: Yes, that would more or less coincide with what Mrs. Fierz said.

Something is lacking in the sermon apparently; with that statement, "I teach you the Superman," a certain culmination is reached, and for the moment he cannot go beyond.

He says he is the lightning and he is the madness, and now of course the sermon should continue and say where it starts, and of what the effect of the lightning or the frenzy consists, and how it shows.

But there he seems to have hurt himself against a snag, so the sermon goes underground.

It is like a pause in a speech: one's thoughts suddenly leave one and one has to do something about it and then it turns into action, and the action must be expressive, symbolical of the spoken word.

Mr. Nuthall-Smith: It would be when he gets tired of talking.

Dr. Jung: Zarathustra is not easily tired of talking.

Mr. Nuthall-Smith: But the people get tired.

Dr. Jung: He pays no attention to the people, as we have evidence for in the next chapter where it says: "But Zarathustra, looking at the people, wondered, and then he spoke thus: ... "You see, he continues; he is not afraid of tiring people with his talk, and it is quite a while before the rope-dancer can get to work, because Zarathustra is still speaking.

No, he has hit upon something there, he has hurt himself against an invisible snag, and that is of course the transition over to the question how that idea will work, what it means to man and what it means to himself above all.

For instance, when somebody says a whole mouthful and then suddenly stops and cannot find the next sentence, you can be sure that he has hit upon something in himself which caused the hesitation.

If a person announces as his sacred conviction that things should always be done in such and such a way, and then doesn't know what to say next, it is because the devil has hooked on, asking: "Do you really know your own conviction?" or "Do you really mean what you say?"

And obviously he does not know then what he has said or what his conviction was.

It often happens when people say more than they can swallow, that they are suddenly disturbed from underneath; they forget what they wanted to say because the unconscious has withdrawn it.

They were just gliding along, it was all plain sailing, and then they struck upon a shallow piece of ground where the unconscious was close to the surface: suddenly the unconscious hooked on.

In such cases, the symbolic or symptomatic action follows.

This is such a moment. Zarathustra hesitates, he looks upon the people as if he were wondering about them.

As a matter of fact he should wonder about himself, because here Nietzsche touched something that gave a spark for the time being.

He is able to go on, but in the meantime, while Zarathustra goes on talking, the symbolic action begins to work.

Now, this rope-dancer is quite obviously a relation of Zarathustra he is his symbolic action-and I think we are quite safe in assuming that he represents Nietzsche's inferior side, because all the preoccupation with the rope-dancer in subsequent chapters shows that he is really concerned with that man and sees himself in him.

So we may assume for the time being, as when one dreams of an inferior person, that this is the shadow figure, the inferior man in himself.

And it really is the inferior man in him that has hooked on here, saying: Now what about that transition to the Superman? How can you become the Superman?

For it is expected of you, Zarathustra; of you personally, Friedrich Nietzsche.

How do you get beyond your migraines, your vomiting and sleeplessness and chloral and all the other narcotics, and your terrible sensitiveness and irritability?

You see that would happen in every one of us.

Now he starts again to speak about the Superman, because he begins to wonder what the effect or the idea of the Superman really means to him personally.

So he says in the way of reflection:

Man is a rope stretched between the animal and the Superman a rope over an abyss.

This is the answer he is giving to the doubts as to how man can get across to the Superman, by what means that change can be made, and why it should be made.

Those are the doubts of the inferior man, so this is almost in the way of an admonition.

A dangerous crossing, a dangerous wayfaring, a dangerous looking-back, a dangerous trembling and halting.

What is great in man is that he is a bridge and not a goal: what is lovable in man is that he is an over-going and a down-going.

In German it is Ubergang and Untergang, which would be literally a going-over or a going-beyond, and a setting like the sun.

He says:

I love those that know not how to live except as down-goers, for they are the over-goers.

I would prefer to say: "I love those who live not, save as suns setting, for they are going beyond."

I love the great despisers, because they are the great adorers, and arrows of longing for the other shore.

By these words he is soothing himself or explaining to himself why the longing for the Superman or going beyond man is a greater virtue than remaining the ordinary man.

He says to himself that he loves those men who don't remain what they were, but who live in order to change, to live beyond themselves in order to become.

I love those who do not first seek a reason beyond the stars for going down and being sacrifices, but sacrifice themselves to the earth, that the earth of the Superman may hereafter arrive.

He denies the Christian idea of self-sacrifice for a thing which is beyond the world, for an extra-mundane spirituality.

He doesn't see any merit in killing the body for the sake of the spirit, and moreover, one would never be changed by sacrificing oneself merely to the spirit.

His idea is that it takes greater courage, greater virtue, and a greater sacrifice, to live, to sacrifice oneself to the earth, to reality; for if one sacrifices oneself to the actual concrete reality, one is changed and thus one prepares the way for the Superman.

One occasionally comes across such problems in people in analysis, particularly in cases of transference.

You see it sometimes happens to pious people that they get neurotic and unfortunately enough they have to go through an analysis, and then-Oh Lord!-they even fall in love with the analyst.

They get a transference which at times takes on a most disquieting religious aspect-the analyst takes on the aspect of Jesus: they would like to kiss his feet and call him Jesus.

Then, they develop a most formidable resistance against such a blasphemous transference.

But the more they resist it, the more they project-till he is almost overwhelmed by the negative Christian projections.

Of course he is then not only Jesus but also the devil himself. naturally, the conflict is great in such people.

The thing to which Nietzsche alludes happens to them: they get neurotic because they exaggerate their own spirituality.

They identify with the spirits in heaven and imagine themselves spirits and nothing else.

But unfortunately they have a thick shadow.

They have a body underneath all that show which won't agree with the spiritual show on top; it revolts against such spirituality, and that causes the neurosis.

Then, in analysis, naturally they become aware of the fact that there is such a thing as body, that the spirit does not pay for the whole performance.

The body has to pay the damage too.

The unconscious insists very much then upon the physical presence of the analyst; and transference has the meaning that they should be brought to recognize the projection of their religious contents into as ordinary a human being as an analyst.

Of course, they are mighty glad if he is not quite ordinary. "Such a great man!"

His great mind excuses the fact that they have a transference, for if it were on any ordinary human being, it would be insupportable.

But mind you, it is not his mind at all, I have known that for many years.

At my last lecture at the University, I walked downstairs behind some girls and I overheard their remarks:

"I didn’t understand a word of what he said today." "You did not understand? It was as clear as a bell."

Then can you explain such and such a thing?" "Oh well, I did not quite get it, but I know he is right, he is so strong and so healthy!"

So it is an awful thing to find all your values projected into an ordinary human creature with a body, particularly all your religious values.

And mind you, if that figure has a mind, it is an obstacle, by no means an asset, because you have then to cast away all that mind business in order to see that it is a body.

To see great religious values in the body is a very horrible discovery for a good Christian.

It is just that to which the Lord himself alluded when he spoke of the possibility that he might be seen in the shape of the lowest of our brethren, that in the lowest of our brethren we would be able to recognize the Lord.

A very wise word, but of course a more loathsome word to a Christian.

It is not accepted, because they only want to pity the lowest of our brethren; the idea of seeing anything of high religious value in them is much too dangerous.

I explained that once to a conference of theologians in Strasbourg and they all averted their eyes and walked round it.

It was too hot a stew; they would not put a finger into it.

Yet, it is of course a most important point; it is the problem of our time, in which of course Nietzsche also was concerned.

He understands the acceptance of the man of earth as the self-sacrifice of greater merit than any sacrifice for the sake of spirit.

He sees that acceptance of the real concrete man, identical with his body, as the greatest meaning of our time, for such a sacrifice would put modern man before a problem of almost unsurmountable difficulty.

We would rather accept anything in the world, any devil or any hell, than accept ourselves in our particular concreteness.

That is the thing of which we are most afraid.

You see, that being is not even very sinful, not even superb in its sins-just hellishly banal and of a low order, not interesting at all.

We would prefer superb sins than to be ourselves with all the banality which we represent.

Therefore, he says:

I love him who liveth in order to know, and seeketh to know in order that the Superman may hereafter live.

Thus seeketh he his own down-going.

Here is again the famous Untergang the setting of the sun of all his ideals about himself; it is an extraordinary disillusion and an increase of knowledge.

Without disillusion you never acquire knowledge, and without knowledge you never acquire a new consciousness, and without consciousness you never change: living unconsciously you remain forever the same.

I love him who laboureth and inventeth, that he may build the house for the Superman,

That is the new man who knows, whose consciousness is exceedingly individual if he can once swallow the fact of himself.

and prepare for him earth, animal, and plant, for thus seeketh he his own doing-going.

He goes down into the concrete reality.

He becomes again man and disidentifies with his ideals.

In other words, he creates a new ideal which is coincident with the real man, with man as he is in the body.

I love him who loveth his virtue; for virtue is the will to down-going, and an arrow of longing.

Again the virtue of the doing-going, the approach to the earth, to man as he is.

And the arrow of longing is the changing, going beyond, because by accepting oneself as one is, one gets a longing to be different and that moves the whole world forward.

We don’t want to be ourselves, because we cannot stand ourselves; therefore, we never make progress.

We remain as we are because we don’t accept the only thing which can be motive power enough to bring it about.

Only when we accept the thing which is loathsome to us, have we a real will to change, not before.

I love him who reserveth no share of spirit for himself, but wanteth to be wholly the spirit of his virtue: thus walketh he as spirit over the bridge.

That means that he loves the one who has the intuitions of such virtue, who at least intuitively grasps the meaning of that virtue, and thus in spirit crosses over the bridge.

I love him who maketh his virtue his inclination and destiny: thus, for the sake of his virtue, he is willing to live on, or live no more.

This shows that it is really a self-sacrifice because you risk living on or you risk dying.

It is an enterprise which has all the risks of a real enterprise, which includes its specific dangers.

It is amor fati.

This is the attitude now prevailing in Germany.

It is the inner meaning of National Socialism. They live in order to live on-or to die.

When you hear the really serious people talk, you realize that Nietzsche simply anticipated that style.

They praise the attitude of being ready, and naturally any rationalist asks, for what?

That is just the point-nobody knows for what.

Therefore, they have no program; they have no mapped-out scheme which should be fulfilled.

They live for the moment. They don’t know where they are going.

Very influential and competent people of that party acknowledge that they don’t know, but one thing is certain: they are going, there is no return, they must risk it.

Then, the rationalist asks: "Risk what?" The answer is, "Risk it."

They don’t know what they are risking; they simply take it as a matter of course that they must have this attitude, that one risks it, whatever it is.

This is of course pure madness from a rationalistic standpoint, and that is what Nietzsche means.

Therefore, he says the Superman is the lightning or the madness.

One can say it is all pathological, or that it is a divine or a demoniacal madness, but that is exactly the madness Nietzsche means.

So Nietzsche is in a way the great prophet of what is actually happening in German.

I love him who desireth not too many virtues.

One virtue is more of a virtue than two, because it is more of a knot for one’s destiny to cling to.

This is a very wise word because the more virtues you are looking for, the more you get away from your real task.

There is only that virtue which makes you live what you are.

I love him whose soul is lavish, who wanteth no thanks and doth not give back: for he always bestoweth, and desiretl1 not to keep for himself.”’

This is again the idea of the down-going, pouring life out.

You see, we always try to retain, to economize our lives, but he preaches an attitude that is wasteful, that wastes oneself So it means giving the whole of oneself without restriction, again a self-sacrifice to fate, to the things that have to happen from dark reasons-a complete surrender to life and fate.

I love him who is ashamed when the dice fall in his favour, and who then asketh: "Am I a dishonest player?"-for he is willing to succumb.

To perish. That is clear.

I love him who scattereth golden words in advance of his deeds, and always doeth more than he promiseth: for he seeketh his own down-going.

Again this attitude of out-doing oneself, of doing more than one really meant to do.

It means following the impulse which is always behind everything we do, the organic instinctive impulse which has the character of a natural reaction, as all instinct has.

It means to go the whole length of the way; you meant to go for two miles, but it carries you along for fifty miles, and you let it happen.

Otherwise, there is no going clown.

You cannot manage fate; you never wind up with yourself if you can manage yourself, if you can say to God, "This and no more."

I love him who justifieth the future ones, and redeemeth the past ones: for he is willing to succumb through the present ones.

That complete surrender to the present necessities means of course a fulfilment, a redemption of the past generations, and of the unfulfilled lives that are waiting to be fulfilled.

If we live completely, we surrender to their lives and redeem them.

Also, we prepare for a future generation, because we have lived out our own lives; we have fulfilled them, and we leave no curse for the following generations-the curse of economized life.

I love him who chasteneth his God, because he loveth his God: for he must succumb through the wrath of his God.

You see he is at it again, without the a this time.

I love him whose soul is deep even in the wounding, and may succumb through a small matter: thus goeth he willingly over the bridge.

I love him whose soul is so overfed that he forgetteth himself, and all things are in him: thus all things become his down-going.

That would mean going down into reality in the sense of downfall.

For he gets entangled; he easily gets wounded; fate takes hold of him and so he becomes complete.

This is a complete, very perfect acceptance of what one is, drawing the last conclusion from the fact of being what one Is.

Question: From one’s own doing?

Dr. Jung: Well, it is a sort of religious teaching: it is very absolute.

I love him who is of a free spirit and a free heart; thus is his head only the bowels of his heart; his heart, however, causeth his downgoing.

That is a confession. The heart is speaking through Zarathustra, not the mind.

This is again exactly what is happening in Germany now, their heart is speaking through their head.

And this heart desires destruction, because a world full of old ideas must be destroyed.

It is not because the heart has invented the idea of destruction, but because in the heart is the secret source of a will that speaks through the head.

But that is taboo to Nietzsche. He doesn’t touch it.

I love all who are like heavy drops falling one by one out of the dark cloud that lowereth over man: Here we have the image of the dark cloud spread over the earth, in which the lightning is hidden.

They herald the coming of the lightning, and succumb as heralds.

Lo, I am a herald of the lightning, and a heavy drop out of the cloud: the lightning, however, is the Superman.

That means the coming man of course.

A coming attitude, a new spirit, should fill the human form and make over our hitherto prevailing world and culture.

In Nietzsche’s mind, the Superman is a new type of man with such an attitude. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 72-90

23 May 1934 LECTURE 4

Dr. Jung:

I have here a question by Mrs. Bailward: "I understood you to say last time that the powers in us, which we call God, are powers of self renewal.

I suppose if this renewal process can take place, inflation does not?"

Yes, inflation is a pathological symptom and it only takes place when the actual creative self-renewal does not come to pass; that is perfectly obvious: an inflation is always a symptom of an inherited creative process.

Then there are two questions by Mr. Baumann.

The first is: "Why is dancing a symbol for creation and destruction? Does it mean to be in the body and in time (time as the fourth dimension)? Materia or form moving and changing in time is creation, or destruction?"

You are asking really for a justification for the interpretation of the creative forces as destructive forces, why dancing for instance, should be a symbol for both creation and destruction.

It is because ritual dancing under primitive circumstances is symbolic; it is always a representation of the creative powers in our unconscious.

Therefore it often means the sexual act, or the fertilization of the earth, or it is for the production of a certain effect, whether constructive or destructive.

And as a representation of the creative act, dancing necessarily symbolizes both destruction and construction.

It is impossible to create without destroying: a certain previous condition must be destroyed in order to produce a new one.

The most synthetic creation is inevitably also an act of destruction.

The typical Hindu god of the creative forces is Shiva who dances in the burial grounds; he is the great destroyer because he is creative life, and as such both creative and destructive.

You may have seen those Indian dancers who have been in Zurich; they represented the creative act in a most marvelous way.

The many arms of the deity express of course his extraordinary efficiency; he works not with two hands, but with many.

Then if you look at it psychologically, the life of a creative individual contains any amount of destruction, even of self-destruction.

Mrs. Crowley: In that case would not the inflation also be part of that creative process, even though it is destructive in a sense?

Dr. Jung: Inflation is something abnormal and it is not necessarily a part of the creative process, though unfortunately it happens of course to be connected with it very often.

But a creative artist, for instance, can create without imagining himself to be a creator.

He can create just because it is his damned duty to do so, or because he cannot help doing it.

That is, a creative person without self-consciousness.

As soon as self consciousness comes in, there is inflation: you imagine that you are the creator and then you are God, because you feel, of course, like ten thousand dollars if you have time to think of it.

If you have time, you have already split off from the creative process; you look at yourself and say: "Hell, what a fellow! Isn’t he grand?"

And then you are in for it, you are already living in your biography, you see it printed: In the year so and so, on such a day, he had such and such an inspiration.

Then you have spoiled your creative process, but you have a most healthy inflation.'

Mrs. Crowley: You spoke of the tremendous archetypal forces in Nietzsche. How could he produce Zarathustra without identifying if the archetypes worked in him?

Dr. Jung: Ah yes, but they would not be working in him, he would be working in them: that is the natural point of view.

Jilin. Crowley: Do you mean in the sense of a dance?

Dr. Jung: Of course. They have you on the string and you dance to their whistling, to their melody.

But inasmuch as you say these creative forces are in Nietzsche or in me or anywhere else, you cause an inflation, because man does not possess creative powers, he is possessed by them.

That is the truth.

If he allows himself to be thoroughly possessed by them without questioning, without looking at them, there is no inflation, but the moment he splits off, when he thinks, "I am the fellow," an inflation follows.

Question: Can it be avoided?

Dr. Jung: Only by obeying completely without attempting to look at yourself. You must be quite naive.

Mrs. Baumann: It happens automatically?

Dr. Jung: It happens automatically that you become conscious of yourself and then you are gone; it is as if you had touched a high-tension wire.

Mrs. Baumann: You cannot escape it?

Dr. Jung: If you are simple enough.

Nietzsche of course could not help looking at the thing and then he was overwhelmed with resentments, because the creative powers steal your time, sap your strength, and what is the result?

A book perhaps.

But where is your personal life? All gone.

Therefore, such people feel so terribly cheated; they mind it, and everybody ought to kneel down before them in order to make up for that which has been stolen by God.

The creative forces have taken it out of them, and therefore they would like to personify them, to imagine that they are Shiva, in order to have the delight of being creative.

But if you know you are creative and enjoy being creative, you will be crucified afterwards, because anybody identified with God will be dismembered.

An old father of the church, the Bishop Synesius, said that the spiritus phantasticus, man's creative spirit, can penetrate the depths or the heights of the universe like God or like a great demon, but on account of that he will also have to undergo the divine punishment."

That would be the dismemberment of Dionysos or the crucifixion of Christ.

We shall come presently to the same problem in Zarathustra.

Mr. Baumann's next question is: "Establishing relation to the crowd requires going down to a lower psychological level.

Is it necessary to go into unconscious, medial relation with people, a kind of identification or participation mystique with the crowd,: or has one only to show that one has inferior parts?"

One does not need to show that one has inferior parts, you know; that is generally known.

You may be sure that there are people round you who are quite convinced that they see where you are inferior.

People have the lovely quality of seeing the shortcomings of other people very well; they only fail to see their own.

So we need never be too self conscious in that respect; our shortcomings are noticed; we don't need to show them particularly.

We only need to show them to ourselves; we are the audience that never hears or sees.

Now, that going down is only possible if somebody has been on a higher level.

You see, Zarathustra is the man or the spirit that, after his going down through the course of the centuries, has now begun to rise.

The old man we met in the woods is the traditional Christian spirit that slowly receded into nature where it seemed as if it would finally disappear, but the spirit will not recede into nature entirely as long as there is man in whom to manifest.

Therefore, in receding he emerges and the oncoming part of the spirit is Zarathustra.

When the other one goes down, the personification of a new spirit comes up.

So it is essentially the same spirit.

Zarathustra has been up on the mountain and now he is coming down to the level of general mankind.

If we reduce this phenomenon to Nietzsche's personal psychology, it would run about as follows: Nietzsche was a professor in Basel for about ten years, then he withdrew from his profession and lived in Venice and Rapallo, and in Sils Maria in the Engadine; and much of the mountain symbolism in Zarathustra comes from such geographical surroundings.

He used to walk in the mountains, and he wrote some very beautiful poems about them.

So it is a part of his imagination that he felt himself as being isolated on the top of a high mountain where he could look far into the future of mankind, or where he could see life below at his feet.

There he gained that new insight, a new gospel as it were.

And then he came down like Moses from Sinai, to bring it to people.

That is the way Nietzsche felt it, but inasmuch as he did not do it naively, without knowing what he was doing, he was identical with the creative spirit; he knew too much about it and therefore got an inflation.

So there is a partial identification with Zarathustra.

Now how can such a partially inflated man get clown to mankind?

Only in the form of a preacher who stands on a hillock and preaches.

In that first sermon he is standing on a pedestal talking clown to them, saying one should, thereby showing that his sermon is really inefficient because he is not on the same level.

If he were naive he would not notice his message, but he would simply talk to the next fellow on the street, say how do you do and so on; and in the course of their talk he naturally would mention what his heart was interested in, and the other fellow would be shot to pieces.

Then he would have had an effect.

But you can say the grandest thing and if you are talking clown it reaches nobody; it makes no impression because you talk in such a grand style that only the wrong people get you.

So when Zarathustra was read in the beginning, only the wrong people understood what he really meant; all the cranks of Europe were filled with Zarathustra and nothing came from it at all.

You see, it is not inapt that we are only now attempting an analysis of Zarathustra; we need all the preparation of our psychology in order to understand what it really means.

The second part of Faust, also, was understood by nobody; it takes a long and most painstaking preparation to get the gist of it: it is most prophetic.

And we need the experience of the war and of the post-war social and political phenomena to get an insight into the meaning of Zarathustra.

Know, if Nietzsche had been unconscious of what he did, he would have been able to come clown to earth.

But it is not worthwhile really to speak of the man Nietzsche, for he was robbed; he lived only that Zarathustra might speak, and when it came to his own life, it was as poor and miserable as possible, a sick neurotic existence in the pensions of the Riviera and the Engadine, and finally in Turin where the devil caught him for good.

Here is a contribution from Miss Cornford: "Zarathustra comes as a dancer since that represents the exact opposite of the Christian monk.

Instead of 'mortifying the flesh' as the monk is taught to do, he lives in his body, is fully conscious of it, and makes use of it.

So while the ascetic stands like an iron stake planted in the stream of life, the dancer is a plant that responds to every movement of the water.

Thus it is natural that the preacher of the new religion should come as a dancer, since he brings movement instead of rigidity."

Yes, the movement in contrast to rigidity is also a point of view, it is another opposition, a pair of opposites which plays its role.

There are of course many such sidelights, but they would lead a bit too far.

Then we have a question by Miss Hannah: "I had always thought of the self as a kind of objective though individual God, whom I hoped to discover; but when you say 'create something beyond ourselves' [Well, that is what Zarathustra says, I don't give myself the credit of having invented such a very apt formula], do you mean the self? And if so is it created by rebirth? Is rebirth submitting ourselves to a process of nature by will, or it is a still more active process?"

What do you understand by "still more active process?"

Miss Hannah: I meant, have we got to do something about it or is it done to us?

Dr. Jung: It is a more passive process.

Miss Hannah: If you submit to it, it is passive, isn't it?

Dr. Jung: Yes, but you can also submit by will and very actively.

Well now, let us assume that the Superman would be Nietzsche's formulation for the self.

He understands that by creating beyond yourself you create the Superman, by will as it were; he even says one should will it, which shows very clearly that the Superman to him is an active creation by man.

But we cannot create beyond ourselves; we would have to be gods to do that.

You see, this confusion comes from the fact that he identifies in his language with the creative process.

The right perspective in which to see it is that the creative process in you is not your own doing.

It simply takes you and uses you; it is a different will from your own.

Then you understand that it is something else, something beyond yourself that is creative. It is necessarily beyond yourself, because the creative forces were before and after the act of creation.

They were when you were not, when you were unconscious; and what you produce is necessarily beyond yourself because those forces are beyond yourself.

You cannot rule them; they create what they choose.

Of course, you can identify with it more or less, but that is really childish; then you are like a naughty boy who in spite of your warnings not to climb onto the chair, insists upon doing so and of course falls down.

You say: "Now you see!" And he says: "But I wanted to!"

It is an illusion when one identifies with these processes.

So creating something beyond ourselves is only a formulation which comes from the idea that we are creating.

We are not creating.

We are only instrumental in the creative process: it creates in us, through us.

Now we will continue the third chapter where the rope-dancer is first mentioned. Zarathustra says here: "Even the wisest among you is only a disharmony and hybrid of plant and phantom. But do I bid you become phantoms or plants?"

How do you understand this peculiar expression? In how far is the wisest of mankind hitherto a hybrid of plant and ghost?

Mrs. Baynes: Is he speaking there of the wisest among the preceding Christian wise men or the whole of humanity?

Dr. Jung: It would be the wisest of the people of that crowd, the people of our time.

He characterizes the particular kind of wisdom which has been preached to them, and I want to know in how far that is a hybrid of plant and ghost.

Mr. Vitali-Smith: Inasmuch as the earthly and spiritual are divided, people are not unified.

Dr. Jung: But a hybrid is not divided.

The point is that it is a oneness but consisting of two things; a hybrid plant is a mixture, but it is a oneness, as a hybrid word consisting of Latin and Greek words is drawn together into one.

Hunnarlc It is just a oneness of the vegetative and the spirit.

Dr. Jung: But he does not say spirit, he says ghost.

Mrs. Adler: The animal is not between, it is missing.

Dr. Jung: The animal would be the contrast, the opposite.

Nietzsche will speak later on of the blond beast; that is his idea, the Superman in contradistinction to the plant and ghost-wisdom.

But I should like to know why just plant and ghost.

You see, he says even the wisest is only a discord, or disharmony, and discord is Entzweiung in German, which means something that does not fit exactly.

A hybrid is a united discord, so it is an objectionable sort of union of opposites.

The plant is completely unconscious and the ghost has no flesh, no body, so it is an absolutely metaphysical ghost connected with a plant and forming a unit, something utterly unconscious and close to matter.

Mrs. Baumann: Doesn't the plant life usually mean spiritual development symbolically?-and insofar as it is plant life, it has natural life, and insofar as it is a ghost it is dead, too far away.

Dr. Jung: Yes, the flesh dies and then it becomes a ghost.

So that hybrid consists in a natural growth on one side, perfectly sound, yet something died in between, the animal man: the flesh died, and only the ghost remains.

The original natural spirit, anima naturaliter Christiana, that flesh in which this natural Christian soul once lived, then vanished; and what remains is this hybrid of plant, a sound beginning, and a ghost, a sad end of human life.

I call your attention to this peculiar metaphor because Nietzsche inserts the middle part, he preaches the Hash again.

In other words, the blond beast comes to fill the gap there, so that the plant and the ghost are united once more, and he then concentrates upon the middle part which was lacking before.

So Nietzsche's whole philosophy can often be seen in the smallest detail of his metaphors.

Now we will continue the text.

Here he begins with his real philosophy, interpreting the Superman as the meaning of the earth. "Let your will say: The Superman shall be the meaning of the earth." He makes it imperative-you shall make him so.

For the earth of course could have other meanings; that the Superman is the meaning of the earth is not the most obvious conclusion to draw.

Biological science drew very different conclusions in the clays when Nietzsche wrote, for instance.

Now, in how far is the Superman the meaning of the earth? How do you understand it?

Mrs. Crowley: The earth is what man makes it; it is what it means to man.

Dr. Jung: That is the implication, that it is left to man to create the meaning of the earth-man should show us that the Superman is the meaning.

But why should the earth be given such a meaning?

Mrs. Crowley: Because from his point of view it is a sort of embryonic form; it is always to be renewed, it is a potential.

Dr. Jung: No, you see the question is really: what is Zarathustra's relation to the earth?

Dr. Escher: It is the same as between plant and ghost. In the middle is the earth, flesh.

Dr. Jung: Yes, instead of calling it flesh or animal he calls it the earth, and the earth is the body.

So the body is the mediator between the plant and the ghost.

You see, the plant is not yet an animal body and the ghost is no longer; the animal body of man is in between.

As you know from dream symbols, the meaning of the earth is essentially the body; matter always means something like the bowels or the lower parts of the body. Now, in how far is the Superman the body?

We were supposing that Superman to be the self.

Miss Hannah: The meaning is always in what you have lost, and Zarathustra has lost the body, has he not?-he is too high.

Dr. Jung: Well, the one who lost the body is surely the man who receded into the woods. He withdrew, lost the earth; and Zarathustra is going to seek and to preach it.

The man Nietzsche, of course, lost his body to a considerable extent.

But it is Zarathustra here, so it is a general kind of spirit; our general spirit has lost the earth, lost weight.

For the body is a terribly awkward thing and so it is omitted; we can deal with things spiritually so much more easily without the despicable body.

If you understand the Superman as the self, then, how does the self express itself-or, if you are only spirit how can you express yourself?

Miss Hannah: The body is the only way in which the spirit can be seen.

Dr. Jung: Of course.

You can be anything if you are a spirit, because you have no form, no shape, you are just gas.

You can assume any form; you can be this or that; you can transform at will quite arbitrarily into God knows what.

"But you should not think like that," or: "You should believe something, that will save you."

Believe if you can! You see, that is just the trouble. And why can’t you?

Because you have a body. If you were a spirit you could be anywhere, but the damnable fact is that you are rooted just here, and you cannot jump out of your skin; you have definite necessities.

You cannot get away from the fact of your sex, for instance, or of the color of your eyes, or the health or the sickness of your body, your physical endurance.

Those are definite facts which make you an individual, a self that is just yourself and nobody else.

If you were a spirit you could exchange your form every minute for another one, but being in the body you are caught; therefore, the body is such an awkward thing: it is a definite nuisance.

All people who claim to be spiritual try to get away from the fact of the body; they want to destroy it in order to be something imaginary, but they never will be that, because the body denies them; the body says otherwise.

They think they can live without sex or feeding, without the ordinary human conditions; and it is a mistake, a lie, and the body denies their convictions.

That is what Nietzsche means here. The Superman, the self, is the meaning of the earth; it consists of the fact that we are made of earth.

Therefore, when you study symbols of individuation, you always find that no individuation can take place-I mean symbolically-without the animal, a very dark animal, coming up from primordial slime, enters the region of the spirit; that one black spot, which is the earth, is absolutely indispensable on the bright shield of spirituality.

Sometimes people have the fantasy that the self consists of particles or molecules of iron or lead or any other heavy substance.

That is the same idea; all those heavy metals are the very soul of the earth.

The center of the earth consists of heavy metals, and so they become the symbol for the elements that constitute the self.

The essences of the body, then, constitute the self.

There is no other limitation, and as soon as you enter the world of the spirit, your self evaporates-looked at from the human point of view.

Of course, from the other point of view it is eternal and cannot evaporate, but the personal Atman in Hindu teaching is really personal; it is the spirit of this particular body, and it is the body that makes this thing particular.

It is the essential metaphysical meaning of the earth that it gives specification to things, that it makes things distinct.

Objects only become distinct in space and time, where they form a mass with different chemical or physical qualities by which they can be distinguished.

Otherwise, you can be aware of nothing that exists or is supposed to exist.

They say in the East that God was all alone in the beginning, and he didn't feel well at all because he didn't know Who he was; so he created the universe in order to see who he was.

He created distinct beings in which he could mirror himself.

For you never know who you are unless you can look at yourself from without: you need a mirror to see what your face is like, how you look.

If you live somewhere in the desert where you have no mirror, and where you never meet anybody who mirrors you, how can you know who you are?

The old philosophers always supposed of God that he was without an opposite, without the second one; but he needs that in order to become aware of himself.

Then that means separation, distinctness of things in time and space.

And really the essence of differentiation, the idea of the self, could not exist for one single moment if there were not a body to create and maintain that distinctness.

We may suppose that if the body vanishes and disintegrates, the self in a Way disintegrates, for it loses its confines.

You can observe such things in participation mystique inasmuch as your consciousness is then not fully a ware of the reality of your body and all its given facts, your spirit or your psyche overlaps the body and is mixed with other psyches.

And then you don't know exactly who you are; you might be something else just as well-you are a bit in doubt.

Experience tells us that in many respects we behave as if we were somebody else, our mother or father or brother or anybody else with whom we happen to be in more or less intimate contact.

People who are not consciously aware of the body suffer from a certain unreality of life in that inter-relatedness through participation mystique;

they don’t know when they are hungry, and they neglect the simple functions of the body.

I had a case, a girl of twenty-eight, who no longer heard her steps when she walked in the street.

That frightened her and she came to me.

She dreamt that she was riding in a balloon not in the basket but on top, high up in the air-and there she saw me with a rifle shooting at her from below.

I finally shot her down.

She was that girl I have told you about who never had seen her body.

I suggested that she must bathe once in a while, and then she told me she had been brought up in a nunnery where the nuns taught her that the sight of the body was sin, that she should always cover her bath tub with a linen, so she never saw herself.

I said: "Now go home and undress and stand before your long mirror and look at yourself."

And when she came back, she said: "It was not so bad after all, only I think my legs are a bit too hairy!"

That is the truth, that is the way people think and feel when they have such symptoms.

Now we will go on to the next paragraph: "I conjure you, my brethren, remain true to the earth."

What does he mean by remaining true to the earth?

Miss Hannah: It is just what you were saying, that you can be anything but you must stay in your body.

Dr. Jung: Yes, he is talking here of superterrestrial hopes, and that is of course an attempt to divert attention from the real individual life to spiritual possibilities beyond.

The spirit consists of possibilities-one could say the world of possibilities was the world of the spirit.

The spirit can be anything, but the earth can only be something definite.

So remaining true to the earth would mean maintaining your conscious relationship to the body.

Don’t run away and make yourself unconscious of bodily facts, for they keep you in real life and help you not to lose your way in the world of mere possibilities where you are simply blindfolded.

This is of course a somewhat one-sided teaching, and to a person who is nothing but the body, it is all wrong.

You must not forget that by far the majority of people are nothing but body.

This teaching, therefore, is only valid for those who have lost it, who have been deceived by the spirit-like Klages, for instance, who defined the spirit as the enemy of the soul, the soul being the life of the body, because he assumed that most people had lost the reality of the body as he had lost it."

But as a matter of fact there are plenty of people who are entirely in the body, and to those one ought to preach early Christianity, or heathen gods at least, because they haven't an idea of a spiritual possibility.

You know, a truth is never generally a truth.

It is only a truth when it works, and when it doesn't work it is a lie, it is not valid.

Philosophy and religion are just like psychology in that you never can state a definite principle: it is quite impossible, for a thing which is true for one stage of development is quite untrue for another.

So it is always a question of development, of time; the best truth for a certain stage is perhaps poison for another.

In such matters nature shows that it is thoroughly aristocratic and esoteric.

It is nothing that our liberal minds would hope or wish it to be: that one thing is true and the same everywhere, and such nonsense.

There is an extreme uncertainty about truth; we are confronted with the utter impossibility of creating anything which is generally true.

I often think, when I am analyzing, that if another patient should hear what I was saying to this one, he would jump right out of his skin: he could not stand it.

I talk stuff that is complete blasphemy to the other, and they often come just after one an other.

So I have to turn right round and talk black instead of white.

But it is absolutely necessary.

I learned long ago that there are steps, stages of evolution, a sort of ladder.

There are different capacities and one has to teach accordingly.

If you teach generally you must be mighty careful to put things in such a way that they are either not understood, of if they are, that the understanding tumbles over on the right instead of the wrong side.

But even that does not always help.

Therefore, it is not a grateful mortier to teach philosophy or religion or psychology.

Mr. Baumann: Could one not say that new spiritual life has to come out of the natural mind in a way? The natural mind, I understand, comes out of the earth.

Dr. Jung: Well, Zarathustra has something to say about that.

He is merely critical here: he says one should not listen to those who preach superterrestrial hopes.

But what the Superman says is another question, and he is very strong on this point.

He says the most terrible thing is to blaspheme against the earth and to overvalue the unknowable over against things as they are, which is the meaning of the earth.

The individuality of the earth lies in things being just so and nothing else.

You see, only one who has been too long under the spell of the delusion that things can be quite different from what they are, feels the impact of Zarathustra's message.

Only a real Christian mind or an essential spiritualist-no matter whether he confesses Christianity or not can feel the extraordinary novelty of such a message.

And of course he does not welcome it, he hates it.

He thinks it is sheer blasphemy against the spirit to say that one should be true to the earth, or that one should value the body more than the spirit.

But it is perfectly logical that after an age that has exhausted the importance of the spirit, the flesh should have its revenge and conquer the spirit-perhaps overcome it for a while.

Of course we express these things by the terms spirit and matter, not knowing exactly what we designated by those words.

In Chinese classical philosophy you would use the terms Yang and Yin, and say it was according to the rules of heaven that they changed their positions.

Yang eats the Yin, and from the Yang, Yin is reborn; it bursts forth again, and then Yin envelopes the Yang, and so on.

That is the course of nature. The Chinese are not so upset, because they have watched this peculiar natural process for a much longer time.

But our history is not old enough, so we are astonished to see that the spirit eats the flesh, and then the flesh eats the spirit.

It is exactly the same process.

We were taught that God sent his son to overcome the flesh by the spirit as a unique event in history; and now we learn the reverse truth that the flesh eats the spirit.

And we still cannot believe it, though it becomes still more obvious than when it first appeared in the time of the Reformation.

Dr. Reichstein: You said that the spirit consisted of kind of indefinite possibilities. But the spirit can also be a very definite law which establishes quite definite facts. I think this kind of spirit here is something that has degenerated.

Dr . .Jung: We are speaking of spirit in the pure essence.

The spirit that creates definite laws is a human spirit, not the spirit as it exists in our unconscious, where it really consists of absolutely indefinite possibilities.

You know, even if one creates quite a number of definite laws and the number is restricted-there are very few which will not be overthrown in a short time.

Also there is an enormous possibility of new laws, new discoveries-new points of view which are latent in us, and that really makes the life of the spirit.

It does not consist in a law which is definite forever; the life of the spirit consists of a new life which is forever creating.

Dr. Reichstein: I did not mean a definite law valid for the moment.

Dr. Jung: Can you give me an example so that I can see more clearly what you mean?

Dr. Reichstein: For instance, the Christian spirit had its validity in its time: it chose out of a number of possibilities just one.

Dr . .Jung: Oh yes, quite so. Of course that is spirit.

There is no doubt that the spirit has its validity but it is a relative validity, and it is either supplanted by another kind of spirit, or it can be supplanted by the Yin, the opposite principle.

It can be completely subdued until it disappears almost completely.

There was such a time of complete obscurity between the fourth and eight centuries A.D., and there have probably been other times in history.

We are little informed about the time that followed and the time that went before the downfall of great empires;

we suddenly discover a new civilization, and the events in the preceding period of time are hidden in deep obscurity.

Well now, Nietzsche often speaks of contempt.

Here he says: "Once the soul looked contemptuously on the body, and then that contempt was the supreme thing."

This idea of contempt is rather strange.

It is almost a technical term.

He means by "contempt" a negative attitude dramatically expressed.

The negative attitude of Christianity was against the flesh-that the flesh should be overcome was the highest ideal even.

But he says it reached even the soul; the soul itself became meager, hideous, and famished because it lost the body.

That statement does not coincide with the Christian teaching at all, where the more you overcome the body, the more you are supposed to become beautiful and fat in heaven.

But psychologically you find that the soul really becomes thin because it loses its raison d’etre.

What becomes beautiful and big and fat is a certain system of ideas called "a belief," "a conviction," but your soul lives in such a system of ideas only as long as the thing is new, as long as you see the danger from which you escape.

It is as if you had passed the mountains with very bad roads and had reached the plain, and you say, "What a beautiful plain!" having in mind still those high mountains behind you.

And whenever you think the plain is not particularly interesting, you look back and realize that it was very rough there and the plain is at least a smooth road.

But lose sight of those mountains and you will long for them, because the scenery was much more beautiful than the plain, which is horrible, and you are thoroughly sick of it.

And when you come to the first foothills where you can climb up instead of going on the level all the time, you praise the moment.

So it is with such a truth.

As long as the system of Christian ideas worked, the soul lived.

The soul itself produced them because those formulations were needed.

One should try to imagine the actual conditions of late antique civilization, the Greek and Roman civilizations for instance, and what their leading ideas were.

Usually one has very little knowledge of it, so we cannot value the sayings of Jesus, because we don’t know to whom he spoke.

We cannot understand certain things at all, because we are unable to reconstruct the conditions in which those words were said.

It has been pointed out with a sort of surprise that in the Hinayana Buddhism-the original small school of Indian Buddhism-there were no gods apparently.

But if you know that Buddha’s first teaching was over against a pantheon of two million

Hindu gods, you quite understand why he did not feel the need of inventing new ones.

He was already sick of all those gods so he ceased talking of them.

Just as a person who hears every day of God, in prayers and all sorts of allusions, will get tired of it; so if one has grown up in pious surroundings, one cannot even say the word Jesus without a feeling of disgust and contempt.

And Nietzsche was the son of a parson.

He heard those words all the time, and that explains why he used the word contempt.

The early influences of his youth are of course very important.

So you must not only keep in mind the condition of the world to which the prophet spoke, but also the condition in which he was himself as a child.

Prophets coincide in a way with their time. He would not have gotten the full impact of the spirit of our time if he had not been the son of a parson, the representative of a dying system and a dying spirit.

He could taste the thing in its purest substance: he got the essence of his time.

Nietzsche's idea, that with all that theological talk the soul is not fed, is perfectly plain: only the mind eats and the soul is far from being properly fed. On the contrary she is famished and therefore eager for a change, for a new idea that really would give her food.

And the new idea came because the original condition, in which the Christian teaching was entirely right, had vanished into an antique world.

Out of the background of the Christian medieval world the new idea was necessary in order to feed the soul against the time when the spirit had been over-valued: a teaching was needed that emphasized the body and the flesh again.

There is a new book by Keyserling, La Revolution Mondiale Pt la Responsabilite de l'Esprit, in which he speaks of the revolte des forces telluriques, the forces of the earth, and he says that man himself consists of 8o or go percent of forces telluriques.

His idea is that this revolution ought to be quenched by the spirit; the spirit should settle that force tellurique.

Now this is exactly the Christian idea: the spirit says, you ought, but "hflas! avec combien peu de succes."

He says himself that it won't help at all, but nevertheless he follows that spirit.

What he sees quite truly, however, is the complete reversal: all the spiritual values come down, and up comes the earth and man as he is, not as he ought to be or as we would like him to be. He comes up as he is, inexorably, and if we suppress him he becomes worse, and this being claims recognition.

That is the task, and it will lead to an entirely new valuation of man and an entirely new religious idea: the recognition of man as he really is and of the world as it really is over against a background of illusions and projections.

And that will last until the world as it is has been more or less accepted, and then that truth will become dry, most uninteresting-and something else will follow.

These waves make the periodicity of history.

Presumably they follow the months of the Platonic year, but we have only had the experience of about three months, and that is very little indeed in comparison with the fact that each Platonic year contains twenty-six thousand ordinary years.

But man of course has existed for quite a number of Platonic years.

The consciousness of man goes back for many hundred thousand years, of which twenty-six thousand is only a small part; so he has gone many a time in a more or less conscious condition through all the seasons of the Platonic year and has therefore the experience of those seasonal changes in his bones.

For instance, we have now the change from the spring into the winter sign.

That has nothing to do with the stars. It is merely a projection of a peculiar periodicity in man that probably shows itself in this change of religious and ethical values; also probably in a change of temperament or something like that, a change in the constellation of the unconscious.

Nietzsche thought it was a duty, our highest moral obligation, to produce the Superman, that man higher than ourselves.

This does not exhaust his idea of the Superman of course, as we shall see later on.

Here he gives us a new idea. He says the Superman is the sea: "in him can your great contempt be submerged."

What does he denote by this comparison of the Superman with the sea? in the constellation of the unconscious.

Now, a bit further on in this chapter Zarathustra says: "Is your soul not poverty and pollution and despicable ease?"

What does he mean by "despicable ease"?

That is not the translation in the book by the way. There it is "wretched self-complacency."

Airs. Baynes: He means that people prefer to sleep rather than to take life problematically.

Dr . .Jung: Exactly. It is the tendency of people to live and not to bother, and he was confronted with a world which was thoroughly materialistic.

It was the eighth century and they did not like to be bothered-as the world never likes to be bothered; it always likes to take things as easily as possible.

And people who don't realize this despicable ease never can understand the meaning of the Superman.

Nietzsche thought it was a duty, our highest moral obligation, to produce the Superman, that man higher than ourselves.

This does not exhaust his idea of the Superman of course, as we shall see later on.

Here he gives us a new idea.

He says the Superman is the sea: "in him can your great contempt be submerged."

What does he denote by this comparison of the Superman with the sea?

Dr. Reichstein: All life comes from the ocean.

It is the collective unconscious.

Dr . .Jung: Yes, the ocean is always the symbol of the collective unconscious.

It is an all-embracing general symbol, and the self, the Superman, is also the ocean, according to Zarathustra.

So the self is the whole collective unconscious, the origin and the end of life, the origin of rain and of all rivers, of the whole universe, the end of all distinctness.

Mrs. Baumann: Is it not the same as "smaller than small yet greater than great"?

Dr. Jung: Yes, that is the formula of the self: there is a peculiar correspondence with smallness and greatness. The self is all-embracing yet the smallest-a paradoxical concept which is beyond our grasp, as it needs must be.

Well, that shows that Nietzsche does not understand the Superman as a higher, more differentiated sort of man.

We are the ape-man, for instance, which would be more human.

Often it looks as if he meant just that, but he had intuitions about it, and in such a passage we see that the thing is far more complicated. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 56-72

[1]Zarathustra Seminar

Dr. Jung:

There are several questions.

Mrs. Crowley asks: "When you spoke of symbolic action interrupting the discourse of Zarathustra, did you mean the flow or progress of the conscious realization was interrupted?

In that case doesn't it put a negative construction on the action? Yet if a dream is the messenger of the conscious realization, why isn't such symbolic action another step in the development of the inner reality? In other words, do not the discourse and action serve as two aspects of the same reality?

If it is to be looked upon as a negative interruption, that gives one the sense of a break in the rhythm of its growth and I would like to know which you meant."

I did not intend to convey the idea that the symbolic action was in any way inferior to the sermon.

It is simply that the sermon has led up to a point where another element must come in; as if you pushed an argument to the very edge where you cannot go any further, and then instead of discussing, you do something.

For instance, in Voltaire's Candide, just at the end, when the philosopher Pangloss has finished his long talk about the world, that it isle meilleur des mondes and that everything in it is the best thing possible, Candide calls his attention to his most disgusting venereal disease.

But Pangloss proves that even his disease is most respectable, because he got it in a straight line from Columbus through the intermediary of a cardinal and his mistress.

(That is true Voltairian style!-I am not responsible.)

When he has finished his argument, Candide is quite overcome and says: Tout cela est bien dit mais ilfaut cultiver notrejardin, meaning that after all that talk they must do something reasonable because they had nothing to eat: they must plant their cabbages.

Now, that is by no means an inferior interruption, it is surely much better to be planting and manuring cabbages; everybody was glad when that long speech was interrupted.'

In this case, the sermon stops for the time being and of course it is difficult to see what is now corning up.

One usually notices in a series of fantasies that it is suddenly interrupted by something new, a different motive or an action.

Or in a dream you wake up and you understand why you wake up: it is because the situation has become intolerable, or because the dream argument is finished.

You have reached a certain amount of clarity and so it can Vanish and then another theme comes up. Now, here Zarathustra reaches a real culmination when he says: "Lo, I teach you the Superman: he is the lightning, he is that frenzy."

That is the very essence of the idea he wants to convey to the audience.

And what would you expect after such a statement?

Mrs. Crowley: That the lightning would fall; it would have to be illustrated.

Dr. Jim[!;: Yes, you would expect that the lightning would now descend and that the audience would be struck by it-like the miracle of Pentecost, where the Holy Ghost descends in the form of tongues of fire."

Nothing of the kind happens, however.

But something happens; the rope-dancer starts to work, the lightning has struck, as a matter of fact, but one does not see the effect.

Yet, it could be shown that an effect has taken place. It is not visible here in the text, because the whole trend of thoughts is going underground, but it is the real man

Nietzsche who writes those words.

It is not Zarathustra and it is not the rope-dancer; and as he writes, the lightning strikes him.

That will become obvious afterwards.

Mr. Allemann: Is it not also the word madness which struck him?

Dr. Jung: Exactly. Nietzsche could not have known his fate, but when he writes those words, the unconscious cries, "Halt."

Then the whole thing goes underground, and a peculiar action begins which symbolizes the coming events that could not be consciously foreseen.

Now Mrs. Baumann’s question: "Would you kindly say a little more about the heart being the secret source of a will that speaks through the head?

You spoke of it last time in connection with the paragraph where Zarathustra says: ’I love him who is of a free spirit and a free heart; thus is his head only the bowels of his heart; his heart, however, causeth his down-going.’ "

The idea is that his head is contained in the heart and the heart talks through the head.

It is simply a sort of metaphor indicating that there is a secret will in the heart, behind the head and superior to the head.

It is a well-known idea that people can argue in an apparently logical and rational way while really speaking the wishes of their hearts.

I think it is Isaiah, for instance, who reproaches the false prophets for speaking the wishes of their hearts instead of the words of the Lord.

There, of course, it is a sort of depreciative remark.

In this case it is appreciative. It means that there is a will to self-destruction in the heart, which leads finally to the Superman.

The heart wills the drive towards the destruction of that lame and tame and despicable being called man, the most contemptible of all things to Nietzsche-the thing which should be overcome.

So the will of the heart, that secret will to destruction, forces the head, and no matter what the head may think, it will be forced by the heart which knows that goal.

The Superman can only live through the destruction of man as he is.

The political analogy to this is the secret will to destruction all over the world, not only in Germany; of course, you see it very clearly there at present, but it is everywhere.

Our actual collective unconscious seeks the destruction of millions. Why do they heap up ammunition and cannons? Surely not in order to play chess with them. Why do they invent poisonous gases? To kill of course. And why can nobody put a stop to it, damn it?

We can only explain it by the fact that there is a superior will which forces all heads.

And Nietzsche says here that he loves that will to destruction; therefore he preaches war.

That is of course a sort of horrible nightmare to us, but the Eastern attitude would not see so much nightmare in it.

They would say, where there are too many people, the number must be lessened, and so naturally a time will come when people will be exterminated to a certain extent: that simply has to be.

Mrs. Crowley: Is that not the very argument between Krishna and Arjuna in the beginning of the Bhagavad Gita?

Dr. Jung: Well, you don’t need to read it in the Bhagavad Gita.

You can hear it in the East from the man in the street who has a natural wisdom in his veins; he is quite convinced and therefore he has no particular commiseration.

You see, we make a hell of a fuss in Europe when several hundred thousand Chinamen are dying of starvation, or drowned by the floods of the Hoang Ho or the Yangtze-Kiang.

The Chinamen don't bother so much. They say: Too much folk, they must go.

But we Christians have so little faith in life that we think we must preserve every little nuisance that has come into existence.

Of course, it is not nice for the individuals who are actually under the wheel, but, you know, we shall all be under the wheel when those bombs begin to rain down upon our cities.

And we ourselves are continuously bringing that about-nobody wants to but everybody is doing it.

Now here is a question by Mrs. Baynes in reference to a lecture given by a professor of the philosophy of law from Paris.

He was speaking about the psychology of power and the so-called antinomy of power, namely, that power is both good and evil, which makes an insoluble antithesis in the very being of power."

She says: "The lecturer at the Psychological Club on Saturday evening seemed to think that his standpoint was in direct agreement with that of analytical psychology.

He said that the solution of conflict was by the reconciliation of thesis and antithesis, or in a word, by the transcending function which takes into consideration each of the opposites to be reconciled.

But then he put forward the view that Christianity is still our best guide in the conduct of life.

Is it possible to deny that Christianity demands the sacrifice of everything to the one principle, i.e., spirit?

And has not analytical psychology shown that the psyche of modern man is in open revolt against this one-sidedness and forces to seek a new way that allows him to live the body as well as the spirit? Is not this the sum and substance of Nietzsche's point of view?"

That is, of course, Nietzsche's point of view, but on the other hand we must say that Nietzsche's point of view is exceedingly mysterious to the majority of even highly educated people.

They don't understand it. When Zarathustra came out, I was living in Basel and I heard them talking about it, and they were all profoundly bewildered; they had not the faintest idea what it was about.

It gave Jakob Burckhardt, the famous historian, a sort of shock. He was frightened by it.

And when the rumor got abroad that Nietzsche was in a lunatic asylum, they all said,

"Thank heaven!"

Then the case was clear: a nightmare was dissolved, and everybody was glad that that man Nietzsche was behind the bars.

He had said awful things, but happily enough it was all foolishness, the dream of a madman.

Something like that was the mood about fifty years ago, and nowadays it is not very different.

Mankind has not become so much more intelligent in the meantime.

Of course, we have had some experiences.

The world war helped a great many people to realize what Zarathustra means, or to what it refers at least.

But, for the most part, people were happily asleep in the dream of the Middle Ages and had no idea of such problems, as untold millions are still sleeping.

They could live just as well in a time when the sun was still revolving round the world.

So for such people the whole problem does not exist, and for them Christianity is still the best guide for their lives, no matter how the Christ symbol is understood.

You see, it can be understood in many ways, in the Catholic way, in the Greek Orthodox way-there are four hundred Protestant denominations making a fuss about nothing.

And then there are all sorts of nonorthodox and nonorganized ideas upon the subject.

But the central figure is still Christ.

As long as people are unable to realize what individuality is, what the self is, it is projected and there is nothing to be clone about it.

If it is not projected in Christ it is projected into another leader or a mythological figure, a Buddha or a new religious system.

And, of course, the number of people who are not conscious of the self, who have not begun to realize that there is such a problem, are countless.

Therefore, one has to reckon with the fact of Christianity and to take it quite seriously as the best guide in these matters; for two thousand years, this system has been the best guide for us, as Buddhism has been in India.

As long as people can live in such a system, if it really expresses the bets of the unconscious, then it is good and there is nothing to he said against it; you cannot even criticize it.

That means, of course, inasmuch as people are serious and have not simply put an a before their creed-instead of theism, atheism.

I should not call atheists serious: they don't see that they are still theists in denying God.

I understand by "serious people" those who know that such a thing as a religious experience is possible, and that it means the greatest good one could possibly imagine.

Such people realize, of course, that the Christian symbol as it is handed down, as it stands now, does not provide a form through which a complete life is possible.

And inasmuch as this is again a truth, we have the problem of what we can do or how we can live when that symbol fails us.

For instance, we can assume that people who have such a problem are abnormal, that it is a sort of choice of unbalanced minds that simply cannot bow to tradition, who are too abnormal to be expressed by a fairly collective or normal symbol, so that even Christ as a comprehensive symbol, or what Buddha is in the East, is unable to express those particular whims of modern minds.

That is the attitude of very intelligent people.

They take it that these so-called modern problems are just sort of neurotic protuberances, more or less morbid, because they hold that everything that reasonably can be, is already expressed in the Christian dogma.

I had an opportunity lately to talk to some French people who are Catholic to the marrow of their bones, and for them that whole sphere of psychological or religious experience, which is so conspicuous in primitives for instance, simply does not exist.

It does not exist, because it is in the church.

But then you would assume that they believed in their Catholicism. Not at all!

They are Catholic with an a, a-Catholics, but they are in the church.

When they are positive, they say the soul is a religious problem, dealt with by the church, which has nothing to do with them; only inasmuch as they are connected with the church does the soul play any role at all.

If they are negative they say that everything in the church and the whole psychological experience is nonsense.

And they have to repeat it very often, with a spirit of insistence, in order to help the stored-up unconscious to abreact.

They organize themselves most probably in a free-thinking society or a society for atheist propaganda.

But their whole psychology is still in the Catholic church in its positive or negative form.

To say anything about Nietzsche, or to mention analytical psychology to such people, is perfectly preposterous-you could talk to the penguins just as well.

I felt like St. Malo, only I was not blind and deaf: I saw that they were penguins.

They were only the conscious half of man-the unconscious didn't exist-and the conscious half was the walls of the church.

The Christian symbol is still alive because millions of people are alive who need it very badly even, and for them everything is still contained within it, anticipating, one might possibly say, what we get through the collective unconscious in a certain form.

For we constantly need Christian concepts in order to understand the collective unconscious.

We apply Eastern concepts as well, but we also amplify them in order to explain what is in the Christian symbolism.

It is true that late Christianity has a peculiar one-sidedness which doesn't fit our time, but that so-called spiritual attitude was once perfectly sound-it had to be.

The knowledge of the conditions of antique civilization makes you understand why such a religion as Christianity was needed.

Every emphasis laid upon the spirit was absolutely necessary; one cannot imagine what the world would have come to if such a reaction had not taken place.

You know, when Buddhism first reached the barbarous people behind the borders of India, it came quite naked, without gods, because there were already two million gods in India.

They were simply swamped by them, so, of course, as Buddhism was a sort of protest against the prevailing Hinduism, they thought they did not need them.

They thought the decisive action took place in the sphere of man and not of the gods; even the gods had to become men in order to be redeemed.

But when Buddhism reached Nepal, Tibet, and China, that condition of the Hinayana, the so-called small vessel, did not fit.

They found there only the old tribal gods and fetiches and shamans, and all sorts of black magic, like the Bung religion in Tibet.

So Buddhism instantly felt the need of gods again, and they had a series of prophets who revealed the existence of the Mahayana deities.

The ideas of the bodhisattvas, who became even more important than Buddha himself, originated then, and all the goddesses, like Kwan Yin and the white Tara.

They naturally had to invent female gods, of course not artificially, but through special revelation for this purpose, coming from the unconscious.

So when this professor showed a very positive attitude to Christianity, I supported him, because I also have a positive attitude toward it.

I could give you, for instance, absolutely psychological proof of certain most abstruse dogmatic concepts, like the trinity, or that point they made against the Arians (the followers of Arius) in the early church, that Christ was hornomousios, of equal nature with God.

The Arians said that he was only homoimousios, similar in his substance to the Father.

That looks like pure nonsense to us, but they killed each other over the question, and it is of course of tremendous importance looked at from the psychological point of view.

We can be grateful to the old fathers of the church that they came to the conclusion that Christ must be homoousios, of the same substance as the Father: such a conclusion was absolutely necessary for our psychological development.

Also it was for certain psychological reasons that Gnosticism had to be abolished.

I am against the destruction of Christianity, because I hold that for thousands of years, the majority of people will not be able to get beyond the Christian conception; therefore, it ought to exist, one cannot abolish it.

One should cease the foolishness of thinking that all people are the same and have the same creed. It is absolutely impossible.

We are converting negroes for their own destruction, for example.

It would be better to go to Africa and shoot them down than to make them degenerate by becoming Christians.

The missionaries preached that they ought to wear clothes, but then the English became intelligent enough not to allow it-well, they couldn’t help becoming intelligent after a while, there is no merit in that.

In certain parts of Polynesia they give a good thrashing to the natives who wear trousers.

They must go naked.

But missionaries have unclean sexual fantasies if people are naked, so they tell them they are indecent.

People would have far fewer sexual fantasies if they did go naked-but it would be "horrible."

Here is a question by Mrs. Bailward: "With reference to the prophecy about Christ that he might appear as the lowest of the brethren, does this mean a kind of Valentino, Mussolini, or mediumistic prizefighter?"

It is exceedingly improbable that Christ would appear in such a form, unless Mussolini, or the prize-fighter, should fall in love with you or you with him. Then it could be.

As long as such people are somewhere on the horizon or painted upon the wall, they do little damage.

Christ, being the symbol of the self, is the innermost thing and that only reaches you in the innermost.

Mussolini would never do that.

The reason why many people fall in love with fantastic tenors and Valentinos is because they are far away, so they are perfectly innocuous; every woman in love with a tenor knows in the bottom of her heart that he does not care a hang for her.

It only becomes dangerous when real love comes in between and then people run away as quickly as they can, for where God is the nearest the danger is greatest.

Mrs. Bailward: Where is the quotation from?

Dr. Jung: Miss Hannah also asks that in her question.

The quotation is from the fifth chapter of St. Matthew: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

That Christ can be the least of your brethren is, of course, very important.

The same thought is expressed in the more primitive Islamic mysticism, in a somewhat different and more complete way.

(I have already quoted to you what my Sufi head-man said to me.)’"

You see, the Self is such a disagreeable thing in a way, so realistic, because it is what you really are, not what you want to be or imagine you ought to be; and that reality is so poor, sometimes dangerous, and even disgusting, that you will quite naturally make every effort not to be yourself.

Therefore, the idea has been invented quite suitably that it is even very bad morally to be yourself.

You also should not think of yourself; you should love your brother or your neighbor but not yourself.

But unfortunately Christ said you should love your brother or your neighbor as yourself, and how can you love your brother if you don't love yourself? Or how can you forgive your brother if you don't forgive yourself?

So one of the earliest Gnostic philosophers, Karpocrates, translated a certain passage in the gospel of St. Matthew in a very peculiar way-that passage where Christ says:

Whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause shall be in danger of the judgment; and whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be in danger of the council; but whosoever shall say, Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire.

Therefore if thou bringest thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath ought against thee,

Leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way; first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift.

But Karpocrates interprets that last verse: If thou bringest thy gift to the altar and findest anything against thyself, go first and reconcile thyself to thyself.

That is a custom in red Indian tribes; when a man is not at one with himself on the day of the council meeting, he doesn't go to the meeting for he recognizes that he is not fit to be just and impartial and true if he is fighting himself.

Therefore, Karpocrates rightly assumes that you cannot forgive if you don't forgive yourself; you cannot love if you don't love yourself.

And that is really Christian.

But late Christianity, hoping to find a means to get away from oneself, invented this infernal idea that you should love your neighbor and trample yourself underfoot, in contradistinction to the words of the Lord that you should love your neighbor as yourself, supposing that you naturally do love yourself.

Otherwise, how can we be impartial, or how can we forgive?

Therefore, that Christian love of your neighbor has become most suspect.

If anybody tells me that he loves me more than himself and wants to sacrifice himself, I say: what does it cost? What do you want afterwards?

For afterwards a long account will be presented.

Nature will present it because it is not unselfish; there is no such thing as unselfishness in that sense.

But if you can love yourself, you will be on the way to unselfishness.

It is such a difficult and disagreeable task to love oneself that if you can do that, you can love any toad, because you are worse than the most disgusting animal.

Now Miss Hannah also says: "I understood you to say last time that you have to cast the mind away in order to see it is the body, and that this was what Christ meant when he said you may find him as the lowest among our brethren. I suppose I am like the Strasbourg theologians, but I can't understand what this means."

Well, not necessarily the body, but the body is naturally under the same prejudice; the body being the lowest in man is, of course, the lowest among the brethren.

Those Strasbourg theologians did not understand what I meant, because no Christian of these days understands this point; we are all twisted in our minds through education.

We are only told to love our neighbor and that it is wrong to love ourselves.

For instance, one of the most ordinary arguments against analysis is that it makes people self-conscious: they only think of themselves.

I say that is the very best thing you can possibly do if you do it systematically.

You have done it in a dilettante way-you have only made fantasies-but from now on you write those fantasies, and as they are apt to be disgusting, they instantly draw attention to themselves.

You find then that man is worth studying and also that it is well worthwhile to live with the body. Otherwise, what on earth are you going to live with?

You will probably evaporate.

Well, if you are going to disappear in a fast train to heaven within the next fortnight, I have nothing to say against it, but you cannot live as a disembodied spirit who by chance got into the body of a woman and doesn't even recognize her own hands.

We will now continue our text.

You remember the fourth chapter ends with: "Lo, I am a herald of the lightning, and a heavy drop out of the cloud: the lightning, however, is the Superman."

Those are almost the same words as in the end of the chapter before and again we have the interruption.

When Zarathustra had spoken these words, he again looked at the people, and was silent.

Waiting, obviously expecting that something ought to happen.

"There they stand," said he to his heart; "there they laugh: they understand me not; I am not the mouth for these ears.

Must one first batter their ears, that they may learn to hear with their eyes? Must one clatter like kettledrums and penitential preachers? Or do they only believe the stammerer?

They have something whereof they are proud.

What do they call it, that which maketh them proud? Culture, they call it, it distinguisheth them from the goatherds."

The German word is Bildung, which means a sort of education rather than culture.

"They dislike, therefore, to hear of 'contempt' of themselves.

So I will appeal to their pride.

I will speak unto them of the most contemptible thing: that, however, is the last man!"

Zarathustra is expecting some effect from the lightning, yet nothing happens apparently, so he assumes that he has not yet said the right word to reach the audience-the word which penetrates-and he thinks that he might reach them if he speaks of the most contemptible of all things.

You see, that feeling of not reaching his audience shows that in that inner event which is in the writer's mind while writing, there is a similar situation.

He speaks the words and apparently something in him does not answer, something withholds his reaction.

Then naturally, as a writer always does, he projects the inner fact outside of himself into his writings.

Now what is the thing which does not react in him? What is so dull?

Mrs. Fierz: He speaks of Bildunk here but he himself is gebild.

Dr. Jung: His conscious conclusion is that they are proud of their culture or education and therefore would not react.

But I want to know why it is that when he speaks of the lightning, either the rope-dancer goes to work or nothing happens at all-his audience doesn't react, at least.

Dr. Bahadurji: Because the self in him does not come up to the level of his expectation, it doesn't respond to him. He thinks with his head, but the self in him is not in it.

Dr. Jung: Yes, one could put it abstractly like that. And one could also say that the thing which doesn't react in him is the collective man, because the collective man in the symbolism of the unconscious is always represented by an assembly, an audience, a crowd.

And he is standing before the crowd in himself, so it would mean that the man of the crowd, the ordinary collective man in himself, does not react: he is dull.

But that man has very much to do with the self; in an integrated self that man is present.

He is even the outer fringe of the self; the self is like a crowd, therefore, being oneself, one is also like many.

One expresses a totality.

One cannot individuate without being with other human beings.

One cannot individuate on top of Mount Everest or in a cave somewhere where one doesn't see people for seventy years: one only can individuate with or against something or somebody.

Being an individual is always a link in a chain; it is not an absolutely detached situation, in itself only, with no connection outside.

It is sort of neurotic late-Christian prejudice that you should not love yourself.

It is assumed that you would then be like a round ball lost somewhere in the universe without any reference to anything and with no relation to anybody.

But as a matter of fact, if you can think with concentration, you realize how much you are connected with other human beings, how little you can exist without being related, without responsibilities and duties and the relation of other people to yourself.

And all that remains completely in the darkness of participation mystique as long as you don't think of it.

So if you are, as it looks, an egotist, indulging in your own fantasies, then you are simply indulging in the fantasy of being cut off, all alone with yourself.

Of course, public opinion helps you in that prejudice, assuming that anybody alone with himself is necessarily an egotist.

When a person is quite modest and does not speak because he thinks he is not competent, people say he is proud; whereas he may be a decent fellow who doesn't want to make the same fuss as the other people, talking about things which they really don't understand.

Individuation is only possible with people, through people.

You must realize that you are a link in a chain, that you are not an electron suspended somewhere in space or aimlessly drifting through the cosmos.

You are part of an atomic structure, and that atomic structure is part of a molecule which, with others, builds up a body. Life is a continuum, and nothing is absolutely severed from man within the living continuum; such a thing would instantly die and be cast away. Inasmuch as we live, we are in the continuum of life.

If you think you are separated, it is nothing but a neurotic imagination, and that is of course morbid.

But that you are thinking of yourself does not mean that you are morbid.

It can be systematic.

So if a man feels as the writer does in this case, talking to an audience that does not understand him at all, it means that he is not in touch with his own collective man, or he underrates or overrates something in himself.

There is a lack of balance in his judgment.

Later on, Nietzsche explains it by the fact that he has been alone for too long a time, talking to the woods and the brooks and the trees.

It is perfectly true that if a man is too much alone, he loses the connection with the collective man in himself and talks about matters which are above the heads of other people; and that is egocentric, too much in his own sphere, so that he does not know the language spoken in collectivity.

Of course, that he has a new message is an additional difficulty.

Nietzsche did in reality live much alone. He naturally moved in a lonely sphere; then he discovered something new, which one can only discover in solitude, and he tried to convey that new message through language which was absolutely new and exceedingly difficult.

He didn't know the collective language, so he naturally would choose the most impressive form, hallowed by age, a beautiful epic or hieratic language.

Such people always instinctively choose what we call a biblical style, in order to make an impression on people; it carries a certain authority. It stirs up all sorts of reminiscences of very early youth, and so is likely to strike home.

Even that language does not help in this case, however.

It glances off, as it were, and people remain quite dull: the collective man does not react.

But a certain reaction has taken place; even the collective man, though quite impervious to such language, can be reached through the unconscious.

So, while he was speaking of the lightning or the madness, something in himself was reached: the unconscious was beginning to stir.

It is also possible that in the collective man outside, the unconscious was stirred.

That is true historically.

One could not say that Nietzsche was completely understood-even those who made a great fuss about him did not understand what he really meant.

But he created a stir, he tickled something in the unconscious; for he tried to formulate what is actually happening in the collective unconscious of modern man, to give words to that disturbance.

Of course, Nietzsche could not expect an immediate reaction to his sermon because it must first go into the unconscious, into the belly of collectivity, and the reaction will appear in a quarter where he did not expect it at all.

Well, he now tries another technique, he tries to speak to them about the most contemptible of all things, the last man.

It is time for man to fix his goal. It is time for man to plant the germ of his highest hope.

Now, how do you understand this? What is on Nietzsche’s mind here?

That is all spoken out of certain emotion.

Mrs. Baynes: Doesn’t it mean that he feels it to be a critical time for himself and for humanity?

Dr. Jung: Exactly. He expresses here his conviction, his great emotion, over the fact that it is now time, that it is even exceedingly urgent.

You find that in the chapter where Zarathustra is going to visit the happy islands and down into the volcano: Es ist Zeit, huchste Zeit.

Nietzsche’s feeling was that we are now at a great turning point in history and in the evolution of man. One calls that a "chiliastic mood."

This is an ecclesiastical word, having to do with the Book of Revelation, and the idea of the kingdom of God to come, the millennium.

And this feeling of the great turning point was not realized by Nietzsche alone.

For instance, that book by Spengler, Der Untergang des Abendlandes, is in the same mood.

There is the same conviction that something is going to happen, that the times have been fulfilled and something new is coming.

Therefore, Nietzsche says that it is now time for man to think of himself, or to fix his goal; it is time for man to plant the germ of his highest hope, which is of course the Superman.

It is the idea that man must be ready to cast off or to change his former external attitude in order to give birth to a new being.

St. Paul speaks of casting away the ole\ Adam and clothing oneself or taking on Christ, which is the same idea of a complete change, like a snake shedding its skin and creating a new one; or like the phoenix burning himself in his own nest in order to resurrect again from the ashes in a rejuvenated form.

These are all archetypal symbols for a time when old things are destroyed in order to make place for the new.

Now, whether that is true or not we cannot prove, but, sure enough, Nietzsche had the feeling that some great new revelation ought to take place, and he saw that in the idea of the Superman.

Still is his soil rich enough for it.

But that soil will one day be poor and exhausted, and no lofty tree will any longer be able to grow thereon.

Alas! there cometh the time when man will no longer launch the arrow of his longing beyond man-and the string of his bow will have unlearned to whizz!

I tell you: one must still have chaos in one, to give birth to a dancing star. I tell you: ye have still chaos in you.

He obviously speaks here of the last man in contradistinction to the people of our time who are still chaotic.

The unconscious is not yet synthesized; that is, there is still a sort of melting pot in them where the elements can be re-formed, where new figures or new orders can be created.

The old alchemistic philosophy tried to do that.

The original condition of man was represented by chaotic pieces of elements that found themselves together with no order, quite incidentally; and then by the process of fire they were melted together, producing, it was assumed, a new spiritual development.

That was due to a fundamental idea of alchemistic philosophy which expressed itself by symbols of chemistry.

They could not use philosophical or even psychological terms, because the church made it much too dangerous to talk of such things.

But the existence of chemistry was in itself an evidence of the powers that were breaking loose immediately after the beginning of the Reformation.

That movement, however, which was really equal to modern psychology, had to move underground.

It has to express itself by intricate symbols, just as early Christianity used mystery terms. Instead of saying "Christ," they used the word Poimen, for instance.

In the whole book of Hermas, which is surely Christian–at least, he was supposed to be the brother of the second pope-the name of Christ is not mentioned at all; he is referred to only as the poime.

And baptism and the communion could only he alluded to by certain symbols, because of the danger of persecution.

To have somewhat radical or liberal views was a very serious matter in the Middle Ages: one risked being roasted.

Of course, Nietzsche knew nothing of alchemy.

I am quite certain that he never read such stuff, for in his time those old medieval philosophers were thought of as being sort of idiots with idiotic fantasies.

So that idea of the chaos in everybody is to him like a speech metaphor, but it is apt symbolism for the disordered condition of an unconscious that is not yet synthesized.

This is expressed in every individual by a certain lack of orientation, a vagueness, a feeling of being suspected, and of drifting, finding no direction and no meaning in life.

In certain stages of analysis, particularly in the beginning, people realize very clearly that they have chaos in themselves and they feel lost in it.

They don’t know where that chaotic movement leads: often they don’t understand at all what they are doing or what the analyst is talking about.

It all looks perfectly aimless and incidental. !Now, Nietzsche’s idea is that out of that lack of order, a dancing star should be born.

Here is the symbol of dancing again. Where have we met it before?

Miss Hannah: The old anchorite says Zarathustra is going his way like a dancer.

Dr. Jung: Exactly. So the dancing refers to Zarathustra, but there are other parallels later on.

The dancing star would be in the twinkling star for instance, and the star would symbolize what in this case?

Mr. Baumann: Individuation.

Dr. Jung: Yes, it would be a symbol of individuation, a symbol of the concentration of one living spark, the spark of fire that fell into creation, according to the Gnostic myth.

Mr. Baumann: Zarathustra said that one might find the germ of the highest hope in man. Does that mean that the individuated man is the last hope of man?

Dr . .Jung: Well, this germ of the highest hope is the star.

Man should plant a germ, which would grow up in the form of plant, and the plant would create a flower which would be the star.

It would be what we call the Yoga plant, with the star flower.

It is an age-old poetical metaphor to call a meadow full of flowers an image of the sky with its thousands of stars; flowers have those starlike forms, symmetrical structures.

So if man succeeds in planting that germ, it is as if he were pregnant with a twinkling star.

That explains also the dancing movement, the incessant twinkling of a star symbolizes its peculiar emanating activity.

And this idea or feeling or intuition-whatever one calls it-explains the many arms of the Hindu gods.

They represent the extraordinary twinkling activity of the divine body. Those arms are all moving.

They symbolize an enormous activity emanating from the god.

The figure of the creative Shiva, Shiva in his perfect manifestation-particularly in the Lamaistic cult-has thirty-six arms, or sometimes even seventy-two.

They form a corona round him like the emanating rays of a sun or a star.

Therefore, Nietzsche says later on, speaking to man: "Art thou a new power and a new law, a first movement, a wheel that rolls out of itself? Canst thou force the stars that they turn round thyself?"

Here we have that same symbolism, the rotation and also the star.

Then again, later: "It is terrible being alone with the judge and the revenger of thine own law; thus a star is cast out into the empty space and into the icy breath of solitude."

That is also a symbol of individuation.

Another reference to it is: "But my brother, if thou wan test to be a star" meaning the Superman.

And again, speaking of individuation: "The ray of a star may shine in your life and your hope may be called: 'I am, I give birth to the Superman.' "

Then besides the star and the wheel, there is the symbol of the golden ball. Perhaps you know the German fairy tale about the princess who lost her golden ball in a deep well where the frog prince was watching it.

She wanted to get it back, but he said: "Only if you allow me to share your seat at the table, eat from your own dish, drink from your own goblet, and share your little bed."

She agreed very reluctantly, but when he crept into her bed, she threw him out against the wall, and then he transformed into a beautiful prince."-there Nietzsche says: "Verily, Zarathustra had a goal, he threw his ball, now ye others, I throw the golden ball to you," meaning: I, Zarathustra, have accomplished individuation and I now throw the golden ball to you; this is the idea of the Superman again.

Now, Nietzsche speaks here of the last man who is not able to individuate, who has no chaos in himself and therefore no motive to give birth to a star.

That would be the man who is completely exhausted, who is absolutely satisfied, and who doesn't know of any further evolution.

Therefore he asks:

"What is love? What is creation? What is longing? What is a star?"-so asketh the last man and blinketh.

The earth hath then become small, and on it there hoppeth the last man who maketh everything small.

His species is ineradicable like that of the ground-flea, the last man liveth longest.

"We have discovered happiness"-say the last men, and blink thereby.

They have left the regions where iris hard to live, for they need warmth.

One still loveth one’s neighbour and rubbeth against him; for one needeth warmth.

Turning ill and being distrustful, they consider sinful: they walk warily.

He is a fool who still stumbleth over stones or men!

What is this? What kind of attitude does he describe in this last man?

Mrs. Baumann: Playing for safety.

Airs. Fierz: In that book by William James about religious experiences, there is a good passage where he says we must be prepared for everything, we don’t know whether God exists or not, so we must make ourselves as if he lived and yet as if he did not live; we must say yes, and yet make safe and say no."-,

Dr. Jung: Safe in every case.

Yes, it is a sort of opportunism, as what he describes here is a sort of opportunistic attitude.

He describes the collective man of his day, hoping to reach them by describing them to themselves; he paints a picture of the last man for them and they think it is far away in the future, but what he describes is simply the ideal man, an ideal rationalist or the ideal opportunist.

He hopes to touch them in that way, that they may see, that their eyes may be opened to what they really are.

He could not sleep, he took chloral by the heap, so if he had discovered a little happiness, it would not have been so bad.

Then at the end of the chapter he says:

"And now do they look at me and laugh: and while they laugh they hate me too. There is ice in their laughter."

They take what he says as something comical, a sort of cruel mockery.

The chapter ends with the recognition of an almost incurable difference between himself and the collective man of his time.

Now, that is of course a critical moment.

For the speech now ceases and the symbolic action begins.

should be conservative to a certain extent, or that everybody should have their little pleasures for the day and for the night, and have a regard for their health.

Nietzsche himself had no sense of pleasure well, perhaps he had a certain amount of pleasure out of life, but it was precious little-and as for his health, he lived on bottles.

He could not sleep, he took chloral by the heap, so if he had discovered a little happiness, it would not have been so bad.

You see, he reviles the collective man who really can live.

Of course, if one is doing nothing but that, life is not worthwhile; it is not meant that one should do that and nothing else.

But he means the ordinary collective man who unfortunately believes in the righteousness of his principles, his only mistake being that he overlooks the fact that the world has a certain depth, that there are certain things behind the screen, and that the future of mankind already casts its shadow.

Zarathustra is very impatient with that poor collective man, which is of course the reason why he does not reach him.

Mrs. Baumann: It sounds as if he were describing the Christian Scientists.

Or is sickness regarded as a sin more personal to him?

Dr. Jung: His description would fit Christian Science or any other "ism" because it fits the collective man as he is.

Then at the end of the chapter he says:

"And now do they look at me and laugh: and while they laugh they hate me too. There is ice in their laughter."

That shows his attitude.

He feels a tremendous split between himself and the collective man. You see, he no longer talks of the lightning.

He realizes that there is a great split, and that he looks to them like a "mocker with terrible jests."

They take what he says as something comical, a sort of cruel mockery.

The chapter ends with the recognition of an almost incurable difference between himself and the collective man of his time.

Now, that is of course a critical moment.

Here he simply gives up hoping to reach them by the lightning, that the lightning could kindle fire in them. He says that he feels them to be cold like ice.

There is no warmth, no connection, nothing that would bridge the gulf.

That is the key word of the situation, and in that moment the rope-dancer begins; in that moment the rope-dancer is bridging the gulf, going from one side over to the other on the thin and dangerous rope.

For the speech now ceases and the symbolic action begins.

And the action will show what it means to Nietzsche to establish a connection between the Superman and the collective man-in other words, what individuation means. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 91-109

[1]Zarathustra Seminar

Dr. Jung:

I read last time the part in which Zarathustra deals with the most contemptible last man, and I want to ask you how you are impressed by that fellow. Do you like him?

I heard a rather interesting reaction about him the other day.

Mrs. Baynes: I thought he was contemptible.

Miss Hannah: I thought that he was all right as a piece of an individual but not as a whole.

Mrs. Baumann: I thought he was the boring side of the banal existence of man.

Dr. Jung: Well, somebody who is a great enthusiast about Nietzsche told me that he found the last man not so contemptible after all; he thought he was a fairly acceptable individual and that his ideas were not so bad.

For instance, Zarathustra says: "Turning ill and being distrustful, they consider sinful: they walk warily. He is a fool who stumbleth over stones or men!"

I would not contradict that. "One still loveth his neighbour and rubbeth against him, for one needeth warmth."

That is a perfectly tenable truth.

And having regard for health, I should say was not too bad when you remember what Zarathustra says about the valuation and appreciation of the body.

Later on there is a chapter where he curses those who despise the body, and these last men surely have high regard for health, which means the functioning of the body.

So that last man is a very ordinary and quite reasonable individual, with nothing particularly excessive.

Then he says: "One no longer becometh poor or rich; both are too burdensome."

Again a very reasonable standpoint.

If people did not follow such ideals the world would be even more a hell of a chaos than it is today.

If people would he a bit more reasonable, with less passion for being very poor or very rich, perhaps things in general would be quieter and better.

You see, he is cursing a fairly normal human being, and if Nietzsche had accepted that man in himself as an indispensable fragment, at least, of his make-up, he would have been better perhaps.

He would not have been so excessive, and he would not have injured himself.

Another allusion which is characteristic is: "One still worketh, for work is a pastime.

But one is care fullest the pastime should hurt one."

They don’t overwork apparently.

Nietzsche, on the other hand, was a man who passionately wasted his energies and no doubt injured his brain through a most uncanny intensity.

Of course one can say that if that intensity had not been one of his characteristics, we would not have had Zarathustra nor any of his other books.

But obviously the two things are true, not only the one.

Now while Zarathustra is delivering that sermon, he again has to realize that it doesn’t reach the ears of his audience, and the next chapter begins:

Then, however, something happened which made every mouth mute and every eye fixed.

In the meantime, of course, the ropedancer had commenced his performance: ...

How do you understand the fact that the rope-dancer has begun his task while Zarathustra was still talking about the most contemptible of men?

That is a bit of psychological causality.

We must think of the whole procedure here as a process in one person.

Dr. Reichstein: If we take this rope-dancer as the Superman, it would be a contradictory point of view, a contrast to this last man, who is quite entangled in matter, most materialistic.

Dr. Jung: You think that a sort of compensatory process is now beginning.

Yes, the sermon is getting thin, one almost feels it.

First of all he doesn’t reach his audience; then, what he says is pretty thin because it is unjust.

He really curses the man on whom he lives, the ordinary man.

He lives on health for instance, and he is making just that thing in himself most contemptible.

So what he says is contradicted from within by the facts; he says something which has no longer anything to do with the facts.

And then whatever one says is thin and ordinary, as if it had been emptied of libido.

There is no power in it, or there is only willpower, that miserably small amount of disposable libido which constitutes the so-called willpower of man.

It is as if pressed out of him by a concentrated effort of will, but it is not supported by the instinctive truth, by the deeper layers of his personality.

They then begin to proceed by themselves, to become automatic; they appear in the ropedancer in an activity which is no longer Zarathustra's activity.

But the rope-dancer is also in a way Zarathustra himself.

That does not mean Zarathustra as he is here in the book, where everything is split up into different figures, but it is a drame interieur of the author himself.

While he is talking in the form of Zarathustra, somebody else is going to work in the form of the rope-dancer. Then what kind of figure would the rope-dancer be in Nietzsche, looked at from this basis? Have we any category into which we could put him?

Here is Zarathustra and the figure of the old wise man, and now we come to the passage where that terrible jester appears, the buffoon.

There are a number of figures.

Mr. Allemann: It is that part of Nietzsche which goes over the gulf to become the Superman.

Dr. Jung: Yes, the rope-dancer is Nietzsche's attempt to become the Superman.

You see, that was doomed to come off; he burns his bridge talking about the last man, telling the people they are utterly contemptible in forgetting to become Supermen.

Naturally they then want to see the Superman.

They call for the rope-dancer, because they cannot believe that it is possible to cross over the gulf, to walk on that thin rope over the abyss which separates them from the Superman.

He should show them how one becomes a Superman: that is the urgent question.

You see they can say: Tout cela est bien dit mais il faut cultiver notre jardin.

It is like the sort of empty talk which is going on now in the world.

It is in every newspaper and book.

They all say, one ought to, one must, but nobody shows how the thing can be done.

There are even people who say it would be quite simple to regulate prices, for instance; we have ten thousand good propositions but nobody shows the way to carry them out.

They say; if only people did so and so, but we have to deal with man as he is, we cannot make a system or a scheme where everybody is doing his duty to the utmost.

It never has been done.

Well, there have been some particular enthusiasts or particular blessed fools who did their duty to the utmost; they were either great fools or marvelous beings whose pictures were put into chapels and worshipped.

But people in general would never come to the conclusion that they ought to do their duty to the utmost, because it has already been done by one and that is enough.

Be careful not to imitate it; that is their morality.

So of course when Zarathustra talks of the Superman, people are interested in the rope-dancer who is actually going to perform the great feat.

This is the reality test.

Tout cela est bien dit, but now let us see how the thing is done.

And Nietzsche comes to an end; he doesn't know, for he is the figure that lives in ideas.

Now, that is the archetype of the wise old man, who is a system of beautiful ideas.

He consists of a tissue of the most marvelous ideas that have ever been visualized, but nowhere is it said how to do it.

It is only sometimes put before you as a sort of ethical program; one ought to.

But as soon as you begin to apply it, there is only a spasmodic attempt of willpower.

It means a terrible effort, and you feel that it is unreal.

Therefore, it is unavoidable, when the sermon becomes thin, that there should be libido running over into another system, a practical system which will show how the thing is done-or how it fails perhaps."

I will read the text:  he had come out at a little door, and was going along the rope which was stretched between two towers, so that it hung above the marketplace and the people.

When he was just midway across, the little door opened once more, and a gaudily-dressed fellow like a buffoon sprang out, and went rapidly after the first one.

"Go on, halt-foot," cried the frightful voice, "go on, lazy-bones, interloper, sallow-face!-lest I tickle thee with my heel!

What dost thou here between the towers?

In the tower is the place for thee, thou shouldst be locked up; to one better than thyself thou blockest the way!'

And with every word he came nearer and nearer the first one.

And what kind of system in Nietzsche would the rope-dancer be?

Miss Hannah: It is the shadow. Nietzsche does not do it himself, the shadow makes an effort.

Dr. Jung: That is a possibility.

The rope-dancer could be the shadow, as we said before, but we must have evidence for such a diagnosis.

Have you any evidence?

Miss Hannah: It seemed to me that he was the shadow, because the attempt failed; attempts that one leaves to the unconscious always do, because they are too fragmentary.

Dr. Jung: Yes, that could be called evidence.

It is obviously an attempt that is destined to fail and insofar one could say it was a shadow attempt, an attempt left to the unconscious.

The whole man is not in it.

Mrs. Baumann: I had an idea that it must be the last man as it is in Nietzsche, because that is the thing which has been left out.

Dr. Jung: Yes, we were dealing with the last man just before, so it is very probable that that figure would play a role here too.

The first part is simply the mapping out of the task, making a program, and then the question arises about how that is to be carried out, and here the way is being shown.

Sure enough, Nietzsche means: get up, ye last men, and try to cross over the gulf; and these so-called last men, these most contemptible ordinary men, are now trying to get across.

Now, they are surely shadows. They are not heroic in the least.

They are utterly inconspicuous, and chiefly characterized by more or less negative qualities.

All heroic attempt has vanished, apparently; you would not call them especially positive natures.

It is quite generally true that our consciousness is chiefly in the foreground-our attempts are chiefly conscious-at least we like to say so.

Therefore, we call the person behind our backs our shadow, and the assumption is that no particular heroic attempts will be made by this person.

The conscious ego is the one for that.

The shadow figure has no body; it is relatively inefficient, and we assume that efficiency, willpower, energy, and all that, are in the conscious.

So this more or less inadequate rope-dancer would about fulfil the role of the shadow also.

And what about that terrible fellow who comes out after him?

Miss Wolff: Is there not a certain complication in this case?

Nietzsche’s real shadow, that is, the ordinary man in him, was not at all included in the problem.

So the rope-dancer is like a sort of surrogate figure.

At the same time, the image of the rope-dancer looks to me like a reflection and a criticism on the whole situation.

It means to say that the way Zarathustra has just proclaimed of how to become the Superman is an unreal one. It is acrobatic, a sort of circus-stunt.

It is a dangerous unreality, and therefore a catastrophe is bound to happen.

Dr. Jung: Quite. So it would be a symbolic demonstration of Zarathustra’s psychology; it is performed as a sort of symbol before the crowd.

Under ordinary circumstances that rope-dancer would have gone across as he has often done, and it is merely that Zarathustra has made his appearance in the place this disaster happens.

He is interfering with the rope-dancer by his presence.

Mrs. Jung: I should have thought that the rope-dancer was the mind or intellect of Nietzsche insofar as Nietzsche is identified with it, and the buffoon would be the shadow who jumps over him.

For, that Nietzsche's mind broke clown is really the whole tragedy. I cannot see how the rope-dancer can be the last man.

It seems to me he is the opposite, because the last man is here described as not at all daring, taking no risks: he would not fall down.

But Nietzsche himself fell down really.

Dr. Jung: Yes, that could be true too.

Well, as a matter of fact it is exceedingly difficult to judge from the beginning as to the real nature of the rope-dancer.

We have to anticipate a little.

Later on, we see that the rope-dancer is killed and Zarathustra takes care of his body, but before he dies he says to him: Thy soul will be dead even sooner than thy body.

This is the prophetic word, it prophesies Nietzsche's fate.

His soul died in 1888 when his general paralysis began, but he lived on for eleven years more.

His body lived but his soul was dead.

So the fate of that rope-dancer symbolically anticipates the fate that overcame

Nietzsche: Nietzsche himself is the rope-dancer and the same fate will befall him.

One could say it was Nietzsche's mind or his consciousness; or I think I would say this rope-dancer symbolizes Nietzsche himself, though in a way he is much less than Nietzsche, insofar as he is a shadow only.

Of course, the whole event here is a sort of play of shadows or a writing projected against the wall, which forecasts the fate that Nietzsche the man will experience.

So we can say that under the disguise of the rope-dancer, Nietzsche himself appears as a real man who tries to go across that rope.

And in that case, who would the buffoon be?

Dr. Reichstein: That is the real demoniacal force which Nietzsche thought the first rope-dancer to be. I think the first rope-dancer was the conscious part of what Nietzsche preaches, and the real demoniacal force which we saw in the speech comes here in the form of the buffoon.

Dr. Jung: Indubitably, this figure that comes out after the ropedancer is a demoniacal figure; he is characterized as such.

We hear nothing more of him here-whether he really goes across the rope.

For the moment he seems to vanish into thin air.

The whole attention then concentrates upon the body, the accident.

So it is evidently not the purpose of the buffoon to show how one gets across.

His task seems to be to kill the rope-dancer. That figure returns later on, however.

But if the rope-dancer is Nietzsche himself, then what would the hostile figure be?

Mrs. Baynes: Could he not be taken as the negative feeling that Nietzsche has created in the crowd, which makes the crowd determined to thwart his effort?

Dr. Jung: That is indirectly true, but I think this figure really arises from Nietzsche himself.

It would be the active shadow, a shadow whose power has been underrated.

This shadow takes its origin really in those most harmless last men.

Therefore the whole catastrophe is predicted in the last sentence of the chapter before: "But they think me cold, and a mocker with terrible jests."

They already see in him the terrible jester, this buffoon that will eventually kill the rope-dancer, because they hold that what he says of the Superman is well-nigh impossible, and if anybody should try to carry it out, he would fall dead, which happens in fact immediately after.

So the buffoon could be called an active shadow.

The shadow is as a rule inactive, a mere background, or an indication that somebody has body-three dimensions-since a thing that has not three dimensions casts no shadow.

If a person is more or less complete, his shadow is visible; if it is not, you feel that person is as if painted flat upon the wall.

With more or less shadow, there is more or less negation or contradiction, and without that nobody is complete.

People who have only two dimensions are identical with a sort of persona or mask which they carry in front of themselves and behind which they hide.

The persona in itself casts no shadow.

It is a perfectly clear picture of a personality that is above board, no blame, no spot anywhere; but when you notice that there is no shadow, you know it is a mask and the real person is behind that screen.

Mr. Baumann: Is that thin quality not expressed by the scene?

There is a marketplace and two windows and a rope, but it leads nowhere in particular.

I mean, if there were a river or an abyss that one had to go over, it would make the whole thing real, but a rope goes over nothing.

Dr. Jung: That is due to the fact that the whole thing is simply a symbolic show.

You think you have gone across an abyss but you have merely crossed the stage, you have gone nowhere.

You think you have crossed the Red Sea perhaps, but it is only a symbolic performance, like a play in a theater.

Miss Wolff What I meant to say is that Nietzsche, in as far as he identifies with Zarathustra, is a rope-dancer. Zarathustra has just preached that man ought to grow beyond himself into the Superman. But Nietzsche does not grow, he does not take roots by assimilating his shadow. Instead, he identifies with his vision, and so it all becomes a sort of trick, like walking on air. The buffoon is the shadow which is left behind, "the last man," the ordinary man, and because it is left behind, in the end it overtakes Nietzsche.

Dr. Jung: Yes, that is the psychology of it; that is just what I mean.

Dr. Reichstein: Is not the symbol of the rope-dancer very unusual for this situation? I think it never could be in itself a symbol for a real surpassing of difficulties.

Dr. Jung: Well, it is a great risk, and for that the rope-dancer is an excellent picture.

Mrs. Crowley: He is able to hold the balance also.

Dr. Reichstein: I think that a symbol must be more connected with the earth than a rope-dancer. in order to fit into a real situation.

Dr. Jung: But that the thing is not connected with reality is exactly the trouble; therefore, the rope-dancer is such an excellent symbol, or an arrow over another.

Airs. Baynes: It is because he himself has to find the Superman.

Dr. Jung: Yes. You see the idea of bridging a gap is most characteristic for this affair of the Superman.

And then, as Mrs. Crowley points out, the necessity of keeping the balance between the two sides.

Mrs. Bailey: Is it the balance between the opposites?

Dr. Jung: Exactly, it is the crossing from one condition to another, which is a symbol of the pairs of opposites, and the way by which one gets to the Superman.

And the opposites are connected by the transcendent function; that is beautifully demonstrated by the rope stretched between the two towers.

Of course, that the whole thing is in the air is characteristic too.

Mrs.. Crowley: I think there is another reason for the symbol.

Nietzsche is always referring to the bridge without a goal, and this is just a bridge: there is no goal.

Dr. Jung: Yes, he says man is a bridge between two banks.

So the picture is very much to the point in every respect.

Dr. Reichstein: Perhaps in a teleological way it might mean to show Nietzsche that what he wants is not good for him, that he is not on the real way; the symbol would mean that the whole thing is in the air, circuslike, not real.

Dr. Jung: Well, it is like dream symbolism.

When a dream picture is impossible or absurd, it conveys the idea that what one does is absurd, but at the same time it shows the way.

If one takes it concretely, as it stands in the vision, of course it is absurd, and then of course the catastrophe is due.

But if Nietzsche only could abstract it, dissolve it; if he could say, ah, a rope stretched between two towers, pairs of opposites which should be connected, and walk from one side to the other, then he would be on the right way.

Then he could say, "I have the conflict in myself, a dilemma, and I should bridge that gulf," and then he would discover the problem of the pairs of opposites.

This is an exceedingly important point, because Nietzsche in a way continues the discussion which was begun by Friedrich Schiller, the first of the German philosophers. Schiller is to me a philosopher.

I think little of his poetry, but I think a great deal of his philosophy.

He was the first German to become aware of the problem of the opposites in human nature; that psychological split became manifest to him probably under the influence of the impressions of the French Revolution, which was a sheer horror to the people of that time.

It was the first time in history that the Christian god was dethroned.

Notre Dame was desecrated and la deesse Raison put upon the throne and worshipped instead of the Christian god.

There was wholesale slaughter, heads cut off by the score-and killing the most Christian king was a thing simply unheard of.

You see, values began rattling downlike anything, as they are today, and as they were during the great war.

Sensitive, thinking people were tremendously shaken by all those events in France, and it was under the immediate impression of those events that Schiller discovered that problem of the pairs of opposites: the problem that man, on the one side, is a fairly civilized being, and on the other, quite barbarous.

He sought a way of overcoming that condition, a way that might lead to a sort of reasonable state; and the only medicine he found was in the vision of beauty, the idea that in the contemplation of beauty you can be united with yourself.

Curiously enough, as an example of beauty he chose the Juno Ludovist, an antique bust that has nothing particularly interesting about it. If he had said Apollo, or a head of Zeus, or Homer, it would be more understandable, but just that] uno Ludovist is perfectly foolish.

I think he must have had such a bust in his study, and he probably contemplated it and thought it a most marvelous face.

So that if everybody would do something of the sort-if they could behold beauty-they could unite the pairs of opposites.

Now this problem apparently went to sleep again, but once touched upon it never goes to sleep really; it keeps on causing bad dreams, and Nietzsche took it up again.

After Schiller, the line goes through Schopenhauer, but Schopenhauer was entirely pessimistic as to its solution; also he did not see it in just such a light.

He was convinced that the world was a tremendous error.

He felt that split as being, not psychological, but as a split in the world, as if there was somewhere a profound mistake in the calculation of the world; and he came to the conclusion that the evil was ineradicable.

He felt that the world was merely incidental, that there was an unconscious will through which in the course of eternity, at an absolutely unaccountable moment, the world came to pass; that it had not developed historically, but came into existence as a dream image of the blind will.

There was no foresight, no intention in the making; it simply happened.

He went further than the Gnostics who assumed that there was a creator, the Demiurgos, who was at least half-conscious; Schopenhauer was absolutely pessimistic.

But though to him the split was projected into the world and not into man, it is very much the same thing; he unites the pairs of opposites.

Then he said it also happened that man developed an intellect which was able to mirror itself.

He must hold this mirror before the intellect and it will see its own face and say, "No more of this, we will stop that whole show, make it invalid-and return to Nirvana by a complete denial of life in general."

That is what you do when you project a problem into your relations or friends, for instance: you help them to annihilate each other, to do all sorts of damage to each other, in order to settle your own problem.

One represents one side of your character and the other another side, and you try to get them to meet either in a friendly way or to fight each other. This explains the intrigues that always surround neurotic people; they are embedded in a tissue of intrigue.

They suffer of course terribly from poisonous projections, but they always cause them; they even instigate them.

Other people seem to be sort of actors in their private theater: one laughs and another weeps, and they tell this or that story to put those people against each other-and there they have the play they want.

Of course, they pay the expenses in the long run, but the others do too if they are fools enough to fall into the trap.

Also, in the history of a patient who is still embedded in his family, you will see that he usually succeeds in getting members of his family into pairs of opposites, dressing them up to play different roles.

The daughter projects into the father and mother, for instance, or the parents into the children.

Or in political groups, they even project their problems into the political parties.

The next figure to deal with the opposites after Schopenhauer was Nietzsche, who was also a sort of moral philosopher, and in Zarathustra he is actually at grips with the problem.

His other works, The Will to Power and The Genealogy of Morals, for instance, are chiefly criticisms of our civilization-of course always with a view to the dark shadow behind.

So Nietzsche is really a modern psychologist. In our days, he would have made a famous analyst, for he had an ingenious flare for the dark background and the secret motivations; he has anticipated a great deal of Freud and Adler.

But Nietzsche had by no means a merely critical mind.

He had, of course, a critical intellect, like those French aphorists of the eighteenth century, but he did not get stuck in mere criticism.

He was beyond that; he was positive, and in Zarathustra he also made the heroic attempt to settle the conflict.

And here he encounters the shadow, which he has already clearly shown in his other works.

He tries to build up an attitude or a system by which one can overcome that terrible shadow which undermines everything and checks every movement, and it is interesting to watch the development.

In Schiller, it was a sort of aesthetic solution, very weak, as if he had not realized the length and the depth of the problem.

To try to solve it by the vision of beauty is like trying to put out a great fire with a bottle of lemonade.

Schopenhauer made a more heroic attempt, but he annihilates the whole world; he annuls all existence in order to settle the conflict of man, and that is going too far.

It is like cutting one's head off because one has a headache.

Nietzsche came more truly and more specifically to grips with the psychology of man; therefore, his critical work was chiefly psychological, and he felt that the regeneration of man was needed, a readjustment.!

He makes this attempt, and you see it is not only a personal whim of Nietzsche's very personal neurosis; it is really a secular attempt of the human mind to deal with that problem.

It has, of course, been dealt with in history many times before in other ways.

Up to the time of Schiller it had been sufficiently dealt with by the church, which simply took the whole domain of the unconscious, the shadow part of humanity, and expressed it in symbols; and they represented the whole thing as settled once and forever.

If there should be any disturbance, there were the means of grace of the church.

It was, and is still, a most elaborate magic system by which to settle every question.

But the moment when that system becomes invalid through historical events like the French Revolution, the problem appears in the psychology of man.

People who are still really in the Catholic church have no unconscious.

For instance, a book has just appeared, by a Catholic, called Das Dunkle Reich in Uns, The Dark Kingdom in Us, which is about the psychological problem; and the author says that there is no proof of the existence of the unconscious-that there really is no unconscious-it is merely imagination.

Of course, almost any man nowadays in his normal senses, as we must assume he is, is simply unable to make such a statement; but a Catholic can easily, because he really has no unconscious.

It is in the church.

I have talked to very intelligent people in France about this question, and the Protestants and Jews understood what I meant, but the normal French Catholic does not understand at all, because for him the unconscious doesn't exist.

Even if he doesn't believe in the church, he is at least an atheist, which means a good Catholic.

I once treated a patient who was considered most conservative, the blackest of Catholics-she even had very close relations with the cardinals in Rome-but after I had known her for ten years she told me, "I don't believe in God, I don't believe in the Pope, in the immortality of the soul, in Christ, in the forgiveness of sins. I believe nothing of all that, yet I shall die in the church."

You see, such a person has no unconscious.

It is a most remarkable fact, which we can hardly understand.

Then a very educated and intelligent Catholic with an academic training said to me,

"I really cannot see why you take such trouble with psychology; if there is any question, I ask my bishop and he tells me what to think about it; and if he doesn't know he writes to Rome and there in the Propaganda Fide they tell him exactly; for two thousand years they have sat there and unraveled these matters."

Now even if it were true that the Propaganda Fide could answer certain questions, if I didn't understand it, if it did not express myself, I could not accept it.

But they can accept it because it has never been in them.

It is exactly as if it were a matter of some detail in the life of the Polar Eskimos.

I never have seen the Polar Eskimos, but I know there is such a tribe and I know a man who knows about them; so if I want to know what the Polar Eskimos eat for their midday meal, I simply write a letter to that man and he tells me they eat walrus steak, and I think he must know and accept it because I never was in the country.

So these Catholics have never had any experience of the unconscious; they were never concerned with it, so they easily can accept what they say about it in Rome.

But the Propaganda Fide is in the church, you know, and funnily enough it remains there.

Even if they don't believe the whole dogma of the church, they still have it there; they just put an a before it: if only a negation, it remains.

Those fellows to whom I talked were convinced atheists.

Therefore, Bernard Shaw makes that joke about a man in the extremity of doubt who finally breaks down and says: I am absolutely shaken in my atheistic belief.

Mrs. Case: Is it not a very immoral position, leaving all those questions to other people?

Dr. Jung: I should say so. Such people ought to be punished.

It is really very mean, particularly for other people who get the bad end of it.

I\ ow, we are still concerned with the buffoon, and we concluded that this was really an active shadow.

Ordinarily, the shadow is not an active figure, but is only a sort of passive appendage, a background, a mere exponent of the fact that there is a three dimensional body.

In itself the shadow has no existence; it follows very closely where the body goes, and that is of course the normal condition, as it should be.

But as soon as there is a split, a disagreement with the negative qualities of man, the shadow takes a form, and it even goes so far as to separate itself from the person.

That excellent film The Student of Prague is an illustration.

You remember, he detached from his shadow which then committed awful crimes.

The man himself kept his word, he was a man of honor; but his shadow broke his word, and that led to a terrible entanglement and a catastrophic denouement.

It is a demonstration of a certain psychological condition, where the conscious is merely persona-like, painted on the wall as two-dimensional only.

Then the shadow is set apart and leads a life of its own.

This is always the case when one does not realize what one is doing.

You know, some people don't realize themselves; they don't know what they are doing.

And other people know themselves but they don't know what is happening around them-the two types of course.

That is the unconsciousness of the shadow.

The shadow is indispensable for making the whole of a personality; nobody is whole without negative qualities.

This is lightly said, but in reality it is an enormous problem, looked at from an ethical point of view.

It is so difficult that one knows no other solution practically than to shut one's eyes; if one doesn't look at it, one can live.

But the moment one sees it, it is almost impossible, an insupportable conflict.

If one takes the moral conflict seriously, it becomes insoluble.

Therefore, people choose the way of the church or something like that, in order to escape the terrible responsibility.

There the church steps in with her means of grace, or with the conviction that somebody has dealt with the problem of our sin, or is going to deal with it, so we are relieved of that awful problem.

Numerous have been the attempts of man in that direction.

The Gnostics, for instance, made very interesting attempts, but I won't go into that now, as we are here concerned with a very modern problem.

If the shadow is separated from consciousness, it always has body, reality: it is a spontaneous and active agency.

And inasmuch as the separation of the ego consciousness and the shadow prevents the integration of the whole of the personality-individuation-the shadow also contains the self.

Behind the shadow looms up the self, but then in a negative form. In that case, the shadow has a most destructive power; that is the origin of the demoniacal forces of the shadow.

Therefore, it is so important to have the right way with it.

For without the integration of the shadow there is no individuation, and no reconciliation of the pairs of opposites, because the shadow is the opposite.

Mrs. Baumann: There is an interesting picture in Bamberger's Apocalypse of a man who is connected with the devil: they are back to back.

Dr. Jung: Yes, that is of course the problem. In medieval psychology it is the innocent little man with a huge devil behind him.

Mrs. Case: That would be connected with the problem of the freeing of the will, wouldn't it?

Dr. Jung: Yes. Inasmuch as you cannot integrate the shadow, of course the libido invested in the shadow is not disposable.

Mrs. Case: So individuation is really very much bound up with the freedom of the will?

Dr. Jung: Well, the problem of the will is also connected with it, but that is a side issue.

It is one of the handicaps of the individuation process that the more you are split, the less you have free will, and then the process of individuation is inhibited.

First, you must gain a certain amount of freedom, and you only gain that by the assimilation of the shadow.

You must learn to deal with the shadow to a certain extent at least, and then proportionately you acquire free will.

One has no free will in a state of complete dilemma, of complete dissociation or disintegration; that is obvious.

So the demoniacal power of this buffoon is due to the fact that, being with the shadow, it is activated by the superior power of the wholeness of the self.

For the self is the concept which expresses the totality of conscious and unconscious, and inasmuch as the unconscious is a limitless, indefinable, and irrational concept, the self is necessarily also an only partially rational concept; it covers something which cannot be defined fully.

You can define the ego, the extent of consciousness, but you cannot define the unconscious, because it is infinite.

You cannot establish a definite borderline which would separate the conscious clearly from everything that is non-ego; you can only say that your consciousness comes to an end here, and there begins the unconscious.

But how far the unconscious extends, nobody knows.

So the self is an indefinable concept because it covers the whole, the conscious and the unconscious; and inasmuch as the unconscious contains an extraordinary power, the self is an expression of that power.

Therefore, one could say in this case, that inasmuch as the shadow, this terrible jester, is a tremendous problem, he must have a tremendous power.

N ow, under what conditions does the shadow appear in such a terrible form?

Mrs. Fierz: Is it not connected with the appearance of Zarathustra?

In a figure like Zarathustra you see only its positive side, so the shadow would be enriched by the unconscious side, the shadow of Zarathustra.

Dr. Jung: That would explain why he appears in such a terrible form, but why should it be so destructive?

Mrs. Fierz: Because the self is so dangerous.

Dr. Jung: And why is it so dangerous?

Mrs. Crowley: Because he has not recognized it, as he must. He has been far away from the shadow, preaching the Superman, and it is as if that lightning had two sides, the constructive and destructive.

Dr. Jung: Yes, the conscious is very far away; it is identified, as Mrs. Fierz pointed out, with the figure of Zarathustra, the wise old man, with an all-embracing, benevolent truth, very beautiful, very meaningful and all that.

Apparently there is no shadow in the wise old man, so there is a great distance between that figure and the shadow, naturally.

But why should the shadow be so hellishly destructive?

Miss Hannah: It seems to me to have something to do with the will of the heart, which in spite of all disarmament attempts is stronger than we. In the same way, when he talks about destructive powers, he doesn't fully realize.

Dr. Jung: Obviously, because it is then not so bad; one can say that just because we don't realize the destructive powers of the shadow, it appears in a particularly dangerous way.

It is so terrible because we are far away and underrate it.

It might seem to be a mere appearance, not real, but this case proves that it is real, because it is the anticipation of Nietzsche's fate. It is as if this whole scene had performed itself in Nietzsche's life.

Now, assuming that the shadow has jumped over him and killed him, why would that be? Have we evidence for the fact that the other side of the self is so exceedingly dangerous?

Mrs. Bailward: Has it something to do with the former inflation that you talked about?

Dr. Jung: Well, if anyone has a one-sided identity with a certain figure, it causes a certain inflation; that simply expresses the distance from the shadow.

Mrs. Baumann: I think that, inasmuch as it is a part which he cannot accept or get connected with, that part rises up and says: "If you do not accept me I will kill you."

Dr. Jung: Yes, but do you think it is necessary to put the pistol upon his chest? Could it not be said more civilly?

Mrs. Baumann: I was taking it for granted that it had been said many times before.

Dr. Jung: As a matter of fact, these things are said once and not many times.

Mrs. Baynes: Would it not be so dangerous because the shadow carries part of the god powers of the self?

Dr. Jung: Exactly.

The point is, inasmuch as you are not Zarathustra or anything like him, inasmuch as you are a rational well-meaning normal being, you are convinced that you choose your life, pick your way in a more or less reasonable way, with a sort of virtuous effort and good intentions, and make something quite nice of it.

And you don’t reckon with the fact that while you are thinking like that, you are forgetting that you are under an inexorable law which is a thousand times stronger than man.’

You see, we have experienced that.

We make contracts with each other and they work for a while, so we make them a bit more certain; we increase the safety of our way of existence still more, until in the end we exclude every kind of interference.

And the more we work along that line, the greater our safety becomes; but the greater also the chance that if anything happens, it will be a terrible mess.

We increase the size of the ships on the ocean, we increase their means of safety, their speed, and all that, so of course an ordinary storm means nothing; but if there is a catastrophe, which never can be prevented, it is a most horrible one.

We try to prevent wars, we make our situation as safe as possible, but of course we create by that the best chance for having a war.

We gather a large army and enormous heaps of ammunition to prevent anybody from attacking us, but the other side is doing the same for their own defence, and finally everybody is defending themselves and this means a war with the most wholesale slaughter.

Former wars were just Sunday evening rows in comparison with what we can do now with all our means of safety.

Thus, our good intentions are always double-crossed by an unaccountable, unforeseen power which one calls chance or something like that.

And we call everybody superstitious who is afraid of chance, who assumes that something ought to be done against it; we don’t believe that anything can really interfere, because we don’t see it.

Yet the primitive man is always hellishly afraid of chance, for he knows that whatever he does can be double-crossed by whatever this cunning chance may devise.

Some demon may interfere, and therefore he takes quite extraordinary measures of precaution.

Certain things which might offend the demons must not be done, for they would take a terrible revenge.

This consciousness has become obliterated in us, so we never really think whether God will interfere with us or not.

As a matter of fact, he does and we call it chance, but that is simply another name for the same old thing.

Mr. Baumann: "His Majesty, Chance."

Dr. Jung: Yes, that is a recognition of this extraordinary power.

Of course, we try to break its power by saying it is blind, it just happens, but if you study it carefully, you finally reach the conclusion that chance is a very peculiar thing.

It is as if it had analysed that particular case and put this thing just in the right place, like the wasp that in order to lay its eggs in that place, lames the caterpillar without killing it by putting its poisonous sting into the third dorsal ganglia, knowing much better where the motor center is than the zoologists.

Zoologists have to work for years to find out.

One could say it was mere chance, but unfortunately these things don’t happen as if they were chance.

There is regularity and enormous teleology. It is the same with the unconscious.

In the words you speak by chance, the truth is what you just blurt out.

We first think the interfering factor has to do with the shadow; we make a slip of the tongue or something else happens to us and we recognize it and say, "Oh well, that was the shadow, it is due to such and such a complex."

And we think we can unravel and eradicate it, and then it will stop and not bother us again.

But the further we go, the more we see that behind that shadow is a much greater power, and finally we see it is that totality of conscious and unconscious.

Then we again think that we have now come to something which is circumscribed, something tangible, within the reach of human reason.

But the self is just as far-reaching as the unconscious; we don’t know how far it reaches.

We get into an enormous continuity with life in general, not only life in the present; it contains all the ancestral life of the past and intimations of the things to come-all of humanity.

So we arrive at a conception of the self which is worldwide, a sort of conglomerate and accumulation of individual minds, and that is simply a conception of a god.

Then when you have arrived at such a conclusion, you naturally begin to realize all the things that humanity in former ages used to think, that the god is very dangerous, exceedingly sensitive, most susceptible to any kind of offence.

(I don’t speak of the Christian God now, but the god generally.)

You must tread very warily in order not to disturb his peace, and you cannot cheat him; you must fulfil his laws, you have to observe all the necessary rites, you must be very ceremonious in the presence of god because he could take a terrible revenge.

And it is a psychological fact that the self, the whole of man, is an exceedingly dangerous proposition.

Every single individual believes in his own absolute importance, in spite of his weaknesses, his dullness, his unimportance; and we forget that through each human being that universal being is working and can produce the most horrible results.

We should learn fear again.

We suffer from fear in all sorts of phobias, but the reason that so many people suffer from phobias is because their fear is not in the right place.

In the Old Testament, the very first principle is the fear of God. ’

It has been overcompensated in the New Testament by the idea that God is love and one should not be afraid of him.

But God is the one and the other.

The New Testament is just a compensation for the terrible truth of the Old Testament that in the beginning was the fear of God.

If you arrive at the idea that he is also benevolent, it is a sort of secondary experience.

Naturally, it depends upon our attitude.

We can assume, for instance, that if we fulfil the demands of the terrible god; we don't need to be afraid of him any longer; then he will give us his grace, he will be kind to us.

Or we can assume just as well that God is a kind father provided we fulfil what he in his terrible form has demanded of us.

:t\ow this whole aspect is lacking in Zarathustra because his god is dead. And then god appears in the place where one would expect him the least, and that is in the shadow.

The shadow is by definition something which seems to be utterly impotent, trailing just behind the body of man, an appendage, entirely dependent upon his existence.

It is a most absurd and improper place for anything to appear, and therefore we don't recognize its uncanny power.

Of course you can say the shadow in itself is not powerful, but simply an accumulation of all sorts of bad qualities in man; you can always depreciate it.

But the curious thing is that if the god is dead and so appears in the shadow, then the negative qualities of the shadow become the armor of a new and terrible god.

That is the experience which is still waiting for us.

That is just the thing we are going to experience-that God appears to us from the most unaccountable and unexpected quarter.

And so this buffoon who suddenly jumps out of the tower after the rope-dancer, represents to us something completely unexpected, nobody would have thought that out of the shadow such a horror could come.

We are quite certain in this assumption because later on the buffoon says to Zarathustra that the next time he will jump over him too, degrading Zarathustra to the role of the rope-dancer.

This substantiates our interpretation that the rope-dancer is Nietzsche himself in his own form or in the form of Zarathustra; and the buffoon is the part of the shadow that holds divine power, the power over death and life.

If he chooses to jump over Zarathustra, he will do so and Zarathustra will be killed in no time, just in order to show Nietzsche himself that he is dealing here with a power as great as any god's power. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 110-128

Lecture 2, Dreams and Visions of St. Niklaus Van Der Flue by Marie-Louise Von Franz

Jung Institute May 15, 1957

Last time I spoke at the beginning of my lecture of the history of the worship of an outstanding mana personality, pointing out that since very ancient times those who have attained a certain amount of individuality and personality have acquired such authority as to be worshipped during their lifetime by the surrounding people and that after their death a cult has centered round their tombs.

I also pointed out that there was an idea that such outstanding personages in some way incarnate something divine to an unusual extent.

I said that the cult of saints seemed to have much the same psychological motif.

We then began to interpret the four symbolical motifs which appeared at the beginning of St. Niklaus' life and noted a certain sequence of development.

First we discussed the star as a symbol of the pre-conscious and post-conscious individual personality, the old idea that the soul of man begins with a star in the sky and after death becomes a star again, and then came to the motif of the stone, the next symbol our saint saw in his mother's womb.

We noted that in German pre-Christian religions there is the cult of the stones on graves, since it was believed that the souls of the dead lived in these stones and that up to the 11th century Bishops had to forbid people to worship stones in grave-yards.

In Germany and Scandinavian countries such stones were called Bautar stones.

This stone worship continued to the 18th and 19th century.

German people used to build their kitchen stoves of one big stone, which also served as the domestic altar to which the head of the family brought sacrifices, in the belief that it contained the souls of dead ancestors, for though there were priests yet the head of the family held the function of a priest.

Such stones were supposed to have been thrown down from heaven by a god.

Meteors were especially believed to have a mysterious quality and, if found, were worshipped particularly which shows a direct connection between star and stone, as the latter was thought to be a fallen star.

St. Niklaus himself interpreted the stone as the continuity and steadfastness of his own being. In an Indian marriage ceremony, a young man has to stand upon a stone to attain strength of character, another instance of the idea of the stone as representing the strength of the personality.

That a hero is born of a stone and again becomes a stone is a North American-Indian motif of the Iroquois tribe which has the myth of the twins Acorn Sprout and Feuerstein, the former being good and the latter demonic, and the two constantly fight.

Both are creators - one of evil and one of good.

In a neighboring tribe of the Wichita they have as a savior the Great South Star, which is connected with the sun.

This Great South Star has a son called the Young Feuerstein, the latter being positive and the former negative.

In medieval alchemy there is the same connection between the symbols, and the Mercury of the alchemists is both a star and the stone.

I refer you to Jung’s Psychology and Alchemy.

The stone has become an image for immortality because of its durability. Heroes were said, to transform themselves before their death into stones, thus acquiring concrete immortality.

The alchemists compared the philosopher’s stone with the glorified body; they said that by making the philosopher’s stone they made the glorified body which outlasts death.

We can say that the stone carries the qualities of the star, but is nearer the earth.

According to many alchemist:, the philosopher’s stone contains a spirit which dwells in it - a pneuma or a soul – and this soul substance, called the medicina catholica, was compared with water or oil or the elixir of life; probably the underlying idea being that the minerals look like stones with the metal veins in them.

By heating the stone in the stove the metal suddenly appears, and into this actual fact was projected the idea that it was possible to extract from certain stones the soul of the stone, the metallic water, the mysterious essence of the soul of the stone.

A Greek text says: "Go to the shores of the Nile where you will find the stone which has a ‘pneuma’ and this is the whole mystery."

This metallic substance in the stone the alchemists projected into the unconscious, and in a way, you can say that this is comparable to what we do.

If you think of our concept of the unconscious, it is a border-line concept, for we simply describe by this term a real though invisible fact, for it can be said that the reality of the unconscious is a concluded reality, not demonstrable directly.

You can say that it is what produces dreams, that it is that "X" which arranges the meaningful order of the dream.

With a certain technique of interpretation we can bring out of the dream a meaningful connection, so we conclude that there must be something which produces the dream.

We have, like the alchemist, a certain amount of fact and extract therefrom a concept which we call the psyche.

By a great mental effort of concentration and with a capacity for symbolic interpretation it is possible to extract from dreams a very living and meaningful experience.

In alchemy this was projected into the chemical extraction of the liquid metal out of the stone for, as Jung has tried to prove by many alchemical quotations, they projected their unconscious into matter.

We can therefore say that if St. Niklaus next saw the holy oil, that there is a very logical sequence, for after the stone comes the "soul of the stone", a kind of oily liquid which must probably be a symbol of the same thing in a new form.

The alchemists often called, what they described as the soul in matter, an oily kind of water, or some fatty substance.

Some Australian tribes believe that the fat in the kidneys is the seat of the soul.

Of a man in a state of depression, they would say that someone had stolen the fat of his kidneys. In the middle of the kidneys there is a very white fat in the dark flesh, and they thought this mysterious fat hold the soul and could be melted out like the metal out of the stone and was the carrier of the mysterious life process.

They projected the unconscious into it, just as the metal out of the stone was connected with the soul.

The Church speaks of the "holy oil", the chrism. Christ is the "anointed one" and the chrism is used in the extreme unction given to dying people, at the first communion of children, and at the consecration of a priest.

The early Church Fathers interpreted it as the dynamic manifestation of the Holy Ghost.

They had the idea that just as Christ was transformed into the host, so the holy oil contained the dynamic power of the Holy Ghost and that there was transmuted, in a concrete form, the blessing of the Holy Ghost.

This probably goes back to pre-Christian ritual and the Egyptian habit of smearing fat on the statues of gods in order to keep them alive.

Statues were washed and anointed daily in the belief that this imparted a holy life substance and preserved their divine power.

The Christian Church adopted this idea in the chrism.

We have now the interesting sequence of the star in the sky, the stone on earth, and the oil - which is something man can use.

The oil is a typical Catholic symbol, while the others are more remote and pagan; there is a slow approach to the realm of consciousness.

We should ask ourselves what the symbol of the oil means psychologically? What is the specific aspect of the holy oil which imparts vitality and the experience of the Holy Ghost?

The star represents the individual personality; the stone represents steadfastness and experience of immortality within one individual.

The oil is less individual.

It can be given to others, there is a different nuance, and it seems to have a collective connotation.

I would say that it probably has to do with the emanation of the individuated personality - the impact of a man who has become a personality.

You have the feeling that such a person spreads vitality and hope in his surroundings.

If you are connected with your own unconscious in a harmonizing way you have a subjective feeling of being alive in a meaningful sense, you have this maximum of vitality and feel near the inner source.

This is connected with a belief based on the experience that one's own individual life has a meaning, one which has to manifest and fulfill itself.

An atmosphere is thus created which is infectious in the positive sense of the word, just as the psychotic state is infectious in a negative way, and the hope and belief in life imparted by such a personality is a contributory factor in treatment.

This can be observed in primitive medicine men.

By approaching such a personality people acquired hope and felt they were getting nearer to the meaning of their own life.

That such an experience is represented by a substance such as oil has its very deep roots in the magic beliefs of mankind of the most primitive kind and also touches on one of our greatest problems and enigmas, the problem of what we like to call the unconscious psyche and how it is connected with matter.

We know that this is so in some way, and therefore these outstanding personalities are very often connected with symbols which have a very concrete meaning.

If St. Niklaus had come to you and asked what it meant that he had seen these three symbols in his mother's womb, what would you have said?

It is one thing to know the mythological connotations and the approximate meaning of the symbols, and another thing to connect them with someone's unconscious.

You would have had to talk his language.

I would have said that he had to follow his own inner religious experience.

One could go even further and say that the oil, the unction of the anointed one, shows he Christ-like development of the personality and that he has to undergo this process.

Certain individuals have to be filled with the Holy Ghost and do bigger deeds than Christ himself and in St. Niklaus' inner fate he would have to suffer the process by which he would re-experience the fate of Christ in his own person.

The three symbols announce very clearly the constellation of the process of individuation.

St. Niklaus was imbued with the idea that he had a specific vocation, just as in the old tradition of medicine men and saints.

The three symbols are connected with a fourth which has to do with his earliest childhood memories, namely that three days after his birth, at his baptism; he saw standing beside the stone at the altar an unknown old man.

According to his own report, as he recognized his mother and the midwife and everybody else present, he made a note of this unknown old man.

Psychologically, it is obvious that this figure represents the archetype of the wise old man, a personification of the spirit, and, mythologically, a form in which God likes to appear on earth.

In fairy tales God is often represented as wandering round the earth as the wise old man and people recognize him at last.

Professor Blanke wrote a private letter to Professor Jung about the meaning of the old man and published the latter's answer in his book. Jung states that the old man is the archetype of the spirit.

In Christian tradition that would correspond to the Ancient of Days, the Godhead. Jung continues: you can also say that he is the personification of the grain of salt given to the child, in which the wisdom of God is present.

If we accept this, we can say that the motif of the old man connects with the other three symbols, but that it now appears in human form.

But I would not like to say more about this figure for he reappears in further dreams and amplifies himself.

I would only like to point out a mythological analogy in a fairy tale called The Loyal Ferdinand and the Disloyal Ferdinand, a typical story of two friends of whom the good one is rewarded and the other punished.

A father was so poor that he could not find a godfather for his little boy but discovered a poor, unknown old man and asked him to be godfather.

The old man does not turn up until they are in the church when he suddenly appears and says that the boy must be called Ferdinand the Loyal One.

He cannot give a present but instead gives the child a key and says that when he is fourteen years old he will discover in the field a castle which the key will fit and there he will find his birthday present.

He then disappears.

The boy often looks for the castle; but does not find it until he is fourteen.

In it he discovers a beautiful white horse which can talk and which tells him to ride it.

The youth then enters the service of the king and becomes a great hero and all his deeds are performed with the help of the speaking horse.

In the end he deposes the old king and marries the princess and, on the advice of the white horse, rides round three times in a circle when the horse changes into a beautiful prince, who also marries, so that there is a marriage quaternio.

In other variations the white horse in the end reveals that he is the equivalent of the old man and has guided the hero through life.

In yet another version, at the end it is revealed that the horse is God himself.

Here we have the motif of an unknown old man at a child's baptism who turns out to be God Himself.

The shocking idea that God can turn himself into a white horse reminds one of the heathen idea that the Germanic god Wotan has an eight-legged white horse, Sleipnir, and he not only has the horse but he is this white horse.

Thus the motif of the tale obviously goes back to heathen Germanic representation which survived and which points to Wotan.

You will notice that I tend to give the Germanic background to the motifs but I trust you will see as we progress how these connections really fit into our life story.

St. Niklaus later had a vision of a horse and not of a castle but of a tower, so that there is a close analogy with the boy in the above story.

In the fairy tale when the boy is fourteen years old he suddenly sees a castle and in it he discovers the divine white horse.

At the same age St. Niklaus saw the tower. As a boy St. Niklaus was very pious.

We would now characterize him as an introvert.

He used to evade other boys and, according to his biographers, he practiced good deeds, fasted on Fridays, and later extended his fast to four days a week and, from his early childhood during the forty days of Lent only ate a little bread and some dried pears.

He has been criticized by some for what has been called his masochistic tendencies, but he himself affirmed that he was obeying God.

A neighboring peasant, Erny an der Holden, reports that Klaus told him that at the age of sixteen he had a vision of a very high and beautiful tower in the place where he later had his hermitage and chapel, and that from that time on he had decided to lead a solitary life.

In old dialect the word "einig" means to be "alone", there is also the connotation of a single person, the person who should live a singled out existence, which is what Klaus did, and his tendency to introversion seems not to be in contrast to unconscious tendencies.

In Christian symbolism the tower is a symbol of God. Lavaud points out that in Psalm 61, David says that God is his shelter and strong tower.

The famous song of the Reformation was "God is my Tower". In Proverbs XVIII, 10, it is said "The name of the Lord is a strong tower: the righteous runneth into it and is safe".

Lavaud also connects the tower with the tower of Babel through which the people on earth were separated, while St. Niklaus' mission was to ensure that the Swiss people did not fall apart.

In Luke XIV, 26, Christ says: "If any man come to me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple," and later: "Whosoever does not bear his cross, and come after me, cannot be my disciple.

For which of you intending to build a tower, sitteth not down first, and counteth the cost, whether he have sufficient to finish it."

The idea of counting the cost, as interpreted by Lavaud, is that obviously the symbol of the tower means that if you want to follow Christ you cannot have the penny and the cake, but must give up certain other aspects of life such as the participation mystique with the family.

A sacrifice is required.

The tower therefore stands for the Christian life which is very costly.

We know that the process of individuation requires the breaking away from identity with the family and infantile dependence on family ties.

The tower is also said to be an allegory of the Church and of the Virgin Mary, it is a feminine maternal symbol.

St. Niklaus' mother was a very pious woman, some members of her family had become hermits, and one of Niklaus' uncles had become a "Wood Brother" and had built a little hermitage in the middle of the woods.

St. Niklaus had been there and had seen him and the lonely life he led and possibly this had influenced him.

The mother's brother is very often a personification of the mother's animus and therefore we might say that probably a certain pious and severe attitude of the mother's animus had a tremendous influence on the son's life.

Altogether he shows the characteristics of a typical mother's son.

Summing up, it can be said that the symbol of the tower has a double aspect and is very ambiguous for on the one side it is a defense mechanism and built to keep away enemies and stands, psychologically, for any introvert mechanism.

The introvert fears and is continually overwhelmed by the outer world and has the tendency to keep away from too many impressions which might weigh upon his soul, but this kind of attitude can easily become a prison for so much defense mechanism is put up that it becomes impossible to get out of one's own defenses - a neurotic situation in which the tower becomes an inner prison and an impenetrable isolation.

Animus possessed women often dream that they are imprisoned in a tower, they have imprisoned themselves in this neurotic defense mechanism and cannot get out of it.

Particularly, as long as you are afraid of the Self you feel as though you were imprisoned in it, for then you have the unfortunate subjective feeling that you are inescapably tied to yourself and you feel shut in.

The theme often appears in initial dreams in which people are imprisoned in their own isolation.

In this case there is too much narrowing of the personality.

But on the other side, Jung interprets the motif of the tower as a symbol of the Self, for the tower is also a protecting wall, a holy temenos.

It is an inner mechanism of the individual who wishes to protect his own inner growth.

We need to cut ourselves off from our surroundings in order to concentrate on inner growth.

The beginning process of individuation is often where you start to make a difference between yourself and your surroundings, thus protecting your inner personality so that it can develop undisturbed, though one feels cut out from participation mystique with one's surroundings.

St. Niklaus himself takes the tower to mean his lonely life and experiences it as a guiding symbol.

The aim of his life was to be like a tower himself and for this he had to restrict himself and sacrifice a certain amount of contacts.

It is amazing that he had such a vision at the age of puberty when there is generally a certain expansion towards the outer world and sexuality and what it means in the love life.

But just at the moment when normally nature tends towards expansion Niklaus has the vision of complete restriction and isolation as if a specific fate debarred him from following the usual development in life and emphasized, in a positive way, his isolation and loneliness.

I do not want to anticipate what follows, but what is the reason for this?

It must be connected in a way with the stability of his personality.

As you will see later, he evidently had tremendous temperament and was a highly emotional person; he had wilder and stronger emotions than the average and was perhaps even threatened by a schizophrenic explosion.

Jung believes, as you know, that schizophrenia is due to an affect explosion which acquires such strength that it destroys part of the personality.

St. Niklaus was obviously threatened by such a possibility and this great amount of emotion could have exploded his personality which may explain the vision of the tower at this time.

At the age of thirty St. Niklaus had no idea of becoming a saint.

He married a woman of a relatively good bourgeois family called Dorothy Wyss and his married life lasted for the next twenty years.

He was fifty when he began his life as a hermit and at that time had a family of ten children, the youngest of who was still a baby.

Thus at first he led the normal life of a peasant, and carried out all the usual small duties of village life and was even offered the position of "Landamman" (District Governor), but this he refused. He had also served as a soldier, had carried the banner, and eventually obtained a somewhat higher rank than that of a Captain.

He took part in some engagements in the war with Thurgau and also fought against Zurich at Thalwil on the Lake of Zurich. He hated war, but was a brave soldier.

He always did his best to save the churches as well as the women and children.

He was efficient in all his undertakings and was honoured and respected for his military and political abilities and the way he performed his duty in his outer life.

When between thirty-five and forty years old, in the midst of his life as a married man, St. Niklaus began to suffer from fits of depression and inner restlessness and it was during this time that he had most of the visions we know of.

Unfortunately, their sequence is not clearly established in the reports, but there are two types: some are concerned with the question of becoming a hermit and others with the general problems of his time.

The first type of vision, which has a more personal aspect, I will take first.

About his depressions, St. Niklaus himself says that God had submitted him to a terrible temptation which tormented him day and night and made him restless and that his heart was so troubled and the depression so great that sometimes even the company of his dear wife and children was tiresome to him.

During this time he had experiences of the devil, who began to attack him, but the Virgin Mary comforted him and he seems to have passed from one state to the other.

He describes one of these attacks as follows: He had gone to the Melchtal to cut the thorns in the meadow and the devil threw him down a slope with such force that he was badly hurt and fainted when picked up. His son, who had picked him up, said that when he recovered from the faint his father said that the devil had got him.

In this same period he told someone from a neighboring village that the devil had come to him riding on a beautiful horse and as well-dressed as a nobleman, and had told him that he should behave like other people and give up his asceticism for in that way he would not win eternal life.

It is obvious that at the time he must have been split and in conflict with himself and the devil seems to have advised him that he should not go on in this foolish and rather ambitious and pious attitude, but should behave like "normal" people and not wish to be especially pious.

When this nobleman appears on a horse and tells him to behave like other people, the vision does not say that he was the devil, that was his conscious interpretation, and is to me rather suspect, but also interesting since later three noblemen came in a vision and this time he thought they were the Holy Trinity.

It is rather arbitrary to say one thing at one time and something different another time, but this is typical for Christian consciousness.

Ignatius of Loyola did the same thing.

He thought he had had a divine appearance and then thought it must have been the devil and thereafter he started the Exercises.

Such arbitrary judgment shows a typically Christian attitude.

We may detach from it and take the vision as a dream of a modern person and ask ourselves what this nobleman means.

For a peasant, who did not belong to the nobility, it could be said that the nobleman represents "noblesse", the man of higher standards within himself.

Niklaus obviously was of a type to rise above his family rather than sink below it.

In a big family there is always a black sheep, one who drops to a lower level sociologically or morally, but very often there is the opposite: a child with a higher standard and the "white" sheep have as much trouble as the black in their loneliness.

This child may be abnormally intelligent and show all the aspects of good breeding, he may be a throwback to a former ancestor.

In Switzerland if you follow genealogical family histories you will find that the families go up and down in the social scale.

There is much more inter-marriage between the classes without sociological taboos.

St. Niklaus, from what we know from the description of the time, had a very aristocratic personality.

He was an impressive and well built man and gave the impression of someone of outstanding personality.

He was above the average of those among whom he was born.

It is noticeable that when he became a saint many nobly born people gathered round him, as though he were one of them, and a German nobleman built his hut beside him and became his adherent.

Therefore the nobleman of the dream personifies the possibility of his own inner development.

Then there is the paradox that he tells Niklaus not always to have ambitions to be especially holy, etc.

So it is just the nobleman who pushes him towards the more humble and adapted behavior towards his surroundings.

Psychologically I think we have here the phenomenon of the way in which younger people evaluate themselves.

Having for a long time taught young people between the ages or 16 and 19 in schools, I have observed some who have reached a high level but in the manifestation of their qualities have nothing to present, for they have not yet found their level of action.

They sometimes look down on their teachers as if they were more intelligent, and perhaps rightly, but if anyone says that they have not done anything in life they are humiliated, which arouses revolutionary reactions in them.

There is a disparity between the inner possibilities and the not yet manifested actions.

This is still a problem in a later age for people who have a vocation and have an inner call to achieve something special but have not yet found a chance or the right form for doing it: they swing between over-valuation and arrogance and criticism of their own surroundings and the opposite.

I am always inclined to take this as a symptom that the person has not yet found his or her field of action in which to show what they are and are not.

When you reach that then you touch your own limits and say I am as small as this and as big as that, and acquire a feeling for the attitude which is adequate to the situation.

It is a difficult stage because people are suspected of megalomania for they say: "I will show the world what I am!"

Though that is suspect, one has sometimes all the same the feeling that there is something to it.

From this vision it seems to me that St. Niklaus would not have needed the vision of becoming a saint had he not suddenly got into an ambitious pious attitude in which his ego prevented him from becoming an outstanding personality, but made him smaller instead of bigger, which explains the paradox of the nobleman - his really outstanding personality - who tells him to behave like other people.

However, as the unconscious told him something he did not like, he said it was the devil: Later the same nobleman appeared and he said he was God: What he could not accept was naturally the devil.

This motif alone would not be conclusive if we had not another vision of the same kind.

On one occasion when Klaus went to the meadow to cut the grass in the Melchi, his farm on the Alps, on the way he prayed to God asking for the grace of a pious life and suddenly he saw a cloud in the sky and a voice told him to submit to the will of God - that he was a foolish man and should be willing to do what God wanted of him.

Then he asks God to give him grace to follow Him and God says: “You foolish man, do it!"

The only explanation of such an experience seems to be that he and his unconscious have not the same idea of what following the will of God means.

One could say: "What you call being pious does not correspond with what God calls being pious."

This is a typical problem nowadays among people who still have a living faith.

Many of our analysands are atheists or have a non-religious attitude but in their unconscious there may be a religious attitude.

But there are others who have a conscious but insufficient religious attitude which does not help them because it is not in accordance with their instincts.

If their religion still meant something to them they would not need analysis, but they have a half and half attitude.

They have faith, but it is incomplete, they are split, and then the religious function which is a genuine instinct in the psyche is in contradiction with the conscious belief, which creates a very subtle problem.

Many values are still alive but in spite of this there are a number of complexes for the unconscious wants a different quality of religious attitude.

Sometimes it even goes so far that the analysis ends by proving to people that what they believed is really true, that is, through the inner experience people can suddenly really believe!

St. Niklaus was a pious Catholic in the medieval sense of the word.

The image of God in his unconscious tells him that he should become a pious man, but according to what God thinks, and not according to what his ego thinks.

Naturally he did not know what to make of such an experience.

As a naive person he tried to be pious and then God said: "You foolish man, be pious!"

We can understand that he became split and dissociated! It is not by chance that a voice comes out of a cloud, for the cloud generally holds a divine or mythological figure.

In mythology the nuptials of Zeus were veiled in a cloud; in the Apocalypse it is said: "Behold he cometh with clouds;" St. Luke speaks of "the Son of Man coming in a cloud with power and great glory," etc.

Clouds were also symbolically interpreted as products of the devil who wants to create the mist of the unconscious.

The devil lives in the North and blows clouds out of his mouth all the time. the cloud sometimes brings confusion and at other times hides the divine mystery.

You can say that it represents a content of the unconscious still very much a potentiality and completely indefinite, something in which consciousness cannot yet find its orientation.

If you have ever flown in a small airplane on a summer day, you will have seen fat small clouds.

The first time I flew towards them I thought I was going to hit something and put my hands to my head to protect it, but as soon as you come to them they disperse and you go through the mist.

That has always been a simile to me of how you experience the archetype.

If you speak of the archetype of "the wise old man" or "the terrible mother", you have a certain idea of what it is but when you begin to think intellectually of what that is psychologically, it becomes like a mist and shapeless.

If you try to pin down the meaning of an archetypal image in an intellectual way you feel lost.

That is why some people have a feeling that Jungian psychology is a way of using mysterious concepts, but this is not our desire.

If we could interpret an archetype more clearly we would do so but we are net able to get further yet.

We can say that the archetypes are in one way defined but we have to collect an amount of material and amplify instead of defining.

Thus the archetype often appears as a cloud.

Much later, St. Niklaus had a tremendous vision of God which nearly made him schizophrenic for a period.

The fact is that the cloud itself is already a manifestation of God, but it has no face yet and no definite shape, it is a veiled content.

The unconscious was very benevolent with him in not yet showing him what was behind they cloud, but protecting him from it.

We can see that he was in a difficult situation when he tried consciously to do the right thing and in spite of it was off the track because he did not know what his unconscious really wanted, and this was probably why he got depressions, for he was not at peace with himself. [1]About Franz: Remembering C. G. Jung-A Son’s Story

He [Franz Jung] suddenly turned and spoke to me directly, "Don’t you think it a bit strange that a young man should have and own a motorcycle without his parents knowing? But it was a very busy house!" Mary Dian Molton, About Franz: Remembering C. G. Jung-A Son’s Story, Page 42

He [Franz] also had a fine tweed suit, of which he was quite proud, and one day, alas, there was the inevitable accident, where both suit and motorcycle came to an unfortunate and irrevocable end.

The young owner escaped and managed to survive the tragedy with only a skinned knee.

The favorite aunt, sworn to secrecy, bandaged the knee.

Some two or three months later, Mother Emma asked whatever happened to the nice tweed suit, and solemn son said something about having outgrown it and hadn’t Mother noticed how tall he had become?

And then he mentioned that he had given away the suit to some shorter fellow that really needed it, since it no longer was "suit-able!"

Somehow, Mother accepted the tale. But then, it was a "very busy house!" as he again emphasized. Mary Dian Molton, About Franz: Remembering C. G. Jung-A Son’s Story, Page 42

Carl Jung Depth Psychology Quotations

Carl Jung: *CW 1 “Psychiatric Studies”

To be adapted is certainly an ideal, but adaptation is not always possible.

Emotion has a decomposing action on the mind, reduces its synthesis and makes it, for the moment, wretched. Emotions, especially depressive ones such as fear, disorganize the mental syntheses; their action, so to speak, is analytic, as opposed to that of the will, of attention, of perception, which is synthetic Carl Jung citing Janet, CW 1, Para 318

One of the marks of emotion is that it is accompanied by a decided lowering of the mental level. It brings about not only the loss of synthesis and the reduction to automatism, which is so noticeable in the hysteric, but proportionately to its strength it gradually suppresses the higher phenomena and lowers tension to the level of the so-called inferior phenomena. Under the influence of emotion, mental synthesis, attention, the acquisition of the new memories, are seen to disappear; with them diminish or disappear all the functions of reality, the feeling of and pleasure in reality, confidence and certitude. In place of these

we observe automatic movements Carl Jung citing Janet, CW 1, Para 319

Affects have a particularly deleterious effect on the memory Carl Jung, CW 1, Para 319

But this dissociative power which belongs to emotion is never more clearly displayed than in its effect on the memory. This dissociation can act on memories as they are produced and constitute continuous amnesia; it can also act suddenly on a group of memories already formed. Carl Jung citing Janet, CW 1, Para 319

Carl Jung: *CW 2 "Experimental Researches":

Distraction by surrounding objects is, as far as we know from our experience in psychopathology, a phenomenon that must be interpreted as the effect of emotion Carl Jung, CW 2, Para 298

In embarrassment or bewilderment, which are caused when the stimulus-word conjures up [in the word association test] emotionally charged ideas that the subject consciously or unconsciously tries to repress, the subject lets herself be completely distracted by externals and verbally reacts by simply naming an object from her surroundings Carl Jung, CW 2, Para 298

For psychoanalysis, the patient's mental condition is important, but still more important is the mental condition of the doctor Carl Jung, CW 2, Para 703

He [the doctor] who approaches a case with anything but absolute conviction is soon lost in the snares and traps laid by the complex of hysterical illness at whatever point he hopes to take hold of it Carl Jung, CW 2, Para 703

One has to know from the very beginning that everything in the hysteric is trying to prevent an exploration of the complex Carl Jung, CW 2, Para 703

After three [analytic] sessions a certain conclusion was reached, in so far as one could not avoid relating the obsessional idea that she had caused the death of her former pupil to the self-reproaches connected with the sexual stories [which she had revealed in earlier sessions] Carl Jung, CW 2, Para 713

The cement that holds the complex together is the feeling-tone common to all the individual ideas, in this case unhappiness Carl Jung, CW 2, Para 733

In our case the complex has the effect that the subject does not react by arbitrary or random connections of words but derives most of his reactions from the complex itself. The influence of the complex on thinking and behavior is called a constellation Carl Jung, CW2, Para 733

In accordance with the intensity of their emotions people's thinking and behavior are constellated by their complexes, and so are their associations Carl Jung, CW 2, Para 736

Where the complex temporarily replaces the ego, we see that a strong complex possesses all the characteristics of a separate personality. We are, therefore, justified in regarding a complex as somewhat like a small secondary mind, which deliberately (though unknown to consciousness) drives at certain intentions which are contrary to the conscious intentions of the individual Carl Jung, CW 2, Para 1352

Laughter is diagnostically important: it often indicates in psychoanalysis that a complex has been touched Carl Jung, CW 2, Para 816

It is obvious that no one but the patient demands anything that is too much. Freud says, "Many of my neurotic patients who are under psychoanalytic treatment are in the habit of confirming the fact by a laugh when I have succeeded in giving a faithful picture of their hidden unconscious to their conscious perception; and they laugh even when the content of what is unveiled would by no means justify this. This is subject, of course, to their having arrived close enough to the unconscious material to grasp it after the doctor has detected it and presented it to them" Carl Jung, CW 2, Para 816

The complex acts in a peculiar way upon the psyche; Janet has described it in an excellent manner in his book (Janet, Les Obsessions et la psychasthénie, 1903). The complex robs the ego of light and nourishment, just as a cancer robs the body of its vitality. Carl Jung, CW 2, Para 1067

Experience teaches us the close relation between complex and neurosis. We must assume that the complex is a thought material, which stands under special psychological conditions, because it can exert a pathogenetic influence Carl Jung, CW 2, Para 1352

This intention [of the subject] is disturbed by the interference of the complex, so that the association, contrary to expectation, is either turned from the sense of the complex or replaced by fragmentary allusions, or is in general so disturbed as to render the subject altogether unable to produce a reaction, although he may be unaware that the complex is independent of his intentions Carl Jung, CW 2, Para 1352

Nature has an apparatus that makes an extract of the complexes and brings them to consciousness in an unrecognizable and therefore harmless form: this is the dream Carl Jung, CW 2, Para 822

We know Freud's principle of the displacement from below upwards. What happens to the mouth (in dreams, in hysteria, in schizophrenia) happens to the genitals. If one eats, one puts something into the mouth Carl Jung, CW 2, Para 839

A patient in the early stage of dementia [schizophrenia] once expressed her wish-delirium by saying that the man she desired as her bridegroom fed her with a spoon, which made her pregnant and she had a child Carl Jung, CW 2, Para 839

The memory consists of a large number of single images; we therefore refer to it as a complex-image Carl Jung, CW 2, Para 891

The complex of these images is held together by a particular emotional tone, that is, by the effect of terror, the vibrations of which can continue gently for weeks or months and keep the image of terror fresh and vivid for that length of time Carl Jung, CW 2, Para 891

During the day work and other interests predominate, but from time to time these complexes make themselves felt through a faint and hardly recognizable unease or through slight feelings of anxiety, which seem to be unaccountable; at night they intrude into our dreams in a form the symbolism of which may be more or less pronounced Carl Jung, CW 2, Para 891

One of the chief characteristics of hysterical patients is the tendency to let themselves be carried away by everything, to fix their passion onto everything, and always promise too much and hence keep only a few of their promises. Patients with this symptom are, in my experience, always rather disagreeable Carl Jung, CW 2, Para 950

Another common peculiarity of hysterical patients that of taking everything personally, of never being able to be objective and of allowing themselves to be carried away by momentary impressions Carl Jung, CW 2, Para 953

The sensitivity (i.e., the excitability) of the emotions is greater in hysterical patients than in normal people. The hysterical patient suffers from an affect that he has been unable to conquer. The recognition of this is of the greatest importance in therapy Carl Jung, CW 2, Para 909

By his desire to supplement [in the word association test], the subject betrays a tendency to give the experimenter more than he wants; he actually labours in his attempts to find further ideas so as eventually to find something entirely satisfactory Carl Jung, CW 2, Para 950

Patients with this symptom are, in my experience, always rather disagreeable; at first they are enthusiastically enamored of the physician, for a time going so far as blindly to accept everything he says; but they soon fall into an equally blind resistance to him, thus rendering any psychological influence absolutely impossible Carl Jung, CW 2, Para 950

The complex acts in a peculiar way upon the psyche; Janet has described it in an excellent manner in his book (Janet, Les Obsessions et la psychasthénie, 1903). The complex robs the ego of light and nourishment, just as a cancer robs the body of its vitality Carl Jung, CW 2, Para 1067

Rise of morbid hysterical symptoms These results can also manifest themselves in associations, so that in hysterics we find clear manifestations of emotional constellations among the patient's associations Carl Jung, CW 2, Para 1067

The association experiment [word association test] provides the means of studying experimentally the behavior of the complex Carl Jung, CW 2, Para 1352

Experience teaches us the close relation between complex and neurosis. We must assume that the complex is a thought material, which stands under special psychological conditions, because it can exert a pathogenetic influence Carl Jung, CW 2, Para 1352

This intention [of the subject] is disturbed by the interference of the complex, so that the association, contrary to expectation, is either turned from the sense of the complex or replaced by fragmentary allusions, or is in general so disturbed as to render the subject altogether unable to produce a reaction, although he may be unaware that the complex is independent of his intentions Carl Jung, CW 2, Para 1352

Carl Jung: *CW 3 "Experimental Researches":

In general, the patient's degree of intelligence and education is of considerable importance for the prognosis Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 575

In cases of passing, acute intervals, or in the early stages of the disease, an explanatory discussion of the symptoms, especially of the psychotic contents, seems to me of the greatest value Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 575

Since fascination by archetypal contents is particularly dangerous, an explanation of their universal, impersonal meaning seems to me especially helpful, as opposed to the usual discussion of personal complexes Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 575

These complexes are the things that called forth the archaic reactions and compensations in the first place, and can obviously produce the same effects again at any time Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 575

Often, therefore, one must help the patient to detach his interest from these personal sources of excitation, at least temporarily, so as to give him a general orientation and a broader view of his confused situation Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 575

I have therefore made it a rule to give the intelligent patient as much psychological knowledge as he can stand. The more he knows in this respect, the better his whole prognosis will turn out, for if he is equipped with the necessary knowledge he can meet renewed irruptions of the unconscious with understanding and in this way assimilate the strange contents and integrate them into his conscious life. So in cases where the patients remember the content of their psychosis, I discuss it with them in detail and try to get them to understand it as thoroughly as possible Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 575

The introvert adapts to the world by means of a system Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 420

Insomnia is often due to uncontrollable complexes against which the auto-suggestive power of sleep is no longer effective Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 137

Thus the thought-complexes are dependent on a small fraction of clarity, for which reason they can manifest themselves only in vague, symbolic expressions and also get contaminated for lack of differentiation Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 137

We need not assume an actual censorship of dream thoughts in the Freudian sense;

the inhibition exerted by sleep-suggestion is a perfectly sufficient explanation Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 137

The autonomous complex can only "think" superficially and unclearly, i.e., symbolically, and the end-results (automatisms, constellations) which filter through into the activity of the ego-complex and into consciousness will be similarly constituted Carl Jung, CW3, Para 135

Even with ordinary therapeutic measures you can get the patient's mind at a sufficiently safe distance from the unconscious, for instance by inducing him to draw or paint a picture of his psychic situation. (Painting is rather more effective, since by means of the colors his feelings are drawn into the picture too) Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 562

The tremendum is spellbound by it, made harmless and familiar, and whenever the patient is reminded of his original experience by its menacing emotional effects, the picture he has made of it interposes itself between him and the experience and keeps his terror at bay Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 562

I have now, after long practical experience, come to hold the view that the psychogenic causation of the disease is more probable than the toxic causation Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 570

There are a number of mild and ephemeral but manifestly schizophrenic illnesses quite apart from the even more common latent psychoses which begin purely psychogenically, run an equally psychological course (aside from certain presumably toxic nuances) and can be completely cured by a purely psychotherapeutic procedure; I have seen this even in severe cases Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 570

The general picture of an [word] association test of a schizophrenic may be very similar to that of a neurotic, but closer examination shows that in a schizophrenic patient the connection between the ego and some of the complexes is more or less completely lost Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 506

The split is not relative, it is absolute. An hysterical patient might suffer from a persecution-mania very similar to real paranoia, but the difference is that in the former case one can bring the delusion back under the control of consciousness, whereas it is virtually impossible to do this in paranoia Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 506

A neurosis, it is true, is characterized by the relative autonomy of its complexes, but in schizophrenia the complexes have become disconnected and autonomous fragments, which either do not reintegrate back to the psychic totality, or, in the case of a remission, are unexpectedly joined together again as if nothing had happened Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 506

The unity of personality which, in a case of hysteria, lends a humanly understandable character to its own secondary personalities is definitely shattered into fragments Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 507

In a hysterical multiple personality there is a fairly smooth, even tactful, co-operation between the different persons, who keep to their respective roles and, if possible, do not bother each other Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 507

One feels the presence of an invisible spiritus rector, a central manager who arranges the stage for the different figures in an almost rational way, often in the form of a more or less sentimental drama Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 507

The picture of a personality dissociation in schizophrenia is quite different. The split-off figures assume banal, grotesque, or highly exaggerated names and characters, and are often objectionable in many other ways Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 508

On the contrary, they [the split-off personalities] break in and make a disturbance at any time, they torment the ego in a hundred ways. All are objectionable and shocking, either in their noisy and impertinent behavior or in their grotesque cruelty and obscenity Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 508

The autonomous figures have broken away from the control of the ego so thoroughly that their original participation in the patient's mental make-up has vanished Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 509

An abaissement can be produced by many causes: by fatigue, normal sleep, intoxication, fever, anaemia, intense affects, shocks, organic diseases of the central nervous system; likewise it can be induced by mass-psychology or a primitive mentality, or by religious and political fanaticism, etc. It can also be caused by constitutional and hereditary factors Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 513

Neuroses are specific consequences of an abaissement; as a rule they arise from a habitual or chronic form of it. Where they appear to be the effect of an acute form, a more or less latent psychological disposition always existed prior to the abaissement, so that the latter is no more than a conditional cause Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 515

The symptoms of Janet's abaissement du niveau mental are release of automatisms (thought-deprivation, pathological ideas) and reduction of attention. The consequence of this last is an incapacity for clear ideation. The ideas are indistinct, no proper differentiation takes place, and this leads to numerous confusions, condensations, contaminations, metaphors, etc. The condensations mostly follow the law of similarity of imagery or sound, so that meaningful connections largely disappear Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 300

There is no doubt that an abaissement which leads to a neurosis is produced either by exclusively psychological factors or by these in conjunction with other, perhaps more physical, conditions Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 516

A neurosis is a relative dissociation, a conflict between the ego and a resistant force based upon unconscious contents. These contents have more or less lost their connection with the psychic totality Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 516

They [the unconscious contents] form themselves into fragments, and the loss of them means a depotentiation of the conscious personality Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 516

The intense conflict, on the other hand, expresses an equally intense desire to re-establish the severed connection. There is no co-operation, but at least there is a violent conflict, which functions instead of a positive connection Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 516

Every neurotic fights for the maintenance and supremacy of his ego-consciousness and for the subjugation of the resistant unconscious forces Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 516

But a patient who allows himself to be swayed by the intrusion of strange contents from the unconscious, a patient who does not fight, who even identifies with the morbid elements, immediately exposes himself to the suspicion of schizophrenia Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 516

His [Schizophrenic] abaissement has reached the fatal, extreme degree, when the ego loses all power to resist the onslaught of an apparently more powerful unconscious. Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 516

Schizophrenia has a "psychology," i.e., a psychic causality and finality, just as normal mental life has, though with this important difference: whereas in the healthy person the ego is the subject of his experience, in the schizophrenic the ego is only one of the experiencing subjects. In other words, in schizophrenia the normal subject has split into a plurality of subject, or into plurality of autonomous complexes Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 498

The psychic mechanism that brings about the normal extinction and disintegration of consciousness in sleep is therefore a normal function which almost obeys our will. In schizophrenia it seems as if this function were set in motion in order to bring about that sleep-like condition in which consciousness is reduced to the level of dreams, or, in which dreams are intensified to a degree equalling that of consciousness Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 523

The simplest form of schizophrenia, of the splitting of the personality, is paranoia, the classic persecution-mania of the "persécuteur persécuté." It consists in a simple doubling of the personality, which in milder cases is still held together by the identity of the two egos Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 499

The schizophrenic may be pictured as a dreamer who walks about and acts like a person awake Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 174

The patient strikes us at first as completely normal. He may hold office or be in a lucrative position we suspect nothing. We converse normally with him, and at some point, for example, we let fall the word "Freemason" Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 499

Suddenly the jovial face before us changes, a piercing look full of abysmal mistrust and inhuman fanaticism meets us from his eye. He has become a hunted, dangerous animal, surrounded by invisible enemies: the other ego has risen to the surface Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 499

What has happened? Obviously at some time or other the idea of being a persecuted victim gained the upper hand, became autonomous, and formed a second subject which at times completely replaced the healthy ego Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 500

It is characteristic that neither of the two subjects can fully experience the other, although the two personalities are not separated by a belt of unconsciousness as they are in an hysterical dissociation of the personality Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 500

They know each other intimately, but they have no valid arguments against one an- other Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 500

The healthy ego cannot counter the affectivity of the other, for at least half its affectivity has gone over into its opposite number. It is, so to speak, paralysed This is the beginning of that schizophrenic "apathy" which can best be observed in paranoid dementia Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 500

Dreams are due to an incomplete extinction of consciousness, or to a somewhat excited state of the unconscious which interferes with sleep Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 524

Sleep is disturbed if too many remnants of consciousness go on stirring, or if there are unconscious contents with too great an energy-charge, for then they rise above the threshold and create a relatively conscious state Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 524

Hence it is better to explain many dreams as the remnants of conscious impressions, while others derive directly from unconscious sources which have never been conscious Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 524

Dreams of the first type [remnants of conscious impressions] have a personal character and conform to the rules of a personalistic psychology Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 524

Dreams of the second type [from unconscious sources] have a collective character, inasmuch as they contain peculiarly mythological, legendary, or generally archaic imagery. One must turn to historical or primitive symbology in order to explain such dreams Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 524

The dissociation in schizophrenia is not only far more serious [than a Neurosis] but very often irreversible The dissociation is no longer fluid and changeable as it is in a neurosis. It is more like a mirror broken up into splinters Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 507

Each figure has a suggestive name and an admissible character, and they are just as nicely hysterical and just as sentimentally biased as the patient's own consciousness Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 507

They [the figures] do not, moreover, co-operate with the patient's consciousness. They are not tactful and they have no respect for sentimental values Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 508

On the contrary, they [the split-off personalities] break in and make a disturbance at any time, they torment the ego in a hundred ways. All are objectionable and shocking, either in their noisy and impertinent behavior or in their grotesque cruelty and obscenity Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 508

There is an apparent chaos of incoherent visions, voices, and characters, all of an overwhelmingly strange and incomprehensible nature Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 508

If there is a drama at all, it is certainly far beyond the patient's understanding. In most cases it transcends even the physician's comprehension, so much so that he is inclined to suspect the mental sanity of anybody who sees more than plain madness in the ravings of a lunatic Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 508

The healthy ego cannot counter the affectivity of the other, for at least half its affectivity has gone over into its opposite number. It is, so to speak, paralysed. This is the beginning of that schizophrenic "apathy" which can best be observed in paranoid dementia Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 500

The patient can assure you with the greatest indifference: "I am the triple owner of the world, the finest Turkey, the Lorelei, Germania and Helvetia of exclusively sweet butter and Naples and I must supply the whole world with macaroni." All this without a blush, and with no flicker of a smile Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 500

Anyone who observes himself, carefully and unsparingly, will know that there is something within him which would gladly hide and cover up all that is difficult and questionable in life, in order to smooth a path for itself Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 385

Insanity gives it a free hand. And once it has gained ascendency, reality is veiled, more quickly or less; it becomes a distant dream, but the dream becomes a reality which holds the patient enchained, wholly or in part, often for the rest of his life Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 385

We healthy people, who stand with both feet in reality, see only the ruin of the patient in this world, but not the richness of that side of the psyche which is turned away from us Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 385

Unfortunately only too often no further knowledge reaches us of the things that are being played out on the dark side of the soul [in the insane], because all the bridges have broken down which connect that side with this Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 385

One of them comprises all those forms of illness which are commonly designated "hysterical"; the other all those forms which the French school calls "psychasthenic" Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 418

Although the line of demarcation is rather uncertain, one can mark off two psychological types which in themselves are quite distinct because their psychology is diametrically opposed. I have called these the introverted and extraverted types Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 418

The hysteric belongs to the extraverted type, the psychasthenic to the introverted type, and so, to the best of our knowledge, does the schizophrenic. The terms introversion and extraversion are dependent on my energic conception of psychic phenomena. Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 418

I postulate a hypothetical, fundamental striving which I call libido Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 418

In accordance with the classical usage of the word, libido does not have an exclusively sexual connotation as it has in medicine Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 418

Libido is intended as an energic expression for psychological values. A psychological value is something that has an effect; hence it can be considered from the energic standpoint without any pretence of exact measurement Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 418

There seems to be a certain intellectual weakness which expresses itself in a tendency to give definitions, though unlike the same tendency in imbeciles it does not strive for generalization but defines the content of the stimulus-words in terms of the complex Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 208

Characteristic is the extraordinary stilted and affected manner of expression, sometimes verging on the incomprehensible Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 208

The clumsy and peculiar-sounding definitions of imbeciles occur at unexpected places which happen to hit the complex Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 208

In normal people and hysterics we find striking or linguistically odd reactions always at the critical places, and especially words from foreign languages. These correspond here to the neologisms, which are nothing but peculiarly forceful and ponderous expressions of thought-complexes Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 208

We can also understand why a patient describes her neologisms as "power-words." Whenever they appear they hint at the whole system hidden behind them, just as technical terms do in normal speech Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 208

This [the complex] constellates most of the associations and expresses itself above all in the affectation, whose sole purpose is to emphasize the value of the personality. To that extent it is a normal and familiar aid to self-complacency. Here it is exaggerated in accordance with the patient's morbidly intensified self-esteem Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 211

Hand in hand with the exaggerated affectation go exaggerated ideas of grandeur which, because of their contrast with reality and the affected, barely intelligible way they are expressed have something grotesque about them Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 211

We find this phenomenon in normal people whose self-esteem is at odds with their intelligence and outward situation. In the patient it is primarily a question of exaggeration and the corresponding strong affect it indicates. What exceeds the normal mechanism is the barely intelligible and unadapted manner of expression, which suggests an impairment of the underlying concepts Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 211

The complex of personal grandeur expresses itself also in the patient's unsuitable demands and wishes Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 211

Neuroses are specific consequences of an abaissement; as a rule they arise from a habitual or chronic form of it. Where they appear to be the effect of an acute form, a more or less latent psychological disposition always existed prior to the abaissement, so that the latter is no more than a conditional cause Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 515

The symptoms of Janet's abaissement du niveau mental are release of automatisms (thought-deprivation, pathological ideas) and reduction of attention. The consequence of this last is an incapacity for clear ideation. The ideas are indistinct, no proper differentiation takes place, and this leads to numerous confusions, condensations, contaminations, metaphors, etc. The condensations mostly follow the law of similarity of imagery or sound, so that meaningful connections largely disappear Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 300

Hypnosis represses the hysterical complex and leads to the reproduction of the ego- complex Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 163

In schizophrenia, when we are not actually dealing with marked excitement accompanied by deep confusion, we often get the impression that the patients are disturbed merely by illusions but that at bottom they are correctly oriented Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 163

Lucidity of consciousness is especially often impaired in the acute stage of the disease, when the patients are in a real dream, i.e., in a "complex-delirium" Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 163

Hallucinations are simply the outward projection of psychic elements. Clinically we know all gradations, from inspirations and pathological ideas to loud auditory hallucinations and vivid visions Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 180

Hallucinations are ubiquitous. Schizophrenia merely sets in motion a preformed mechanism which normally functions in dreams Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 180

The hallucinations of hysteria, like those of dreams, contain symbolically distorted fragments of the complex Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 180

If there is a very strong complex, all progress adapted to the environment ceases and the associations revolve entirely round the complex. By and large this is what happens in hysteria, where we find very strong complexes Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 184

The progress of the personality is retarded, and a large part of the psychic activity is expended in varying the complex in all possible ways (symptomatic actions). Not for nothing does Janet call attention to the general disturbances in "obsessed" persons, of which I mention the following: indolence, irresolution, retardation, fatigue, lack of achievement, aboulia, inhibition Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 184

If a complex succeeds in becoming fixed, monotony results, especially monotony of the outward symptoms Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 184

Why does not know the stereotyped, exhausting complaints of hysterics and the stubborn, invincible nature of their symptoms? Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 184

Just as a constant pain will always call forth the same monotonous cries of distress, so a fixed complaint will gradually stereotype the individual's whole mode of expression, so that in the end we know that day after day we shall receive with mathematical accuracy the same answer to the same question Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 184

There seems to be a certain intellectual weakness which expresses itself in a tendency to give definitions, though unlike the same tendency in imbeciles it does not strive for generalization but defines the content of the stimulus-words in terms of the complex Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 208

Among the characterological disturbances in schizophrenia [dementia praecox] we might mention affectation (mannerisms, eccentricity, mania for originality, etc.). We frequently meet this symptom in hysteria, especially when patients find themselves out of their social element Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 154

A very common form of this affectation is the pretentious and artificial behavior of women of a lower social position dressmakers, nurses, maids, etc. Who mix with those socially above them, and also of men who are dissatisfied with their social status and try to give themselves at least the appearance of a better education or of a more imposing position Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 154

The affectation, in itself, contains nothing specific of schizophrenia. The disease takes over the mechanism from the normal, or rather from the caricature of the normal, hysteria Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 155

Such patients have a special predilection for neologisms, which they used mostly as learned or otherwise distinguished-sounding technical terms Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 155

One of my women patients called them "power-words," and showed a special liking for the most abstruse expressions, which obviously seemed to her fraught with meaning Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 155

The "power-words" serve among other things to emphasize the personality and to make it as imposing as possible Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 155

The emphasis laid on "power-words" accentuates the value of the personality in the face of doubt and hostility, and for this reason they are frequently used as defensive and exorcistic formulae Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 155

The affectation also expresses itself in gesture and handwriting, the latter being adorned with all kinds of peculiar flourishes Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 156

Normal analogies can be found in young girls who, out of caprice, affect an especially striking or original script Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 156

The same thing can be seen in temperamental hysterics, and it is often easy to show that the change in writing begins at the place where the complex is touched. Even with normal people one can often see disturbances at such places Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 156

We do not always have this impression in hysteria, though we can see for ourselves that correct orientation does exist by hypnotizing the patient Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 163

As in hysteria the disorientation is due to a pathogenic complex momentarily pushing aside the ego-complex, so in schizophrenia it may easily happen that quite clear answers are followed the next moment by the most extraordinary utterances Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 163

A strong complex, for instance, a nagging worry hinders concentration. We are unable to tear ourselves away from it and direct our activity and interest into other channels Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 109

Or if we try to tear ourselves away in order to "forget our worries," we succeed perhaps for a short time but we do it only "half-heartedly". Without our knowing it, the complex prevents us from giving ourselves wholly to the task in hand Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 109

We succumb to all kinds of inhibitions. In the pauses of thought ("thought-deprivation") fragments of the complex appear and, as in the word association experiment, cause characteristic disturbances in the intellectual performance Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 109

We make slips of the pen in accordance with the rules of Meringer and Mayer, we produce condensations, perseverations, anticipations, etc., and Freudian errors which reveal by their content the determining complex Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 109

Our slips of the tongue occur at the critical places, that is, when we say words that have a significance for the complex Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 109

We make mistakes in reading because we think we see the complex-words in the text where frequently these words appear in the peripheral field of vision (Bleuler) Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 109

In the midst of our "distracting" occupations we catch ourselves singing or whistling a certain melody. The words, which we have great difficulty in remembering, are a complex constellation Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 109

We may be haunted all day by an obsession, by a melody or a word that is always on the tip of our tongue. These too are complex constellations Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 109

Or we make doodles on paper or on the table which are not difficult to interpret in terms of the complex Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 109

Wherever the disturbances caused by the complex express themselves in words we find displacements by clang similarities or by combinations of phrases Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 109

Melodic automatisms show us once again how repressed thoughts are disguised Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 117

We know that singing and whistling often accompany activities which do not require full "investment of attention" (Freud) Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 117

The residual attention is therefore relating to the complex, but the purposive activity prevents the complex from becoming clear, it can only show itself instinctively, as for instance in the melodic automatisms that contain the thought complex in the usual metaphorical form Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 117

Every affective event becomes a complex. If it [an affective event] does not encounter a related and already existing complex and is only of momentary significance, it gradually sinks with decreasing feeling-tone into the latent mass of memories, where it remains until a related impression reproduces it again Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 140

But if it [the affective event] encounters an already existing complex, it reinforces it and helps it to gain the upper hand for a while Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 140

The clearest examples of this can be seen in hysteria, where apparent trifles may lead to tremendous outbursts of affect. In such cases the impression has impinged, either directly or symbolically, on the insufficiently repressed complex and thereby evoked a veritable storm, which considering the insignificance of the event often seems altogether disproportionate Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 140

We also find that the strongest feelings and impulses are connected with the strongest complexes Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 140

It is therefore not surprising that the majority of complexes are of an erotic-sexual nature, as also are most dreams and most of the hysterias Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 140

Every affective event becomes a complex. If it [an affective event] does not encounter a related and already existing complex and is only of momentary significance, it gradually sinks with decreasing feeling-tone into the latent mass of memories, where it remains until a related impression reproduces it again Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 140

But if it [the affective event] encounters an already existing complex, it reinforces it and helps it to gain the upper hand for a while Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 140

The clearest examples of this can be seen in hysteria, where apparent trifles may lead to tremendous outbursts of affect. In such cases the impression has impinged, either directly or symbolically, on the insufficiently repressed complex and thereby evoked a veritable storm, which considering the insignificance of the event often seems altogether disproportionate Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 140

The affectation, in itself, contains nothing specific of schizophrenia. The disease takes over the mechanism from the normal, or rather from the caricature of the normal, hysteria Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 155

Such patients have a special predilection for neologisms, which they used mostly as learned or otherwise distinguished-sounding technical terms Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 155

A schizophrenic patient under my care, if the doctors refused him anything, used to threaten them with the words: "I, the Grand Duke Mephisto, shall have you treated with blood vengeance for orangutan representations" Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 155

Schizophrenic patients frequently have a characteristic handwriting: it expresses the contradictory tendencies in their psyche, the script being now sloping and cursive, now upright, now large, now small Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 156

Since, for many people, the sexual complex cannot be acted out in a natural way, it makes use of by-ways Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 105

During puberty it takes the form of more or less abnormal sexual fantasies, frequently alternating with phases of religious enthusiasm (displacements) Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 105

In men, sexuality, if not acted out directly, is frequently converted into a feverish professional activity or a passion for dangerous sports, etc., or into some learned hobby, such as a collecting mania. Women take up some kind of philanthropic work, which is usually determined by the special form of the complex Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 105

They devote themselves to nursing in hospitals where there are young assistant physicians, or they develop strange eccentricities, a prim, affected behavior which is meant to express distinction and proud resignation Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 105

There is, however, one very common displacement, and that is the disguising of a complex by the superimposition of a contrasting mood. We frequently meet this phenomenon in people who have to banish some chronic worry Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 105

Women betray themselves by a shrill, aggressive gaiety, men by sudden alcoholic and other excesses (also fugues) Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 105

These displacements and disguises may, as we know, produce real double personalities, such as have always excited the interest of psychological writers (cf. the recurrent problem in Goethe of "two souls," and among the moderns Hermann Bahr, Gorky, and others) Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 105

"Double personality" is not just a literary phrase, it is a scientific fact of general interest to psychology and psychiatry, especially when it manifests itself in the form of double consciousness or dissociation of the personality. Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 105

It sometimes happens that the displacement gradually becomes stable and superficially at least replaces the original character Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 106

Everyone knows people who, judged externally, are enormously gay and entertaining. Inwardly, and sometimes even in private life, they are sullen grumblers nursing an old wound Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 106

Often their [the grumbler's] true nature suddenly bursts through the artificial covering, the assumed blithesomeness vanishes at a stroke, and we are confronted with a different person Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 106

A single word, a gesture, if it touches the sore spot, reveals the complex lurking in the depths of the psyche Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 106

We succumb to all kinds of inhibitions. In the pauses of thought ("thought-deprivation") fragments of the complex appear and, as in the word association experiment, cause characteristic disturbances in the intellectual performance Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 109

We may be haunted all day by an obsession, by a melody or a word that is always on the tip of our tongue. These too are complex constellations Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 109

Wherever the disturbances caused by the complex express themselves in words we find displacements by clang similarities or by combinations of phrases Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 109

Melodic automatisms show us once again how repressed thoughts are disguised Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 117

The residual attention is therefore relating to the complex, but the purposive activity prevents the complex from becoming clear, it can only show itself instinctively, as for instance in the melodic automatisms that contain the thought complex in the usual metaphorical form Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 117

Besides this special form of sexual complex, which I have chosen as a paradigm for didactic reasons, since it is the commonest and best-known form of obsessional complex, there are naturally many other kinds of sexual complexes which can exert an equally strong influence Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 104

Among women the complexes of unrequited or otherwise hopeless love are very common. Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 104

Here we find an exceedingly strong complex-sensitiveness. The slightest hint from the other sex is assimilated to the complex and elaborated with complete blindness for even the weightiest arguments to the contrary Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 104

An insignificant remark of the adored is construed as a powerful subjective proof of his love. The chance interests of the intended become the starting-point for similar interests on the woman's part symptomatic action which rapidly disappears when the wedding finally takes place or if the object of adoration changes Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 104

The complex-sensitiveness also shows itself in an unusual sensitiveness to sexual stimuli, which appears particularly in the form of prudery Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 104

Those obsessed by the complex ostentatiously avoid in their younger years everything that could remind them of sex the well-known "innocence" of grown-up daughters Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 104

Although they know where everything is and what it means, their whole behavior gives the impression that they never had an inkling of things sexual Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 104

If one has to inquire into these matters for medical reasons, one thinks at first that one is on virgin soil, but one soon finds that all the necessary knowledge is there, except that the patient does not know where she got it from Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 104

In later years the prudery often becomes unbearable, or the patient displays a naïve symptomatic interest in all sorts of natural situations in which one "may now take an interest because one is past the age" and so on Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 104

The objects of this symptomatic interest are brides, pregnancies, births, scandals, and so on Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 104

The fine nose of elderly ladies for these matters is proverbial. They are passed off as "objective, purely human interest" Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 104

In men, sexuality, if not acted out directly, is frequently converted into a feverish professional activity or a passion for dangerous sports, etc., or into some learned hobby, such as a collecting mania Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 105

Women take up some kind of philanthropic work, which is usually determined by the special form of the complex Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 105

The first group is best illustrated by the legend of Ramón Lully, who, as a gallant adventurer, had long courted a lady. Finally the longed-for billet arrived, inviting him to a midnight assignation. Lully, full of expectation, came to the appointed place, and as he approached the lady, who was awaiting him, she suddenly threw open her robe and uncovered her cancer-eaten bosom. This episode made such an impression on Lully that from then on he devoted his life to pious asceticism Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 89

There are impressions which last a lifetime. The lasting effects of strong religious impressions or of shattering experiences, which are well known Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 90

The effects are particularly strong in youth. Indeed, the whole aim of education is to implant lasting complexes in the child Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 90

The durability of a complex is guaranteed by its continually active feeling-tone. If the feeling-tone is extinguished, the complex is extinguished with it Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 90

The persistence of a feeling-tone complex naturally has the same constellating effect on the rest of the psychic activities as an acute affect. Whatever suits the complex is assimilated, everything else is excluded or at least inhibited. The best examples of this can be seen in religious convictions Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 90

There is no argument, no matter how threadbare, that is not advanced if it is pro, while on the other hand the strongest and most plausible arguments contra make no impression; they simply bounce off, because emotional inhibitions are stronger than all logic Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 90

Even in quite intelligent people who have considerable education and experience, one can sometimes observe a real blindness, a true systematic anaesthesia, when one tries to convince them, say of the theory of determinism. And how often does a single unpleasant impression produce in some people an unshakable false judgment, which no logic, no matter how cogent, can dislodge! Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 90

The effects of the complex extend, however, not only to thought but to action, which is continually forced in a quite definite direction Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 91

For instance, many people unthinkingly perform religious rites and all kinds of groundless actions despite the fact that intellectually they have long since out grown them Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 91

The second group of chronic effects of the complex, where the feeling-tone is constantly maintained by active stimuli, affords the best examples of complex constellations Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 92

The strongest and most lasting effects are seen above all in sexual complexes, where the feeling-tone is constantly maintained, for instance by unsatisfied sexual desire Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 92

A glance at the legends of the saints, or at Zola's novels Lourdes or The Dream, will provide numerous examples of this. Yet the constellations are not always quite so crude and obvious, often they are more subtle influences, masked by symbolisms, that sway our thoughts and actions Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 92

Complexes are mostly in a state of repression because they are concerned as a rule with the most intimate secrets which are anxiously guarded and which the subject either will not or cannot divulge Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 93

Even under normal conditions the repression may be so strong that the subject has an hysterical amnesia for the complex. That is, he has the feeling that some idea, some significant association, is coming up, but a vague hesitation keeps the reproduction back. He feels he wants to say something, but it slips away again immediately. What has slipped away is the thought-complex Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 93

The most trivial objects are guarded like priceless jewels, so far as they relate to the complex; his whole environment is viewed sub specie amoris Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 102

Anything that does not suit the complex simply glances off, all the other interests sink to nothing, there is a standstill and temporary atrophy of the personality Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 102

Only what suits the complex arouses affects and is assimilated by the psyche. All thoughts and actions tend in the direction of the complex; whatever cannot be constrained in the direction is repudiated, or is performed perfunctorily without emotion and without care Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 102

In attending to indifferent matters the most extraordinary compromise formations are produced; slips of the pen referring to the erotic complex creep into business letters, suspicious slips of the tongue occur in speaking Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 102

The flow of objective thought is constantly interrupted by invasions from the complex, there are long gaps in one's thought which are filled out with erotic episodes Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 102

The foregoing well-known paradigm [paragraph "s" above] shows clearly the effect of a strong complex on a normal psyche. We see how the psychic energy applies itself wholly to the complex at the expense of the other psychic material, which in consequence remains unused. All stimuli that do not suit the complex undergo a partial apperceptive degeneration with emotional impoverishment Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 103

Even the feeling-tone becomes inappropriate: trifles such as ribbons, pressed flowers, snapshots, billets doux, a lock of hair, etc., are cherished with the greatest care, while vital questions are often dismissed with a smile or with complete indifference Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 103

On the other hand the slightest remark even remotely touching on the complex instantly arouses a violent outburst of anger or pain which may assume pathological proportions Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 103

If we had no means of feeling our way into the psyche of a normal person in love, his behavior would seem to us that of an hysteric or a catatonic Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 103

In hysteria, where the complex-sensitiveness is far greater than normal, we have almost no means of feeling our way, and must laboriously accustom ourselves to intuiting the meaning of the hysterical affects. This is quite impossible in catatonia, perhaps because we still know too little about hysteria Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 103

Every molecule participated in this feeling-tone, so that, whether it appears by itself or in conjunction with others, it always carries this feeling-tone with it, and it does this with the greater distinctness the more distinctly we can see its connection with the complex-situation as a whole Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 80

This behavior may be compared directly to Wagnerian music. The leitmotiv, as a sort of feel-tone, denotes a complex of ideas which is essential to the dramatic structure Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 80

Each time one or the other complex is stimulated by something someone does or says, the relevant leitmotiv is sounded in one of its variants Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 80

It is exactly the same in ordinary psychic life: the leitmotivs are the feeling-tones of our complexes, our actions and moods are modulations of the leitmotivs Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 80

Large complexes are always strongly feeling-toned and, conversely, strong affects always leave behind very large complexes Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 87

This is due simply to the fact that on the one hand complexes include numerous somatic innervations, while on the other hand strong affects constellate a great many associations because of their powerful and persistent stimulation of the body Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 87

Normally, affects can go on working indefinitely (in the form of stomach and heart troubles, insomnia, tremors, etc.) Gradually, however, they subside, the ideas relating to the complex disappear from consciousness, and only in dreams do they occasionally manifest themselves in more or less disguised hints Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 87

But complexes continue to show themselves for years in the characteristic disturbances they produce in a person's associations Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 87

Their gradual extinction is marked by one general psychological peculiarity: their readiness to reappear in almost full strength as a result of similar though much weaker stimuli Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 87

It is certain that the symptoms of negativism should not be regarded as anything clear and definite Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 27

In our view, negativism always depends ultimately on negative associations. Whether there is also a negativism that is enacted in the spinal cord I do not know Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 27

The broadest view on the question of negativism is the one taken by Bleuler, who shows that "negative suggestibility," or the compulsion to produce contrary associations, is not only a constituent of the normal psyche but a frequent mechanism of pathological symptoms in hysteria, obsessional states, and schizophrenia [dementia praecox] Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 27

The contrary mechanism is a function existing independently of the normal associative activity and is rooted entirely in "affectivity"; hence it is actuated chiefly by strongly feeling-toned ideas, decisions, etc. Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 27

"The mechanism is meant to guard against precipitate action and to force one to weigh the pros and cons." The contrary mechanism acts as a counterbalance to suggestibility Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 27

Suggestibility is the capacity to accept and put into effect strongly feeling-toned ideas. The contrary mechanism does just the opposite. Bleuler's term "negative suggestibility" is therefore fitting Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 27

Pelletier compares the superficial course of association in schizophrenia [dementia praecox] to flight of ideas Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 22

Characteristic of flight of ideas is the "absence of any directing principle" Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 22

The same is true of the course of association in schizophrenia [dementia praecox]: The directing idea is absent and the state of consciousness remains vague without any order in its elements Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 22

The only mode of psychic activity which in the normal state can be compared to mania is the daydream, although daydreaming is more the mode of thinking of the feeble-minded than of the manic (Madeleine Pelletier, pp. 116, 123, 118) Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 22

Pelletier is right in seeing a great resemblance between normal daydreaming and the superficial associations of manics, but that is true only when the associations are written down on paper Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 22

Clinically, however, the manic does not at all resemble a dreamer Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 22

The richness and acceleration of thought in manic flight of ideas can be sharply differentiated from the sluggish, often halting course of association in the dreamy type, and particularly from the poverty of associations in catatonics, with their numerous perseverations Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 22

The analogy is correct only in so far as the directing idea is absent in all these cases; in manics because all the ideas crowd into consciousness with marked acceleration and great intensity of feeling, which probably accounts for the absence of attention Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 22

In daydreaming there is no attention from the outset, and wherever this is absent the course of association must sink to the level of a dream-state, to a slow progression according to the laws of association and tending mainly towards similarity, contrast, coexistence, and verbal-motor combinations Carl Jung, CW 3, Para 22

Every affective event becomes a complex. C.G. Jung, CW 3, par. 140

Carl Jung: *CW 4 “Freud and Psychoanalysis”

Error is just as important a condition of life’s progress as truth. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 451

I may now add that civilization is a process in the service of Eros, whose purpose is to combine single human individuals, and after that families, then races, peoples and nations, into one great unity, the unity of mankind. Sigmund Freud, Civilization and Its Discontents, Page 118

That day saw the death of my connection with therapy by suggestion; the notoriety aroused by this case shamed and depressed me. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 581

If only one did not have a scientific conscience and that hankering after the truth! Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 582.

I even hold it to be an indispensable prerequisite that the psychoanalyst should first submit himself to the analytical process, as his personality is one of the main factors in the cure. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 586

To anticipate a possible objection, let me say at once that I did not give up hypnosis because I wanted to avoid dealing with the basic forces of the human psyche, but because I wanted to battle with them directly and openly. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 601

I strive not to be a fanatic—though there are not a few who accuse me of fanaticism. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 602

There are cases where psychoanalysis works worse than any other method. But who has ever claimed that psychoanalysis should be used always and everywhere? Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 604

Do not forget that Kepler once cast horoscopes for money, and that countless artists are condemned to work for a living wage. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 607

The relativity of "truth" has been known for ages and does not stand in the way of anything, and if it did would merely prevent belief in dogmas and authority. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 620

So-called chance is the law and order of psychoanalysis. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 625

With the unintelligent and bigoted ones [patents] you begin quietly with the analysis. In the unconscious of such folk you have a confederate who never lets you down. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 627

When the conscious material is exhausted you go on to dreams, which give you the subliminal material. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 628

As to the question of morality and education, let me say that these things belong to a later stage of the analysis, when they find—or should find—their own solution. You cannot make recipes out of psychoanalysis! Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 631

Again, psychoanalysis is not a method of examination in the nature of an intelligence test, though this mistake is common in certain circles. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 622

Psychoanalysis is a method which makes possible the analytical reduction of psychic contents to their simplest expression, and for discovering the line of least resistance in the development of a harmonious personality. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 623

My only working rule is to conduct the analysis as a perfectly ordinary, sensible conversation, and to avoid all appearance of medical magic. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 624

So-called chance is the law and order of psychoanalysis. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 625

With the unintelligent and bigoted ones you begin quietly with the analysis. In the unconscious of such folk you have a confederate who never lets you down. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 627

If people have no dreams, as they allege, or forget them, there is usually still some conscious material that ought to be produced and discussed but is kept back owing to resistances. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 628

If the analyst demands that his patient shall get well out of love for him, the patient may easily reckon on reciprocal services, and will without doubt try to extort them. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 639

Man as a herd-animal, too, has not by any manner of means to subordinate himself to laws imposed from without; he carries his social imperatives within himself, a priori, as an inborn necessity. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 641

Psychoanalysis is only a means for removing the stones from the path of development, and not a method (as hypnotism often claims to be) of putting things into the patient that were not there before. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 648

The art of analysis lies in following the patient on all his erring ways and so gathering his strayed sheep together. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 643

Experience has convinced me that patients rapidly begin to make use of ideas picked up from psychoanalysis, as is also apparent in their dreams. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 645

The analyst must exercise all possible care and self-criticism not to let himself be led astray by his patient's dreams. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 649

I can only gaze with wonder and awe at the depths and heights of our psychic nature. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 784

The third phase is the adult period from puberty on and may be called the period of maturity. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 265

Religions are the great-healing systems for the ills of the soul. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 751

There are experiences which one must go through and for which reason is no substitute. Such experiences are often of inestimable value to the patient. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 446

It is a favourite neurotic misunderstanding that the right attitude to the world is found by indulgence in sex. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 440

It is in very truth the eternally living, creative, germinal layer in each of us, and though it may make use of age-old symbolical images it nevertheless intends them to be understood in a new way. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 760

Concrete values cannot take the place of the symbol; only new and more effective symbols can be substituted for those that are antiquated and outworn and have lost their efficacy through the progress of intellectual analysis and understanding. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 680

There are experiences which one must go through and for which reason is no substitute. Such experiences are often of inestimable value to the patient. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 446.

Naturally a new meaning does not come ready made out of the unconscious, like Pallas Athene springing fully armed from the head of Zeus; a living effect is achieved only when the products of the unconscious are brought into serious relationship with the conscious mind. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 760

The psyche does not merely react; it gives its own specific answer to the influences at work upon it. Carl Jung, CW 4; para 667

My consciousness is like an eye that penetrates to the most distant spaces, yet it is the psychic non-ego that fills them with non-spatial images. And these images are not pale shadows, but tremendously powerful psychic factors. Carl Jung, CW 4, Page 331f.

In the past nothing can be altered, and in the present little, but the future is ours and capable of raising life's intensity to the highest pitch. A little span of youth belongs to us, all the rest belongs to our children. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 668

I visualize the process of abstraction as a withdrawal of libido from the object, as a backflow of value from the object into a subjective, abstract content. For me, therefore, abstraction amounts to an energic devaluation of the object. In other words, abstraction is an introverting movement of libido. Carl Jung; CW 4; par. 679.

The belief, the self-confidence, perhaps also the devotion with which the analyst does his work, are far more important to the patient (imponderabilia though they may be), than the rehearsing of old traumata. Carl Jung; CW 4; par. 584.

We do not work with the "transference to the analyst," but against it and in spite of it. Carl Jung, CW 4, par. 601.

Man brings with him at birth the ground-plan of his nature. Carl Jung; CW 4, Page 728.

There are analysts who believe that they can get along without self-analysis. This is Munchausen psychology, and they will certainly remain stuck. They forget that one of the most important therapeutically effective factors is subjecting you to the objective judgment of another. As regards ourselves we remain blind, despite everything and everybody. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 449.

Knowledge rests not upon truth alone, but on error also. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 74

One could almost say that if all the world's traditions were cut off at a single blow, the whole of mythology and the whole history of religion would start all over again with the next generation. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 30

The first phase embraces the first years of life; I call this period the presexual stage. It corresponds to the caterpillar stage of butterflies and is characterized almost exclusively by the functions of nutrition and growth. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 263

The second phase embraces the later years of childhood up to puberty and might be called the prepubertal stage. Germination of sexuality takes place at this period. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 264

Religions are the great-healing systems for the ills of the soul. Carl Jung, CW 4, Paragraph 751

The neurotic is ill not because he has lost his old faith but because he has not yet found a new form for his finest aspirations. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 669

The unconscious is not just a receptacle for all unclean spirits and other odious legacies from the dead past—such as, for instance, that deposit of centuries of public opinion which constitutes Freud's "superego." Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 760

The further development of the individual can be brought about only by means of symbols which represent something far in advance of himself and whose intellectual meanings cannot yet be grasped entirely. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 680

Man "possesses" many things which he has never acquired but has inherited from his ancestors. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 728

There are experiences which one must go through and for which reason is no substitute. Such experiences are often of inestimable value to the patient. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 446.

I can only gaze with wonder and awe at the depths and heights of our psychic nature. Its non-spatial universe conceals an untold abundance of images which have accumulated over millions of years of development… The only equivalent of the universe within is the universe without. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 331.

The psychological trouble in neurosis, and the neurosis itself, can be formulated as an act of adaptation that has failed. Carl Jung; CW 4; par. 574.

We yield too much to the ridiculous fear that we are at bottom quite impossible beings, that if everyone were to appear as he really is a frightful social catastrophe would ensue. Many people today take "man as he really is" to mean merely the eternally discontented, anarchic, rapacious element in human beings, quite forgetting that these same human beings have also erected those firmly established forms of civilization which possess greater strength and stability than all the anarchic undercurrents. The strengthening of his social personality is one of the essential conditions for man's existence. Were it not so, humanity would cease to be. The selfishness and rebelliousness we meet in the neurotic's psychology are not "man as he really is" but an infantile distortion. In reality the normal man is "civicminded and moral"; he created his laws and observes them, not because they are imposed on him from without—that is a childish delusion—but because he loves law and order more than he loves disorder and lawlessness. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 442

I can only gaze with wonder and awe at the depths and heights of our psychic nature. Its non-spatial universe conceals an untold abundance of images which have accumulated over millions of years of living development and become fixed in the organism. My consciousness is like an eye that penetrates to the most distant spaces, yet it is the psychic non-ego that fills them with non-spatial images. And these images are not pale shadows, but tremendously powerful psychic factors. The most we may be able to do is misunderstand them, but we can never rob them of their power by denying them. Beside this picture I would like to place the spectacle of the starry heavens at night, for the only equivalent of the universe within is the universe without; and just as I reach this world through the medium of the body, so I reach that world through the medium of the psyche. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 784

Even the so-called highly scientific suggestion therapy employs the wares of the medicine-man and the exorcising shaman. And why not? The public is not much more advanced either and continues to expect miraculous cures from the doctor. And indeed, we must rate those doctors wise worldly-wise in every sense—who know how to surround themselves with the aura of a medicine-man. They have not only the biggest practices but also get the best results. This is because, apart from the neuroses, countless physical illnesses are tainted and complicated with psychic material to an unsuspected degree. The medical exorcist betrays by his whole demeanour his full appreciation of that psychic component when he gives the patient the opportunity of fixing his faith firmly on the mysterious personality of the doctor. In this way he wins the sick man's mind, which from then on helps him to restore his body to health. The cure works best when the doctor himself believes in his own formulae, otherwise he may be overcome by scientific doubt and so lose the proper convincing tone. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 578

Medicine in the hand of a fool was ever poison and death. Just as we demand from a surgeon, besides his technical knowledge, a skilled hand, courage, presence of mind, and power of decision, so we must expect from an analyst a very serious and thorough psychoanalytic training of his own personality before we are willing to entrust a patient to him. I would even go so far as to say that the acquisition and practice of the psychoanalytic technique presuppose not only a specific psychological gift but in the very first place a serious concern with the moulding of one's own character. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 450

There are analysts who believe that they can get along with a self-analysis. This is Munchausen psychology, and they will certainly remain stuck. They forget that one of the most important therapeutically effective factors is subjecting yourself to the objective judgment of another. As regards ourselves we remain blind, despite everything and everybody. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 449

We would be doing our neurotic patients a grievous wrong if we tried to force them all into the category of the coerced. Among neurotics, there are not a few who do not require any reminders of their social duties and obligations but are born and destined rather to be bearers of new cultural ideals. They are neurotic as long as they bow down before authority and refuse the freedom to which they are destined. As long as we look at life only retrospectively, as is the case in the psychoanalytic writings of the Viennese school, we shall never do justice to these persons and never bring them the longed-for deliverance. For in this way we train them only to be obedient children and thereby strengthen the very forces that made them ill—their conservative backwardness and submission to authority. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 658

The small world of the child, the family milieu, is the model for the big world. The more intensely the family sets its stamp on the child, the more he will be emotionally inclined, as an adult, to see in the great world his former small world. Of course this must not be taken as a conscious intellectual process. On the contrary, the patient feels and sees the difference between now and then and tries as well as he can to adapt himself. Perhaps he will even believe himself perfectly adapted, since he may be able to grasp the situation intellectually, but that does not prevent his emotions from lagging far behind his intellectual insight. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 312

Nowadays we have no real sexual morality, only a legalistic attitude to sexuality; just as the Middle Ages had no real morality of money-making but only prejudices and a legalistic point of view. We are not yet far enough advanced to distinguish between moral and immoral behaviour in the realm of free sexual activity. This is clearly expressed in the customary treatment, or rather ill-treatment, of unmarried mothers. All the repulsive hypocrisy, the high tide of prostitution and of venereal diseases, we owe to the barbarous, wholesale legal condemnation of certain kinds of sexual behaviour, and to our inability to develop a finer moral sense for the enormous psychological differences that exist in the domain of free sexual activity. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 666

We deceive ourselves greatly if we think that many married women are neurotic merely because they are unsatisfied sexually or because they have not found the right man or because they have an infantile sexual fixation. The real reason in many cases is that they cannot recognize the cultural task that is waiting for them. We all have far too much the standpoint of the "nothing but" psychology, that is, we still think that the new future which is pressing in at the door can be squeezed into the framework of what is already known. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 668

Psychoanalysis cannot be considered a method of education, if by education we mean the topiary art of clipping a tree into a beautiful artificial shape. But those who have a higher conception of education will prize most the method of cultivating a tree so that it fulfils to perfection its own natural conditions of growth. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 442

The fact that by far the greater part of humanity not only needs guidance but wishes for nothing better than to be guided and held in tutelage, justifies, in a sense, the moral value which the Church sets on confession. The priest, equipped with all the insignia of paternal authority, becomes the responsible leader and shepherd of his flock. He is the father confessor and the members of his parish are his penitent children. Thus priest and Church replace the parents, and to that extent they free the individual from the bonds of the family. In so far as the priest is a morally elevated personality with a natural nobility of soul and a mental culture to match, the institution of confession may be commended as brilliant method of social guidance and education, which did in fact perform a tremendous educative task for more than fifteen hundred years. So long as the medieval Church knew how to be the guardian of art and science—a role in which her success was due, in part, to her wide tolerance of worldly interests—confession was an admirable instrument of education. But it lost its educative value, at least for more highly developed people, as soon as the Church proved incapable of maintaining her leadership in the intellectual sphere—the inevitable consequence of spiritual rigidity. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 433

The discovery of the value of human personality is reserved for a riper age. For young people the search for personality values is very often a pretext for evading their biological duty. Conversely, the exaggerated longing of an older person for the sexual values of youth is a short-sighted and often cowardly evasion of a duty which demands recognition of the value of personality and submission to the hierarchy of cultural values. The young neurotic shrinks back in terror from the expansion of life's duties, the old one from the dwindling of the treasures he has attained. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 664

The psyche does not merely react, it gives its own specific answer to the influences at work upon it, and at least half the resulting formation is entirely due to the psyche and the determinants inherent within it. Culture can never be understood as reaction to environment. That shallow explanation can safely be left to the past century. It is just these determinants that appear as psychological imperatives, and we have daily proof of their compelling power. What I call "biological duty" is identical with these determinants. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 665

Only those who regard the happenings in this world as a concatenation of errors and accidents, and who therefore believe that the pedagogic hand of the rationalist is constantly needed to guide us, can ever imagine that this path [of psychoanalysis] was an aberration from which we should have been warned off with a signboard. Besides the deeper insight into psychological determination, we owe to this "error" a method of inquiry of incalculable importance. It is for us to rejoice and be thankful that Freud had the courage to let himself be guided along this path. Not thus is the progress of science hindered, but rather by blind adherence to insights once gained, by the typical conservatism of authority, by the childish vanity of the savant and his fear of making mistakes. This lack of courage is considerably more injurious to the name of science than an honest error. When will there be an end to the incessant squabbling about who is right? One has only to look at the history of sci- ence how many have been right, and how few have remained right! Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 302

Dogma and science are incommensurable quantities which damage one another by mutual contamination. Dogma as a factor in religion is of inestimable value precisely because of its absolute standpoint. But when science dispenses with criticism and scepticism it degenerates into a sickly hot-house plant. One of the elements necessary to science is extreme uncertainty. Whenever science inclines towards dogma and shows a tendency to be impatient and fanatical, it is concealing a doubt which in all probability is justified and explaining away an uncertainty which is only too well founded. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 746

One-sidedness appears over and over again in the history of science. I am not saying this as a reproach on the contrary, we must be glad that there are people who are courageous enough to be immoderate and one-sided. It is to them that we owe our discoveries. What is regrettable is that each should defend his one-sidedness so passionately. Scientific theories are merely suggestions as to how things might be observed. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 241

In this overpoweringly humdrum existence, alas, there is little out of the ordinary that is healthy, and not much room for conspicuous heroism. Not that heroic demands are never put to us on the contrary—and this is just what is so irritating and irksome—the banal everyday makes banal demands on our patience, our devotion, perseverance, self-sacrifice; and for us to fulfil these demands (as we must) humbly and without courting applause through heroic gestures, a heroism is needed that cannot be seen from the outside. It does not glitter, is not belauded, and it always seeks concealment in everyday attire. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 72

Moral law is nothing other than an outward manifestation of man's innate urge to dominate and control himself. This impulse to domestication and civilization is lost in the dim, unfathomable depths of man's evolutionary history and can never be conceived as the consequence of laws imposed from without, Man himself, obeying his instincts, created his laws. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 486

We should never forget that what today seems to us a moral commandment will tomorrow be cast into the melting-pot and transformed, so that in the near or distant future it may serve as a basis for new ethical formations. This much we ought to have learnt from the history of civilization, that the forms of morality belong to the category of transitory things. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 667

Widely accepted ideas are never the personal property of their so-called author; on the contrary, he is the bondservant of his ideas. Impressive ideas which are hailed as truths have something peculiar about them. Although they come into being at a definite time, they are and have always been timeless; they arise from that realm of creative psychic life out of which the ephemeral mind of the single human being grows like a plant that blossoms, bears fruit and seed, and then withers and dies. Ideas spring from something greater than the personal human being. Man does not make his ideas; we could say that man's ideas make him. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 769

We can understand at once the fear that the child and the primitive have of the great unknown. We have the same childish fear of our inner side, where we likewise touch upon a great unknown world. All we have is the affect, the fear, without knowing that this is a world-fear—for the world of affects is invisible. We have either purely theoretical prejudices against it, or superstitious ideas. One cannot even talk about the unconscious before many educated people without being accused of mysticism. The fear is legitimate in so far as our rational Weltanschauung with its scientific and moral certitudes—so hotly believed in because so deeply questionable—is shattered by the facts of the other side. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 324

Has mankind ever really got away from myths? Everyone who has his eyes and wits about him can see that the world is dead, cold, and unending. Never yet has he beheld a God or been compelled to require the existence of such a God from the evidence of his senses. On the contrary, it needed the strongest inner compulsion, which can only be explained by the irrational force of instinct, for man to invent those religious beliefs whose absurdity was long since pointed out by Tertullian. In the same way one can withhold the material content of primitive myths from a child but not take from him the need for mythology, and still less his ability to manufacture it for himself. One could almost say that if all the world's traditions were cut off at a single blow, the whole of mythology and the whole history of religion would start all over again with the next generation. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 30

It was of profound psychological significance when Christianity first proclaimed that the orientation to the future was the redeeming principle for mankind. In the past nothing can be altered, and in the present little, but the future is ours and capable of raising life's intensity to the highest pitch. A little span of youth belongs to us, all the rest belongs to our children. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 668

We must never forget that the world is, in the first place, a subjective phenomenon. The impressions we receive from these accidental happenings are also our own doing. It is not true that the impressions are forced on us unconditionally, our own predisposition conditions the impression. A man whose libido is blocked will have, as a rule, quite different and very much more vivid impressions than one whose libido is organized in a wealth of activities. A person who is sensitive in one way or another will receive a deep impression from an event which would leave a less sensitive person cold. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 400

Is not every experience, even in the best of circumstances, at least fifty-per-cent subjective interpretation? On the other hand, the subject is also an objective fact, a piece of the world; and what comes from him comes, ultimately, from the stuff of the world itself, just as the rarest and strangest organism is none the less supported and nourished by the earth which is common to all. It is precisely the most subjective ideas which, being closest to nature and to our own essence, deserve to be called the truest. But: "What is truth?" Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 770

We know that the first impressions of childhood accompany us inalienably throughout life, and that, just as indestructibly, certain educational influences can keep people all their lives within those limits. In these circumstances it is not surprising that conflicts break out between the personality moulded by educational and other influences of the infantile milieu and one's own individual style of life. It is a conflict which all those must face who are called upon to live a life that is independent and creative. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 310

Theology does not help those who are looking for the key, because theology demands faith, and faith cannot be made: it is in the truest sense a gift of grace. We moderns are faced with the necessity of rediscovering the life of the spirit; we must experience it anew for ourselves. It is the only way in which to break the spell that binds us to the cycle of biological events. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 780

The more highly developed men of our time do not want to be guided by a creed or a dogma; they want to understand. So it is not surprising if they throw aside everything they do not understand; and religious symbols, being the least intelligible of all, are generally the first to go overboard. The sacrifice of the intellect demanded by a positive belief is a violation against which the conscience of the more highly developed individual rebels. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 434

When someone knocks in a nail with a hammer in order to hang something up, we can understand every detail of the action; it is immediately evident. It is otherwise with the act of baptism, where every phase is problematic. We call these actions, whose meaning and purpose are not immediately evident, symbolic actions, or symbols. On the basis of this reasoning we call a dream symbolic because it is a psychological product whose origin, meaning, and purpose are obscure, and is therefore one of the purest products of unconscious constellation. As Freud aptly says, the dream is the via regia to the unconscious. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 334

It will not have escaped you that the greatest difficulty lies in assigning limits to the pre-sexual stage. I am ready to confess my great uncertainty in regard to this problem. When I look back on my own psychoanalytic experiences with children-insufficiently numerous as yet unfortunately-at the same time bearing in mind the observations made by Freud, it seems to me that the limits of this phase lie between the third and fifth year, subject, of course, to individual variation. This age is an important one in many respects. The child has already outgrown the helplessness of a baby, and a number of important psychological functions have acquired a reliable hold. From this period on, the profound darkness of the early infantile amnesia, or discontinuity of consciousness, begins to be illuminated by the sporadic continuity of memory. It seems as if, at this stage, an essential step forward is taken in the emancipation and centering of the new personality. So far as we know, the first signs of interests and activities which may fairly be called sexual also fall into this period, even though these indications still have the infantile characteristics of harmlessness and naiveté." Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 266

Freud's approach is not always mistaken, however, for consciousness is not always firmly established. This presupposes a good deal of experience of life and a certain amount of maturity. Young people, who are very far from knowing who they really are, would run a great risk if they obscured their knowledge of themselves still further by letting the "dark night of the soul" pour into their immature, labile consciousness. Here a certain depreciation of the unconscious is justified. Experience has convinced me that there are not only different temperaments ("types"), but different stages of psychological development, so that one can well say that there is an essential difference between the psychology of the first and the second half of life. Here again I differ from the others in maintaining that the same psychological criteria are not applicable to the different stages of life. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 762

For thousands of years, rites of initiation have been teaching rebirth from the spirit; yet, strangely enough, man forgets again and again the meaning of divine procreation. Though this may be poor testimony to the strength of the spirit, the penalty for misunderstanding is neurotic decay, embitterment, atrophy, and sterility. It is easy enough to drive the spirit out of the door, but when we have done so the meal has lost its savour—the salt of the earth. Fortunately, we have proof that the spirit always renews its strength in the fact that the essential teaching of the initiations is handed on from generation to generation.

Ever and again there are human beings who understand what it means that God is their father. The equal balance of the flesh and the spirit is not lost to the world. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 783

Among neurotics, there are not a few who do not require any reminders of their social duties and obligations but are born and destined rather to be bearers of new cultural ideals. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 658

(As you know, by libido I mean very much what the ancients meant by the cosmogonic principle of Eros, or in modern language, "psychic energy.") Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 661

If the analyst himself is neurotic and insufficiently adapted to the demands of life or of his own personality, the patient will copy this defect and reflect it in his own attitudes: with what results you can imagine. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 661

I ought not to conceal from you at this point that the stubborn assertion of sexual values would not be maintained so tenaciously if they did not have a profound significance for that period of life in which propagation is of primary importance. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 664

The discovery of the value of human personality is reserved for a riper age. For young people the search for personality values is very often a pretext for evading their biological duty. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 664

Conversely, the exaggerated longing of an older person for the sexual values of youth is a short-sighted and often cowardly evasion of a duty which demands recognition of the value of personality and submission to the hierarchy of cultural values. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 664

The young neurotic shrinks back in terror from the expansion of life's duties, the old one from the dwindling of the treasures he has attained. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 664

External causes can account for at most half the reaction, the other half is due to the peculiar attributes of living matter itself, without which the specific reaction formation could never come about at all. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 665

The psyche does not merely react, it gives its own specific answer to the influences at work upon it, and at least half the resulting formation is entirely due to the psyche and the determinants inherent within it. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 665

Culture can never be understood as reaction to environment. That shallow explanation can safely be left to the past century. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 665

But in certain cases it is a recognized fact that "immoral" tendencies are not got rid of by analysis but appear more and more clearly until it becomes evident that they belong to the biological duties of the individual. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 665

Nowadays we have no real sexual morality, only a legalistic attitude to sexuality; just as the Middle Ages had no real morality of money-making but only prejudices and a legalistic point of view. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 666

We are not yet far enough advanced to distinguish between moral and immoral behaviour in the realm of free sexual activity. This is clearly expressed in the customary treatment, or rather ill-treatment, of unmarried mothers. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 666

All the repulsive hypocrisy, the high tide of prostitution and of venereal diseases, we owe to the barbarous, wholesale legal condemnation of certain kinds of sexual behaviour, and to our inability to develop a finer moral sense for the enormous psychological differences that exist in the domain of free sexual activity. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 666

The existence of this exceedingly complicated and significant contemporary problem may serve to make clear to you why we so often find among our patients people who, because of their spiritual and social gifts, are quite specifically called to take an active part in the work of civilization—that is their biological destiny. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 667

We should never forget that what today seems to us a moral commandment will tomorrow be cast into the melting-pot and transformed, so that in the near or distant future it may serve as a basis for new ethical formations. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 667

Five percent on money lent is fair interest, twenty per cent is despicable usury. We have to apply this view to the sexual situation as well. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 667

We deceive ourselves greatly if we think that many married women are neurotic merely because they are unsatisfied sexually or because they have not found the right man or because they have an infantile sexual fixation. The real reason in many cases is that they cannot recognize the cultural task that is waiting for them. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 668

It was of profound psychological significance when Christianity first proclaimed that the orientation to the future was the redeeming principle for mankind. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 668

In the past nothing can be altered, and in the present little, but the future is ours and capable of raising life's intensity to the highest pitch. A little span of youth belongs to us, all the rest belongs to our children. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 668

The dream presents itself to us as a more or less unintelligible jumble of elements not at first conscious and only recognized afterwards through their associations. It should be added that not all parts of the dream have a recognizable quality from which their conscious character can be deduced; they are often, and indeed mostly, unrecognizable at first. Only afterwards does it occur to us that we have consciously experienced this or that part of the dream. From this standpoint alone we may regard the dream as a product of unconscious origin Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 324

Freud attaches great significance to verbal expression one of the most important components of our thinking because the double meaning of words is a favourite channel for the displacement and improper expression of affects Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 46

An object in which, on the contrary, I feel much interest will evoke numerous associations and preoccupy me for a long while. Every emotion produces a more or less extensive complex of associations which I have called the "feeling-toned complex of ideas" Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 67

In studying an individual case history we always discover that the complex exerts the strongest "constellating" force, from which we conclude that in any analysis we shall meet with it from the start Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 67

The complexes appear as the chief components of the psychological disposition in every psychic structure. In the dream, for example, we encounter the emotional components, for it is easy to understand that all the products of psychic activity depend above all upon the strongest "constellating" influences Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 67

In Freud's definition the term libido connotes an exclusively sexual need, hence everything that Freud means by libido must be understood as sexual need or sexual desire Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 252

In medicine the term libido is certainly used for sexual desire, and specifically for sexual lust Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 252

But the classical use of the word [libido] as found in Cicero, Sallust, and others was not so exclusive; there it is used in the more general sense of passionate desire Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 252

I mention this fact now, because further on it will play an important part in our argument, and because it is important to know that the term libido really has a much wider range of meaning than it has in medicine Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 252

The symptoms of a neurosis must be regarded as exaggerated functions over-invested with libido Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 254

The energy used for this purpose has been taken from somewhere else, and it is the task of the psychoanalyst to discover the place it was taken from or where it was never applied Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 254

The question has to be reversed in the case of those syndromes characterized mainly by lack of libido, for instance apathetic states Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 255

Here we have to ask, where did the libido go? The patient gives us the impression of having no libido, and there are many doctors who take him at face value Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 255

Such doctors have a primitive way of thinking, like a savage who, seeing an eclipse of the sun, believes that the sun has been swallowed and killed. But the sun is only hidden, and so it is with these patients. The libido is there, but it is not visible and is inaccessible to the patient himself. Superficially, we have here a lack of libido Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 255

It is the task of psychoanalysis to search out that hidden place where the libido dwells and where the patient himself cannot get at it Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 255

The hidden place is the "non-conscious," which we may also call the "unconscious" without attributing to it any mystical significance Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 255

We shall now try to fit the new conception of libido into the theory of infantile sexuality, which is so very important for the theory of neurosis Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 290

In infants we find that libido as energy, as a vital activity, first manifests itself in the nutritional zone, where, in the act of sucking, food is taken in with a rhythmic movement and with every sign of satisfaction Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 290

With the growth of the individual and development of his organs the libido creates for itself new avenues of activity Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 290

The primary model of rhythmic movement [in infants], producing pleasure and satisfaction, is now transferred to the zone of the other functions, with sexuality as its ultimate goal Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 290

A considerable portion of the "alimentary libido" has to convert itself into "sexual libido" Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 290

This transition does not take place quite suddenly at puberty, but only very gradually during the course of childhood. The libido can free itself only with difficulty and quite slowly from the modality of the nutritive function in order to pass over into the sexual function Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 290

In this transitional stage there are, so far as I am able to judge, two distinct phases: the phase of sucking, and the phase of displaced rhythmic activity Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 291

Sucking belongs by its very nature to the sphere of the nutritive function, but outgrows it by ceasing to be a function of nutrition and becoming a rhythmic activity aiming at pleasure and satisfaction without intake of nourishment Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 291

As a rule, it is the other body-openings that become the first objects of libidinal interests; then the skin, or special parts of it Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 291

The activities carried out in these places, taking the form of rubbing, boring, picking, pulling, and so forth, follow a certain rhythm and serve to produce pleasure Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 291

After lingering for a while at these stations, the libido continues its wanderings until it reaches the sexual zone, where it may provide occasion for the first attempts at masturbation Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 291

This migration of libido takes place during the presexual stage, whose special distinguishing-mark is that the libido gradually sloughs off the character of the nutritive instinct and assumes that of the sexual instinct. At the stage of nutrition, therefore, we cannot yet speak of a true sexual libido Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 291

It is characteristic that the babyish word for mother, "mamma," is the name for the maternal breast Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 346

Dr. Beatrice Hinkle has informed me, interrogation of small children elicited the fact that they defined “mother” as the person who gives food, chocolate, etc. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 346

One could hardly assert that for children of this age food is only a symbol for sex, though this is sometimes true for adults Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 346

A superficial glance at the history of civilization will show just how enormous the nutritive source of pleasure is. The colossal feasts of Rome in its decadence were an expression of anything you like, only not of repressed sexuality, for that is the last thing one could accuse the Romans of in those days Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 346

There is no doubt that these excesses were some kind of substitute, but not for sexuality; they were far more a substitute for neglected moral functions, which we are too prone to regard as laws forced on man from outside. Men have the laws which they make for themselves Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 346

I [Jung] do not identify the feeling of pleasure eo ipso with sexuality. Sexuality has an increasingly small share in pleasure-sensations the further back we go in childhood Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 347

Nevertheless, jealousy can play a large role, for it too is something that does not belong entirely to the sexual sphere, since the desire for food has itself much to do with the first stirrings of jealousy one has only to think of animals! Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 347

Certainly jealousy is reinforced by a budding eroticism relatively early Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 347

This element gains in strength as the years go on, so that the Oedipus complex soon assumes its classical form Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 347

We have seen that psychoanalytic theory started from a traumatic experience in childhood, which later on was found to be partly or wholly unreal. In consequence, the theory made a change of front and sought the aetiologically significant factor in the development of abnormal fantasies Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 353

The investigation of the unconscious, continued over a period of ten years with the help of an increasing number of workers, gradually brought to light a mass of empirical material which showed that the incest complex was a highly important and never-failing element in pathological fantasy Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 353

But it was found that the incest complex was not a special complex of neurotic people; it proved to be a component of the normal infantile psyche. We cannot tell from its mere existence whether this complex will give rise to a neurosis or not. To become pathogenic, it must precipitate a conflict; the complex, which in itself is inactive, must be activated and intensified to the point where a conflict breaks out Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 353

This brings us to a new and important question. If the infantile "nuclear complex" is only a general form, not in itself pathogenic but requiring special activation, then the whole aetiological problem is altered Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 354

In that case we would dig in vain among the reminiscences of earliest childhood, since they give us only the general forms of later conflicts but not the actual conflict. It makes no difference that there were already conflicts in childhood, for the conflicts of childhood are different from the conflicts of adults Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 354

Those who have suffered ever since childhood from a chronic neurosis do not suffer now from the same conflict they suffered from then. Maybe the neurosis broke out when they first had to go to school as children. Then it was the conflict between indulgence and duty, between love for their parents and the necessity of going to school. But now it is the conflict between, say, the joys of a comfortable bourgeois existence and the strenuous demands of professional life. It only seems to be the same conflict Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 354

Each of these tendencies has its psychological prehistory, and in our case it can clearly be shown that the peculiar resistance at the bottom of the patient's critical sensitiveness was in fact bound up historically with certain infantile sexual activities, and also with that so-called traumatic experience things which may very well cast a shadow on sexuality Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 396

From this standpoint we cannot assert that our patient's peculiar prehistory was to blame for her sensitiveness at the critical moment; it would be more correct to say that this sensitiveness was inborn and naturally manifested itself most strongly in any unusual situation Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 397

This excessive sensitiveness very often brings an enrichment of the personality and contributes more to its charm than to the undoing of a person's character. Only, when difficult and unusual situations arise, the advantage frequently turns into a very great disadvantage, since calm consideration is then disturbed by untimely affects Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 398

Nothing could be more mistaken, though, than to regard this excessive sensitiveness as in itself a pathological character component. If that were really so, we should have to rate about one quarter of humanity as pathological. Yet if this sensitiveness has such destructive consequences for the individual, we must admit that it can no longer be considered quite normal Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 398

Primitive people and animals have nothing like that capacity for reviving memories of unique impressions which we find among civilized people Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 403

Very young children are not nearly as impressionable as older children. The higher development of the mental faculties is an indispensable prerequisite for impressionability. We can therefore safely assume that the earlier a patient places some impressive experience in his childhood, the more likely it is to be a fantastic and regressive one Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 403

Deeper impressions are to be expected only from experiences in late childhood. At any rate, we generally have to attribute only regressive significance to the events of early infancy, that is, from the fifth year back Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 403

In later years, too, regression can sometimes play an overwhelming role, but even so one must not attribute too little importance to accidental events. In the later course of a neurosis, accidental events and regression together form a vicious circle: retreat from life leads to regression, and regression heightens resistance to life Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 403

The non-fulfillment of the demands of adaptation, or the shrinking of the neurotic from difficulties, is, at bottom, the hesitation of every organism in the face of a new effort to adapt Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 410

The training of animals provides instructive examples in this respect, and in many cases such an explanation is, in principle, sufficient. From this standpoint the earlier mode of explanation, which maintained that the resistance of the neurotic was due to his bondage to fantasies, appears incorrect Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 410

But it would be very one-sided to take our stand solely on a point of principle. There is also a bondage to fantasies, even though the fantasies are, as a rule, secondary. The neurotic's bondage to fantasies (illusions, prejudices, etc.) develops gradually, as a habit, out of innumerable regressions from obstacles since earliest childhood Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 410

All this grows into a regular habit familiar to every student of neurosis; we all know those patients who use their neurosis as an excuse for running away from difficulties and shirking their duty Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 410

Their habitual evasion produces a habit of mind which makes them take it for granted that they should live out their fantasies instead of fulfilling disagreeable obligations. And this bondage to fantasy makes reality seem less real to the neurotic, less valuable and less interesting, than it does to the normal person Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 410

The libido, which is not used for this purpose stagnates, and will then make the inevitable regression to former objects or modes of adaptation Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 470

The result is a striking activation of the incest complex. The libido withdraws from the object which is so difficult to attain and which demands such great efforts, and turns instead to the easier ones, and finally to the easiest of all, the infantile fantasies, which are then elaborated into real incest fantasies Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 470

The fact that, whenever there is a disturbance of psychological adaptation, we always find an excessive development of these fantasies must likewise be conceived as a regressive phenomenon. That is to say, the incest fantasy is of secondary and not of causal significance, while the primary cause is the resistance of human nature to any kind of exertion Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 470

Accordingly, drawing back from certain tasks cannot be explained by saying that man prefers the incestuous relationship, rather he falls back into it because he shuns exertion Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 470

Otherwise we would have to say that resistance to conscious effort is identical with preference for the incestuous relationship Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 470

This would-be obvious nonsense, since not only primitive man but animals too have a mighty dislike of all intentional effort, and are addicted to absolute laziness until circumstances prod them into action Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 470

Neither of primitive people nor of animals can it be asserted that preference for incestuous relationships is the cause of their aversion to efforts at adaptation, for, especially in the case of animals, there can be absolutely no question of an incestuous relationship Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 470

Before we start analysing this dream, I must mention its parallels with certain mythological ideas. Since ancient times the thunderstorm has had the meaning of an earth-fecundating act, it is the cohabitation of Father Heaven and Mother Earth, where the lightning takes over the role of the winged phallus Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 507

The stork in flight is just the same thing, a winged phallus, and its psychosexual meaning is known to every child Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 507

But the psychosexual meaning of the thunderstorm is not known to everyone, and certainly not to our little patient. In view of the whole psychological constellation previously described, the stork must unquestionably be given a psychosexual interpretation Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 507

The fact that the thunderstorm is connected with the stork and, like it, has a psychosexual meaning seems difficult to accept at first Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 507

To return to the analysis of the dream: the associations that led to the heart of this image began with the idea of rain during a thunderstorm. Her actual words were: I think of watery uncle was drowned in the water it must be awful to be stuck in the water like that, in the dark but wouldn't the baby drown in the water, too? Does it drink the water that is in the stomach? Queer, when I was ill Mama sent my water to the doctor. I thought he was going to mix something with it like syrup, which babies grow from, and Mama would have to drink it Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 508

We see with unquestionable clearness from this string of associations that the child connected psychosexual ideas specifically relating to fertilization with the rain during the thunderstorm Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 509

Here again we see that remarkable parallelism between mythology and the individual fantasies of our own day. This series of associations is so rich in symbolical connections that a whole dissertation could be written about them. The symbolism of drowning was brilliantly interpreted by the child herself as a pregnancy fantasy, an explanation given in the psychoanalytic literature long ago Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 510

The psychoanalyst naturally makes his anamnesis as carefully as any other specialist. But this is merely the patient's history and must not be confused with analysis Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 525

Analysis is the reduction of actual contents of consciousness, ostensibly of a fortuitous nature, to their psychological determinants. This process has nothing to do with the anamnestic reconstruction of the history of the illness Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 525

In contradistinction to all previous methods, psychoanalysis endeavours to overcome the disorders of the neurotic psyche through the unconscious, and not from the conscious side. In this work we naturally have need of the patient's conscious contents, for only in this way can we reach the unconscious. The conscious content from which our work starts is the material supplied by the anamnesis Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 528

In many cases the anamnesis provides useful clues which make the psychic origin of his symptoms clear to the patient. This, of course, is necessary only when he is convinced that his neurosis is organic in origin Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 528

But even in those cases where the patient is convinced from the start of the psychic nature of his illness, a critical survey of the anamnesis can be of advantage, for it discloses a psychological context of which he was unaware before Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 528

In this way problems that need special discussion are frequently brought to the surface. This work may occupy many sittings Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 528

Finally, the elucidation of the conscious material comes to an end when neither the analyst nor the patient can contribute anything further of decisive importance. In the most favourable cases the end comes with the formulation of the problem which, very often, proves insoluble Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 528

The best examples of such regressions are found in hysterical cases where a disappointment in love or marriage has precipitated a neurosis Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 569

There we find those well-known digestive disorders, loss of appetite, dyspeptic symptoms of all sorts, etc. In these cases the regressive libido, turning back from the task of adaptation, gains power over the nutritive function and produces marked disturbances Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 569

Similar effects can be observed in cases where there is no disturbance of the nutritive function but, instead, a regressive revival of reminiscences from the distant past Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 569

We then find a reactivation of the parental imagos, of the Oedipus complex. Here the events of early infancy never before important suddenly become so. They have become regressively reactivated Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 569

Remove the obstacle from the path of life and this whole system of infantile fantasies at once breaks down and becomes as inactive and ineffective as before Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 569

But let us not forget that, to a certain extent, it is at work all the time, influencing us in unseen ways Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 569

A sensitive and somewhat unbalanced person, as a neurotic always is, will meet with special difficulties and perhaps with more unusual tasks in life than a normal individual, who as a rule has only to follow the well-worn path of an ordinary existence Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 572

For the neurotic there is no established way of life, because his aims and tasks are apt to be of a highly individual character Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 572

He tries to go the more or less uncontrolled and half-conscious way of normal people, not realizing that his own critical and very different nature demands of him more effort than the normal person is required to exert Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 572

There are neurotics who have shown their heightened sensitiveness and their resistance to adaptation in the very first weeks of life, in the difficulty they have in taking the mother's breast [breast feeding] and in their exaggerated nervous reactions, etc. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 572

For this peculiarity in the neurotic predisposition it will always be impossible to find a psychological aetiology, because it is anterior to all psychology Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 572

This predisposition you can call it "congenital sensitiveness" or what you likes the cause of the first resistances to adaptation Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 572

As the way to adaptation is blocked, the biological energy we call libido does not find its appropriate outlet or activity, with the result that a suitable form of adaptation is replaced by an abnormal or primitive one Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 572

Interpretations of earlier symbols will themselves be used again as fresh symbols in later dreams Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 649

It often happens, for instance, that sexual situations which appeared in earlier dreams in symbolic form will appear "undisguised" in later ones once more, be it noted, in symbolic form as analysable expressions for ideas of a different nature hidden behind them Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 649

Thus the not infrequent dream of incestuous cohabitation is by no means an "undisguised" content, but a dream as freshly symbolic and capable of analysis as all others Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 649

For one type of person (called the infantile-rebel) a positive transference is, to begin with, an important achievement with a healing significance; for the other (the infantile-obedient) it is dangerous backsliding, a convenient way of evading life's duties Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 659

For the first a negative transference denotes increased insubordination, hence a backsliding and an evasion of life's duties, for the second it is a step forward with a healing significance Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 659

The terrifying spectres of a black man and a black snake threaten the dreamer as well as his mother. "Black" indicates something dark, the unconscious Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 737

The snake's attack on the boy's face, the part that "sees," represents the danger to consciousness (blinding) Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 737

This little example shows what goes on in the psyche of an eight-year-old child who is over dependent on his parents, the blame for this lying partly on the too strict father and the too tender mother Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 738

The boy's identification with his mother and fear of his father are in this individual instance an infantile neurosis, but they represent at the same time the original human situation, the clinging of primitive consciousness to the unconscious, and the compensating impulse which strives to tear consciousness away from the embrace of the darkness Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 738

Because man has a dim premonition of this original situation behind his individual experience, he has always tried to give it generally valid expression through the universal motif of the divine hero's fight with the mother dragon, whose purpose is to deliver man from the power of darkness Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 738

This [hero] myth has a "saving," i.e., therapeutic significance, since it gives adequate expression to the dynamism underlying the individual entanglement. The myth is not to be casually explained as the consequence of a personal father-complex, but should be understood teleologically, as an attempt of the unconscious itself to rescue consciousness from the danger of regression Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 738

It is a means of unlocking the unconscious directly, although mostly it is simply a technique for obtaining a wide selection of faulty reactions which can then be used for exploring the unconscious by psychoanalysis Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 339

The process of regression is beautifully illustrated in an image used by Freud. The libido can be compared with a river which, when it meets with an obstruction, gets dammed up and causes an inundation Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 367

If later an obstruction occurs, so that the damming up of libido reactivates the old channels, this state is properly speaking a new and at the same time an abnormal one Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 368

The earlier, infantile state represents a normal application of libido, whereas the reversion of libido to infantile ways is something abnormal Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 368

I am therefore of the opinion that Freud is not justified in calling the infantile sexual manifestations "perverse," since a normal manifestation should not be designated by a pathological term. This incorrect usage has had pernicious consequences in confusing the scientific public. Such a terminology is a misapplication to normal people of insights gained from neurotic psychology, on the assumption that the abnormal by-path taken by the libido in neurotics is still the same phenomenon as in children Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 368

The moment of the outbreak of neurosis is not just a matter of chance; as a rule it is most critical. It is usually the moment when a new psychological adjustment, that is, a new adaptation, is demanded. Such moments facilitate the outbreak of a neurosis, as every experienced neurologist knows Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 563

When the parents have long been dead and have lost, or should have lost, all significance, the situation of the patient having perhaps completely changed since then, they are still somehow present and as important as if they were still alive Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 305

The patient's love, admiration, resistance, hatred, and rebelliousness still cling to their effigies, transfigured by affection or distorted by envy, and often bearing little resemblance to the erstwhile reality Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 305

It was this fact that compelled me to speak no longer of "father" and "mother" but to employ instead the term "imago," because these fantasies are not concerned any more with the real father and mother but with subjective and often very much distorted images of them which lead a shadowy but nonetheless potent existence in the mind of the patient Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 305

Carl Jung: CW 5 "Symbols of Transformations"

The same is true of the religious attitude: it must be fully conscious of itself and of its foundations if it is to signify anything more than unconscious imitation. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 106

"The spirit of evil is fear, negation, the adversary who opposes life in its struggles for eternal duration and thwarts every great deed, who infuses into the body the poison of weakness and age through the treacherous bite of the serpent; he is the spirit of regression, who threatens us with bondage to the mother and with dissolution and extinction in the unconscious. For the hero, fear is a challenge and a task because only boldness can deliver from fear. And if the risk is not taken, the meaning of life is somewhat violated, and the whole future is condemned to hopeless staleness, to a dab grey lit by will-o'-the-wisps Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 551.

The anima is the archetype of the feminine and plays a very important role in a man's unconscious. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 406, fn 142

The "mother" corresponds to the "virgin anima," who is not turned towards the outer world and is therefore not corrupted by it. She is turned rather towards the "inner sun" … Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 464

Dogma must be a physical impossibility, for it has nothing whatever to say about the physical world but is a symbol of "transcendental" or unconscious processes which, so far as psychology can understand them at all, seem to be bound up with the unavoidable development of consciousness. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 674

The neurotic who tries to wriggle out of the necessity of living wins nothing and only burdens himself with a constant foretaste of aging and dying. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 617

In the morning of life the son tears himself loose from the mother, from the domestic hearth, to rise through battles to his destined heights. Always he imagines his worst enemy in front of him, yet he carries the enemy within himself—a deadly longing for the abyss, a longing to drown in his own source, to be sucked down to the realm of the Mothers. His life is a constant struggle against extinction, a violent yet fleeting deliverance from ever-lurking night. This death is no external enemy, it is his own inner longing for the stillness and profound peace of all-knowing non-existence, for all-seeing sleep in the ocean of coming-to-be and passing away. Even in his highest strivings for harmony and balance, for the profundities of philosophy and the raptures of the artist, he seeks death, immobility, satiety, rest . . . If he is to live, he must fight and sacrifice his longing for the past in order to rise to his own heights. And having reached the noonday heights, he must sacrifice his love for his own achievement, for he may not loiter. The sun, too, sacrifices its greatest strength in order to hasten onwards to the fruits of autumn, which are the seeds of rebirth . . . Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 553

Belief in dogma is an equally unavoidable stop-gap which must sooner or later be replaced by adequate understanding and knowledge if our civilization is to continue. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 674

That which compels us to create a substitute for ourselves is not the external lack of objects, but our incapacity to lovingly include a thing outside of ourselves. Carl Jung. CW 5, Page 173

A state of introversion. What this means we already know: the libido sinks "into its own depths" (a favourite image of Nietzsche's), and discovers in the darkness a substitute for the upper world it has abandoned the world of memories ("Amidst a hundred memories"), the strongest and most influential of which are the earliest ones Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 448

Yet "the danger is great" as Mephistopheles says, for these depths fascinate. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 449

It is a fact not less remarkable than well attested, that the Druids in their groves were accustomed to select the most stately and beautiful tree as an emblem of the deity they adored; and, having cut off the side branches, they affixed two of the largest of them to the highest part of the trunk, in such manner that those branches, extended on each side like the arms of a man, together with the body, presented to the spectator the appearance of a huge cross [cf. fig. 26]; and on the bark, in various places, was actually inscribed the letter "tau." Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 402

The Creator God [takes] on an astromythological, or rather an astrological, character. He has become the sun, and thus finds a natural expression that transcends his moral division into a Heavenly Father and his counterpart the devil. Carl Jung; CW 5; Symbols of Transformation; Para 176.

Christ wrestles with himself in Gethsemane in order to complete his work. Mithras has to fight the bull, Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 526

Christ carries the Cross (the "transitus") and in so doing carries himself to the grave. Mithras carries the bull (the "transitus") into the cave (grave) where he kills it. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 526

From Christ's death comes a divinity who is eaten in the Lord's Supper, i.e., the mystical food. From the death of Mithras' bull comes fruitfulness, especially things to eat. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 526

The Christian images express the same fundamental thought: that Christ is a divinity who is eaten in the Last Supper. His death transforms him into bread and wine, which we relish as mystical food. The relation of Agni to the soma-drink and of Dionysus to the wine should not pass without mention here. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 526

Another parallel is Samson's strangling of the lion, and the subsequent inhabitation of the dead lion by a swarm of bees, which gave rise to the riddle: "Out of the eater came forth meat, and out of the strong came forth sweetness." Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 526

The parallel to the motif of dying and rising again is that of being lost and found again. It appears ritually at exactly same place, in connection with the hierosgamos-like spring festivities, where the image of the god was hidden and then found again. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 531

There is an uncanonical tradition that Moses left his father's house at the age of twelve in order to instruct mankind. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 531

It is well known that Brünhilde, the Valkyrie, looked with favour on the brother-sister incest [of Sigmund and Sieglinde] that gave birth to Siegfried. But whereas Sieglinde is the human mother, Brünhilde acts the part of the symbolic mother, the "spirit-mother" (mother-imago), not as a persecutor, like Hera with the infant Heracles, but as a helper. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 555

The sin of incest, of which she makes herself guilty by her complicity, is the reason for her banishment by Wotan. Siegfried's birth from the sister-wife characterizes him as a Horus, the reborn sun, a reincarnation of the aging sun-god. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 555

The birth of the young sun, the god-man, stems from human partners, but they are really only vehicles for cosmic symbols. The spirit-mother therefore lends it her protection; she sends Sieglinde forth, with the child in her womb, on the night sea journey to the East. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 555

The persecution motif is not connected here with the mother, but with Wotan, as in the Linus legend, where the father is the vengeful pursuer. Brünhilde stands in a peculiar relation to her father Wotan. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 559

Brünhilde is a sort of "split-off" from Wotan, part of his personality, just as Pallas Athene was an emanation of Zeus. She is, as it were, Wotan's emissary or agent, and therefore corresponds to the angel of Yahweh, to the "eye of Ahura" or Vohu Manah, God's good thought in Persian legend, or to the Babylonian Nabu, the word of fate, or to Hermes, the messenger of the gods, whom the philosophers equated with Reason and Logos. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 560

In Assyria the role of Logos falls to the fire god, Gibil. That Wagner should have put the designs of so martial a god as Wotan into the hands of a feminine agent is somewhat remarkable, despite the Greek precedent of Pallas Athene Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 560

Wagner's Brünhilde is one of the numerous anima-figures who are attributed to masculine deities, and who without exception represent a dissociation in the masculine psychea "split-off" with a tendency to lead an obsessive existence of its own. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 563

This tendency to autonomy causes the anima to anticipate the thoughts and decisions of the masculine consciousness, with the result that the masculine consciousness is constantly confronted with unlooked-for situations which it has apparently done nothing to provoke. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 563

Brünhilde's sin was her support of Siegmund, but behind that lies the incest which was projected into the brother-sister pair Siegmund and Sieglinde. The symbolical meaning, however, is that Wotan, the father, has entered into his own daughter in order to rejuvenate himself. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 565

Wotan is justly indignant with Brünhilde, for she has taken over the role of Isis and through the birth of a son has deprived the old man of his power. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 565

Wotan beats off the first herald of doom, Siegmund, and smashes his sword, but Siegmund rises again in the grandson, Siegfried. And the instrument of fate is always the woman, who knows and reveals his secret thoughts; hence the impotent rage of Wotan, who cannot bring himself to recognize his own contradictory nature. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 565

At Siegfried's birth Sieglinde dies, as is proper. The foster-parent who brings him up is not a woman, but a chthonic god, Mime, a crippled dwarf who belongs to a race that has abjured love. Similarly, the god of the Egyptian underworld, the crippled shadow of Osiris (who underwent a sorry resurrection in Harpocrates), brings up the infant Horus to avenge the death of his father. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 566

Meanwhile Brünhilde lies in enchanted slumber on the mountain where Wotan has put her to sleep with the magic thorn (Edda), surrounded by a curtain of fire that keeps off all who approach and at the same time symbolizes the fiery longing of the hero for the forbidden goal. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 567

But Siegfried's conversation with the bird lures Fafner out of the cave. Siegfried's longing for the mother-imago has unwittingly exposed him to danger of looking back to his childhood and to the human mother, who immediately changes into the death-dealing dragon. He has conjured up the evil aspect of the unconscious, its devouring nature personified by the cave-dwelling terror of the woods. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 569

Fafner is the guardian of the treasure; in his cave lies the hoard, the source of life and power. The mother apparently possesses the libido of the son (the treasure she guards so jealously), and this is in fact true so long as the son remains unconscious of himself. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 569

In psychological ters this means that the "treasure hard to attain" lies hidden in the mother-imago, i.e., in the unconscious. This symbol points to one of life's secrets which is expressed in countless symbolical ways in mythology. When such symbols occur in individual dreams, they will be found on examination to be pointing to something like a centre of the total personality, of the psychic totality which consists of both conscious and unconscious.

Here I must refer the reader to my later works, where I deal at some length with the symbol of the Self. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 569

The rewards of this battle with Fafner are glowingly described in the Siegfried legend. According to the Edda, Siegfried eats Fafner's heart, the seat of life Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 569

He [Siegfried] wins the magic cap through whose power Alberich had changed himself into a serpentan allusion to the motif of rejuvenation by casting the skin. Another lucky cap is the caul that is occasionally found over the heads of new-born children. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 569

In addition, by drinking the dragon's blood Siegfried learns to understand the language of birds, and thus enjoys a peculiar relationship to nature, which he now dominates by knowledge. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 569

Cecrops was half snake, half man. In primitive times he was probably the snake of the Athenian citadel itself. As a buried god he was, like Erechtheus, a chthonic snake-deity. Above his subterranean dwelling rose the Parthenon, the temple of the virgin goddess. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 594

For psychology it makes a vast difference whether the Self is to be considered "of the same nature" as the Father, or merely "of a similar nature." The decision in favour of homoousia was of great psychological importance, for it asserted that Christ is of the same nature as God. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 612

Christ, from the point of view of psychology and comparative religion, is a typical manifestation of the Self. For psychology the Self is an imago Dei and cannot be distinguished from it empirically. The two ideas are therefore of the same nature. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 612

Although the religion and philosophy of India are largely dominated by the idea of homoousia, there is less danger in this direction because the Indian has an equally homoousian idea of God (Brahman), which is very definitely not the case with the Christian. The Christian has far too little introspection to be able to realize what modifications in his present conception of God the homoousia of the Self (Atman) would involve. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 612

As most people know, one of the basic principles of analytical psychology is that dream-images are to be understood symbolically; that is to say, one must not take them literally, but must surmise a hidden meaning in them. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 4.

We must begin by overcoming our virtuousness, with the justifiable fear of falling into vice on the other side. This danger certainly exists, for the greatest virtuousness is always compensated inwardly by a strong tendency to vice, and how many vicious characters treasure inside themselves sugary virtues and a moral megalomania. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 221

The psychic health of the adult individual, who in childhood was a mere particle revolving in a rotary system, demands that he should himself become the centre of a new system. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 644

That the highest summit of life can be expressed through the symbolism of death is a well-known fact, for any growing beyond oneself means death. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 432

I do not take kindly to the argument that because certain working hypotheses may not possess eternal validity or may possibly be erroneous, they must be withheld from the public. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 685

I do not regard the pursuit of science as a bickering about who is right, but as an endeavour to augment and deepen human knowledge. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 685

The world comes into being when man discovers it. But he only discovers it when he sacrifices his containment in the primal mother, the original state of unconsciousness. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 652

Fear of our erotic fate is quite understandable, for there is something unpredictable about it. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 101

Symbols are not allegories and not signs; they are images of contents which for the most part transcend consciousness. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 114

The dream, we would say, originates in an unknown part of the psyche and prepares the dreamer for the events of the following day. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 5

One such successful interpretation has been, for instance, Mother Church, but once this form begins to show signs of age and decay a new interpretation becomes inevitable. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 351

The religious interest, which ought normally to be the greatest and most decisive factor, turned away from the inner world, and great figures of dogma dwindled to strange and incomprehensible vestiges, a prey to every sort of criticism. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 113.

One might expect, perhaps, that a man of genius would luxuriate in the greatness of his own thoughts and renounce the cheap approbation of the rabble he despises; yet he succumbs to the more powerful impulse of the herd instinct. His seeking and his finding, his heart's cry, are meant for the herd and must be heeded by them. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 14

We quite forget that we can be as deplorably overcome by a virtue as by a vice. There is a sort of frenzied, orgiastic virtuousness which is just as infamous as a vice and leads to just as much injustice and violence. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 222

The wounding and painful shafts do not come from outside, through gossip which only pricks us only on the surface, but from the ambush of our own unconscious. It is our own repressed desires that stick like arrows in our flesh. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 438

Just as our bodies still retain vestiges of obsolete functions and conditions in many of their organs, so our minds, which have apparently outgrown those archaic impulses, still bear the marks of the evolutionary stages we have traversed and re-echo the dim bygone in dreams and fantasies. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 36

Therefore the sun is perfectly suited to represent the visible God of this world, i.e.,

the creative power of our own soul, which we call libido, and whose nature it is to bring forth the useful and to bring forth the useful and the harmful, the good and the bad. Carl Jung; CW 5, Para 176.

Purusha is evidently a sort of Platonic world-soul who surrounds the earth from outside: "Being born he overtopped the world before, behind, and in all places" (Rig-Veda) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 649

As the all-encompassing world-soul Purusha has a maternal character, for he represents the original "dawn state" of the psyche: he is the encompasser and the encompassed, mother and unborn child, an undifferentiated, unconscious state of primal being Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 650

As such a condition must be terminated, and as it is at the same time an object of regressive longing, it must be sacrificed in order that discriminated entities i.e., conscious contents may come into being. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 650

The foregoing passage is very remarkable. If one attempted to put this mythologem on the Procrustean bed of logic sore violence would be done to it. How on earth ordinary "sages" come to be sacrificing the primal being side by side with the gods is an utterly fantastic conception, quite apart from the fact that in the beginning (i.e., before the sacrifice) nothing existed except the primal being! Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 651

But if this primal being [Purusha] means the great mystery of the original psychic state, then everything becomes clear: Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 651

It is evident that by this is meant not a physical, but a psychological cosmogony. The world comes into being when man discovers it. But he only discovers it when he sacrifices his containment in the primal mother, the original state of unconsciousness Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 652

The intellect is its progenitor and father, and what the intellect conceives the world-soul brings to birth in reality. "What lies enclosed in the intellect comes to birth in the world-soul as Logos, fills it with meaning and makes it drunken as if with nectar" (Plotinus, Enneads, III, 5, 9.) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 198

Nectar, like soma, is the drink of fertility and immortality. The soul is fructified by the intellect; as the "oversoul" it is called the heavenly Aphrodite, as the "under-soul" the earthly Aphrodite. It knows "the pangs of birth." It is not without reason that the dove of Aphrodite is the symbol of the Holy Ghost Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 198

Certain early Christian sects gave a maternal significance to the Holy Ghost (world-soul or moon) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 198

But, on the other hand, "love" is an extreme example of anthropomorphism and, together with hunger, the immemorial psychic driving-force of humanity Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 97

Love is, psychologically considered, a function of relationship on the one hand and a feeling-toned psychic condition on the other, which, as we have seen, practically coincides with the God-image  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 97

There can be no doubt that love has an instinctual determinant; it is an activity peculiar to mankind, and, if the language of religion defines God as “love,” there is always the great danger of confusing the love which works in man with the workings of God  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 97

This is an obvious instance of the above-mentioned fact that the archetype is inextricably interwoven with the individual psyche, so that the greatest care is needed to differentiate the collective type, at least conceptually, from the personal psyche  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 97

In practice, however, this differentiation is not without danger if human “love” is thought of as the prerequisite for the divine presence (I John 4:12)  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 97

“Love,” in the experience of psychology, proves to be the power of fate par excellence, whether it manifests itself as base concupiscentia or as the most spiritual affection. It is one of the mightiest movers of humanity  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 98

If it is conceived as “divine,” this designation falls to it with absolute right, since the mightiest force in the psyche has always been described as “God.”  Whether we believe in God or not, whether we marvel or curse, the word “God” is always on our lips  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 98

Anything psychically powerful is invariably called “God.”  At the same time “God” is set over against man and expressly set apart from him  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 98

This means, psychologically, that the libido, regarded as the force of desire and aspiration, as psychic energy in the widest sense, stands in part at the disposal of the ego, and in part confronts the ego autonomously, sometimes influencing it so powerfully that it is either put in a position of unwilling constraint, or else discovers in the libido itself a new and unexpected source of strength  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 98

Just as Christ left behind his redeeming blood, a true pharmakon athanasias in the wine, so Agni is the soma, the holy drink of inspiration, the mead of immortality CW 5 Para 246

Soma and fire are identical in Vedic literature.  The ancient Hindus saw fire both as a symbol of Agni and as an emanation of the inner libido-fire, and for them the same psychic dynamism was at work in the intoxicating drink (“fire-water,” Soma-Agni as rain and fire). The Vedic definition of soma as “seminal fluid” confirms this view  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 246

‘The “somatic” significance of Agni has its parallel in the Christian interpretation of the Eucharistic Blood as the body of Christ  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 246

Soma is also the “nourishing drink.”  Its mythological characteristics coincide with those of fire, and so both are united in Agni.  The drink of immortality, Amrita, was stirred by the Hindu gods like the fire.  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 247

The Sanskrit word for fire is agnis (Lat.  ignis), personified as Agni, the god of fire, a divine mediator whose symbolism has certain affinities with Christian ideas CW 5 Para 239

Agni, fire, was worshipped as a golden-winged bird Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 271

After the birth of Buddha, the four genies of the East, West, North, and South come to offer their services as palanquin-bearers. To complete the symbolism, there is in the Buddha myth, besides the fertilization by star and wind, fertilization by a theriomorphic symbol, the elephant, who, as Bodhisattva, begets the Buddha. In Christian picture-language the unicorn, as well as the dove, is a symbol of the spermatic Word or Spirit Carl Jung, CW 5, Ser: 1

As Otto Rank has shown with a wealth of examples, the hero is frequently exposed and then reared by foster-parents. In this way he gets two mothers Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 494

An excellent example of this is the relation of Heracles to Hera. In the Hiawatha epic, Wenonah dies after giving birth, and her place is taken by Nokomis. Buddha, too, was brought up by a foster-mother Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 494

The foster-mother is sometimes an animal, e.g., the she-wolf mother of Romulus and Remus, etc. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 494

The light and fire attributes depict the intensity of the feeling-tone and are therefore expressions for the psychic energy which manifests itself as libido Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 128

If one worships God, sun, or fire, one is worshipping intensity and power, in other words the phenomenon of psychic energy as such, the libido. Every force and every phenomenon is a special form of energy Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 128

Form is both an image and a mode of manifestation. It expresses two things: the energy which takes shape in it, and the medium in which that energy appears. On the one hand one can say that energy creates its own image, and on the other hand that the character of the medium forces it into a definite form Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 128

One man will derive the idea of God from the sun, another will maintain that it is the but feelings it arouses which give the sun its godlike significance. The former, by attitude and temperament, believes more in the causal nexus of the environment, the latter more in the spontaneity of psychic experience Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 128

Since, psychologically speaking, the God-image is a complex of ideas of an archetypal nature, it must necessarily be regarded as representing a certain sum of energy (libido) which appears in projection Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 89

In most of the existing religions it seems that the formative factor which creates the attributes of divinity is the father-imago, while in older religions it was the mother-imago. These attributes are omnipotence, a sternly persecuting paternalism ruling through fear (Old Testament), and loving paternalism (New Testament) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 89

In certain pagan conceptions of divinity the maternal element is strongly emphasized, and there is also a wide development of the animal or theriomorphic element. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 89

The God-concept is not only an image, but an elemental force. The primitive power which Job's Hymn of Creation vindicates, absolute and inexorable, unjust and superhuman, is a genuine and authentic attribute of the natural power of instinct and fate which "leads us into life," which makes "all the world become guilty before God" (Romans 3:19), and against which all struggle is in vain. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 89

The archetype of the wise old man first appears in the father, being a personification of meaning and spirit in its procreative sense Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 515

The hero's father is often a master carpenter or some kind of artisan. According to an Arabian legend, Terah, the father of Abraham, was a master craftsman who could cut a shaft from any bit of wood, which means in Arabic usage that he was a begetter of excellent sons. In addition, he was a maker of images Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 515

Tvashtri, the father of Agni, was the cosmic architect, a smith and carpenter, and the inventor of fire-boring Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 515

Joseph, the father of Jesus, was a carpenter, and so was Cinyras, the father of Adonis, who was supposed to have invented the hammer, the lever, roof-building and mining Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 515

The father of the many-faced Hermes, Hephaestus, was a cunning technician and sculptor 'Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 515

In fairytales, the hero's father is, more modestly, the traditional woodcutter Carl Jung, CW 5 Para 515

In the Rig-Veda the world is hewn from a tree by the cosmic architect, Tvashtri CW 5, Para 515

To say that Hiawatha's father-in-law was an arrowsmith means, therefore, that the mythological attribute otherwise characteristic of the hero's father has been transferred to the father-in-law. This corresponds to the psychological fact that the anima always stands in the relationship of a daughter to the wise old man. Nor is it uncommon to find the father-in-law so much emphasized that he replaces the real father Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 515

Finally, father-attributes may occasionally fall to the son himself, i.e., when it has become apparent that he is of one nature with the father. The hero symbolizes a man's unconscious Self, and this manifest itself empirically as the sum total of all archetypes and therefore includes the archetype of the father and of the wise old man. To that extent the hero is his own father and his own begetter Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 516

This combination of motifs can be found in the legend of Mani. He performs his great deeds as a religious teacher, then goes into hiding for years in a cave, dies, and is skinned, stuffed, and hung up. Besides that, he is an artist and has a crippled foot. There is a similar combination of motifs in Wieland the Smith Carl Jung, CW 5. Para 516

The hero himself appears as a being of more than human stature. He is distinguished from the very beginning by his godlike characteristics Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 612

Since he is psychologically an archetype of the Self, his divinity only confirms that the Self is numinous, a sort of god, or having some share in the divine nature Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 612

The hero is the protagonist of God's transformation in man; he corresponds to what I call the "mana personality." The mana personality has such an immense fascination for the conscious mind that the ego all too easily succumbs to the temptation to identify with the hero, thus bringing on a psychic inflation with all its consequences. For this reason the repugnance felt by certain ecclesiastical circles for the "inner Christ" is understandable enough, at least as a preventive measure against the danger of psychic inflation which threatens the Christian European Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 612

Heroes are usually wanderers, and wandering is a symbol of longing, of the restless urge which never finds its object, of nostalgia for the lost mother. The sun comparison can easily be taken in this sense: the heroes are like the wandering sun, from which it is concluded that the myth of the hero is a solar myth Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 299

It seems to us, rather, that he is first and foremost a self-representation of the longing of the unconscious, of its unquenched and unquenchable desire for the light of consciousness. But consciousness, continually in danger of being led astray by its own light and of becoming a rootless will o' the wisp, longs for the healing power of nature, for the deep wells of being and for unconscious communion with life in all its countless forms Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 299

It is not man as such who has to be regenerated or born again as a renewed whole, but, according to the statements of mythology, it is the hero or god who rejuvenates himself. These figures are generally expressed or characterized by libido-symbols (light, fire, sun, etc.), so that it looks as if they represented psychic energy. They are, in fact, personifications of the libido Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 388

The hero is a hero just because he sees resistance to the forbidden goal in all life's difficulties and yet fights that resistance with the whole-hearted yearning that strives towards the treasure hard to attain, and perhaps unattainable a yearning that paralyses and kills the ordinary man Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 510

The hero is an extraordinary being who is inhabited by a daemon, and it is this that makes him a hero. That is why the mythological statements about heroes are so typical and so impersonal Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 536

Taken purely as a psychologem the hero represents the positive, favourable action of the unconscious, while the dragon is its negative and unfavourable action not birth, but a devouring, not a beneficial and constructive deed, but greedy retention and destruction. (cf. fig. 035) and (fig. 030) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 580

He is the one who has the great longing for an understanding soul-mate Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 465

He is the seeker who survives the adventures which the conscious personality studiously avoids Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 465

He it is who, with a magnificent gesture, offers his breast to the slings and arrows of a hostile world, and displays the courage which is so sadly lacking to the conscious mind Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 465

He is the measure against which the man who comes in contact with such a woman is compared with, being relentlessly set up as the ideal who receives direct punishment from her should he ever be otherwise 'Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 465

The animus, a typical "son"-hero, true to his ancient prototype, is seeking the mother. This youthful hero is always the son-lover of the mother-goddess and is doomed to an early death (fig. 020) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 466

The libido that will not flow into life at the right time regresses to the mythical world of the archetypes, where it activates images which, since the remotest times, have expressed the non-human life of the gods, whether of the upper world or the lower Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 466

He is therefore sure of his success and cuts out all possible rivals. He wins the soul of the dreamer, not in order to lead her back to normal life, but to her spiritual destiny Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 468

For he is a bridegroom of death, one of the son-lovers who die young because they have no life of their own but are only fast-fading flowers on the maternal tree. Their meaning and their vitality begin and end in the mother-goddess Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 468

The answer to this question is that the hero is not born like an ordinary mortal because his birth is a rebirth from the mother-wife. That is why the hero so often has two mothers Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 494

One would think it possible for a hero to be born in the normal manner, and then gradually to grow out of his humble and homely surroundings, perhaps with a great effort and in face of many dangers. (This motif is by no means uncommon in the hero-myths) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 493

As a general rule, however, the story of his origins is miraculous. The singular circumstances of his procreation and birth are part and parcel of the hero-myth. What is the reason for these beliefs? Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 493

As Rank (The Myth of the Birth of the Hero), has shown with a wealth of examples, the hero is frequently exposed and then reared by foster-parents. In this way he gets two mothers Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 494

An excellent example of this is the relation of Heracles to Hera. In the Hiawatha epic, Wenonah dies after giving birth, and her place is taken by Nokomis. Buddha, too, was brought up by a foster-mother Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 494

The world is not a garden of God the Father, it is also a place of horror. Not only is heaven no father and earth no mother and men are not brothers, but they represent as many hostile destructive forces to which we are the more surely delivered over the more confidently and thoughtlessly we entrust ourselves to the so-called fatherly hand of God.

Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 224

Nothing remains for mankind but to work in harmony with this will. To work in harmony with the libido does not mean letting oneself drift with it, for the psychic forces have no uniform direction, but are often directly opposed to one another. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 89

A mere letting go of oneself leads in the shortest space of time to the most hopeless confusion. It is often difficult, if not impossible, to feel the ground current and to know the true direction; at any rate collisions, conflicts, and mistakes are scarcely avoidable. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 89

We thus arrive at the objectionable conclusion that, from the psychological point of view, the God-image is a real but subjective phenomenon. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 129

This "game with oneself" is anything but ridiculous; on the contrary, it is extremely important. To carry a god around in yourself means a great deal; it is guarantee of happiness, or power, and even of omnipotence, in so far as these are attributes of divinity. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 130

To carry a god within oneself is practically the same as being God oneself. In Christianity, despite the weeding out of the most grossly sensual ideas and symbols, we can still find traces of this psychology. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 130

The idea of "becoming a god" is even more obvious in the pagan mystery cults, where the neophyte, after initiation, is himself lifted up to divine status: at the conclusion of the consecration rites in the syncretistic Isis mysteries he was crowned with a crown of palm leaves, set up on a pedestal, and worshipped as Helios. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 130

When man becomes God, his importance and power are enormously increased. That seems to have been its main purpose: to strengthen the individual against his all-too-human weakness and insecurity in personal life. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 134

But the strengthening of his power-consciousness is only the outward effect of his becoming God; far more important are the deeper lying processes in the realm of feeling. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 134

For whoever introverts libido, i.e., withdraws it from the external object, suffers the necessary consequences of introversion: the libido, which is turned inwards, into the subject, reverts to the individual past and digs up from the treasure-house of memory those images glimpsed long ago, which bring back the time when the world was a full and rounded whole. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 134

First and foremost are the memories of childhood, among them the imagos of father and mother. These are unique and imperishable, and in adult life not many difficulties are needed to reawaken those memories and make them active. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 134

The regressive reactivation of the father and mother imagos plays an important role in religion. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 134

The benefits of religion are equivalent, in their effects, to the parental care lavished upon the child, and religious feelings are rooted in unconscious memories of certain tender emotions in early infancy memories of archetypal intuitions. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 134

The sun is the only truly "rational" image of God, whether we adopt the standpoint of the primitive savage or of modern science Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 176

In either case the sun is the father-god from whom all living things draw life; he is the fructifier and creator, the source of energy for our world. Carl Jung, CW 5. Para 176

The discord into which the human soul has fallen can be harmoniously resolved through the sun as a natural object which knows no inner conflict. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 176

The sun is not only beneficial, but also destructive; hence the zodiacal sign for August heat is the ravaging lion which Samson slew in order to rid the parched earth of its torment. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 176

Yet it is the nature of the sun to scorch, and its scorching power seems natural to man. It shines equally on the just and the unjust and allows useful creatures to flourish as well as the harmful. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 176

The chthonic god was in all probability a snake that was housed in a cave and was fed with (fig. 258.57b). In the Asclepieia of the later period the sacred snakes were hardly ever visible, so they may have existed only figuratively Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 577

Here the serpent lies on the treasury as protector of the hoard. Fear of the deadly maternal womb has become the guardian of the treasure of life. That the snake really is a death-symbol is evident from the fact that the souls of the dead, like the chthonic gods, appear as serpents, as dwellers in the kingdom of the deadly mother Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 578

Thus the crevice at Delphi with the Castalian spring was the habitation of the chthonic Python who was vanquished by the sun-hero Apollo. The Python, incited by Hera, had pursued Apollo's mother, Leto, when he was still in her womb; but she fled to the floating island of Delos on a "night sea journey" and was there safely delivered of her child, who later slew the Python Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 577

In Hierapolis (Edessa) a temple was built over the earth where the flood subsided, and in Jerusalem the foundation-stone of the temple was laid over the great abyss, in the same way that Christian churches are often built over caves, grottoes, wells, etc. Carl Jung, CW 5. Para 577

We find the same motif in the Grotto of Mithras and the various other cave-cults, including the Christian catacombs, which owe their importance not to legendary persecutions but to the cult of the dead Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 577

Even the burial of the dead in consecrated ground ("garden of the dead," cloisters, crypts, etc.) is a rendering back to the mother with the hope of resurrection which such burials presuppose Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 577

Hence the Attic custom of giving the dead man the (same as, honey-cakes), with which to pacify the hound of hell, the three-headed monster guarding the door of the underworld Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 577

I have had occasion to observe, in the course of my daily professional work [that] a dream, often of visionary clarity, occurs about the time of the onset of the illness or shortly before, which imprints itself indelibly on the mind and, when analyzed, reveals to the patient a hidden meaning that anticipates the subsequent events of his life. Carl Jung; CW 5; para 78

A substitute for the gifts seems to have been the obolus given to Charon, which is why Rohde calls him the second Cerberus, akin to the jackal-headed Anubis of the Egyptians. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 577

The dog and the underworld serpent are identical. In the Greek tragedies the Erinyes are serpents as well as dogs; the monsters Typhon and Echidna are parents of the Hydra, of the dragon of the Hesperides, and of the Gorgon; they also spawned the dogs Cerberus, Orthros, and Scylla. Snakes and dogs are guardians of the treasure Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 577

It is hard to believe that this teeming world is too poor to provide an object for human love - it offers boundless opportunities to everyone. It is rather the inability to love which robs a person of these opportunities. The world is empty only to him who does not know how to direct his libido towards things and people, and to render them alive and beautiful. What compels us to create a substitute from within ourselves is not an external lack, but our own inability to include anything outside ourselves in our love. Certainly the difficulties and adversities of the struggle for existence may oppress us, yet even the worst conditions need not hinder love; on the contrary, they often spur us on to greater efforts. Carl Jung, CW 5, 253.

We have, therefore, two kinds of thinking: directed thinking, and dreaming or fantasy-thinking. The former operates with speech elements for the purpose of communication and is difficult and exhausting; the latter is effortless, working as it were spontaneously, with the contents ready to hand, and guided by unconscious motives. The one produces innovations and adaptation, copies reality, and tries to act upon it; the other turns away from reality, sets free subjective tendencies, and as regards adaptation, is unproductive Carl Jung, CW 5, para. 20.

What he is describing here is the libido, which is not only creative and procreative, but possesses an intuitive faculty, a strange power to "smell the right place," almost as if it were a live creature with an independent life of its own (which is why it is so easily personified). It is purposive, like sexuality itself, a favorite object of comparison. Carl Jung; CW 5, Para. 182.

The sun is not only beneficial, but also destructive; hence the zodiacal sign for August heat is the ravaging lion which Samson slew in order to rid the parched earth of its torment. Yet it is in the nature of the sun to scorch, and its scorching power seems natural to man. It shines equally on the just and the unjust and allows useful creatures to flourish as well as the harmful. Carl Jung; CW 5, para 176.

Numerous mythological and philosophical attempts have been made to formulate and visualize the creative force which man knows only by subjective experience. To give but a few examples, I would remind the reader of the cosmogonic significance of Eros in Hesiod, and also of the Orphic figure of Phanes, the 'Shining One,' the first-born, the 'Father of Eros.'

In Orphic terms, Phanes also denotes Priapos, a god of love, androgynous, and equal to the Theban Dionysus Lysios. The Orphic meaning of Phanes is the same as that of the Indian Kama, the God of love, which is also a cosmogonic principle. Carl Jung, CW 5, para. 198.

Our civilization enormously underestimates the importance of sexuality, but just because of the repressions imposed upon it, sexuality breaks through into every conceivable field where it does not belong and uses such an indirect mode of expression that we may expect to meet it all of a sudden practically everywhere. Thus the very idea of an intimate understanding of the human psyche, which is actually a very pure and beautiful thing, becomes besmirched and perversely distorted by the intrusion of an indirect sexual meaning. A direct and spontaneous expression of sexuality is a natural occurrence and, as such, never ugly or repulsive. It is "moral" repression that makes sexuality on the one hand dirty and hypocritical, and on the other shameless and blatant. This secondary significance, or rather the misuse which the repressed and suborned sexuality makes of the highest psychic functions, gives certain of our opponents an opportunity to sniff out the prurient eroticism of the confessional in psychoanalysis. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 295

An individual is infantile because he has freed himself insufficiently, or not at all, from his childish environment and his adaptation to his parents, with the result that he has a false reaction to the world on the one hand he reacts as a child towards his parents, always demanding love and immediate emotional rewards, while on the other hand he is so identified with his parents through his close ties with them that he behaves like his father or his mother. He is incapable of living his own life and finding the character that belongs to him. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 431

It is not possible to live too long amid infantile surroundings, or in the bosom of the family, without endangering one's psychic health. Life calls us forth to independence, and anyone who does not heed this call because of childish laziness or timidity is threatened with neurosis. And once this has broken out, it becomes an increasingly valid reason for running away from life and remaining forever in the morally poisonous atmosphere of infancy. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 461

If we wish to stay on the heights we have reached, we must struggle all the time to consolidate our consciousness and its attitude. But we soon discover that this praiseworthy and apparently unavoidable battle with the years leads to stagnation and desiccation of soul. Our convictions become platitudes ground out on a barrel-organ, our ideals become starchy habits, enthusiasm stiffens into automatic gestures. The source of the water of life seeps away. We ourselves may not notice it, but everybody else does, and that is even more painful. If we should risk a little introspection, coupled perhaps with an energetic attempt to be honest for once with ourselves, we may get a dim idea of all the wants, longings, and fears that have accumulated down there—a repulsive and sinister sight. The mind shies away, but life wants to flow down into the depths. Fate itself seems to preserve us from this, for each of us tends to become an immovable pillar of the past. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 553

For all these things have taken on shape, and all shapes are worn thin by the working of time; they age, sicken, crumble to dust—unless they change. But change they can, for the invisible spark that generated them is potent enough for infinite generation. No one should deny the danger of the descent, but it can be risked. No one need risk it, but it is certain that some will. And let those who go down the sunset way do so with open eyes, for it is a sacrifice which daunts even the gods. Yet every descent is followed by an ascent; the vanishing shapes are shaped anew, and a truth is valid in the end only if it suffers change and bears witness in new images, in new tongues, like a new wine that is put into new bottles. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 553

Nature has the primary claim on mankind, and only long after that comes the luxury of reason. The medieval ideal of a life lived for death should gradually be replaced by a more natural attitude to life, in which the natural claims of man are fully acknowledged, so that the desires of the animal sphere need no longer drag down the higher values of the spiritual sphere in order to be able to function at all. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 295

What aroused a feeling of horror in the Greeks still remains true, but it is true for us only if we give up the vain illusion that we are different, i.e., morally better, than the ancients. We have merely succeeded in forgetting that an indissoluble link binds us to the men of antiquity. This truth opens the way to an understanding of the classical spirit such as has never existed before—the way of inner sympathy on the one hand and of intellectual comprehension on the other. By penetrating into the blocked subterranean passages of our own psyches we grasp the living meaning of classical civilization, and at the same time we establish a firm foothold outside our own culture from which alone it is possible to gain an objective understanding of its foundations. That at least is the hope we draw from the rediscovery of the immortality of the Oedipus problem. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 1

People who strive to be excessively ethical, who always think, feel, and act altruistically and idealistically, avenge themselves for their intolerable ideals by a subtly planned maliciousness, of which they are naturally not conscious as such, but which leads to misunderstandings and unhappy situations. All these difficulties appear to them as "especially unfortunate circumstances," or the fault and the malice of other people, or as tragic complications. Consciously they imagine they are rid of the conflict, but it is still there, unseen, to be stumbled over at every step. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 62

The essential thing is that we should be able to stand up to our judgment of ourselves. From outside this attitude looks like self-righteousness, but it is so only if we are incapable of criticizing ourselves. If we can exercise self-criticism, criticism from outside will affect us only on the outside and not pierce to the heart, for we feel that we have a sterner critic within us than any who could judge us from without. And anyway, there are as many opinions as there are heads to think them. We come to realize that our own judgment has as much value as the judgment of others. One cannot please everybody; therefore it is better to be at peace with oneself. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 911

All through our lives we possess, side by side with our newly acquired directed and adapted thinking, a fantasy thinking which corresponds to the antique state of mind. Just as our bodies still retain vestiges of obsolete functions and conditions in many of their organs, so our minds, which have apparently outgrown those archaic impulses, still bear the marks of the evolutionary stages we have traversed and re-echo the dim bygone in dreams and fantasies. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 36

It would be a ridiculous and unwarranted assumption on our part if we imagined that we were more energetic or more intelligent than the men of the past. Our material knowledge has increased, but not our intelligence. This means that we are just as bigoted in regard to new ideas, and just as impervious to them, as people were in the darkest days of antiquity. We have become rich in knowledge, but poor in wisdom. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 23

The world changes its face —tempora mutantur et nos mutamur in illis—for we can grasp the world only as a psychic image in ourselves, and it is not always easy to decide, when the image changes, whether the world or ourselves have changed, or both. The picture of the world can change at any time, just as our conception of ourselves changes. Every new discovery, every new thought, can put a new face on the world. We must be prepared for this, else we suddenly find ourselves in an antiquated world, itself a relic of lower levels of consciousness. We shall all be as good as dead one day, but in the interests of life we should postpone this moment as long as possible, and this we can only do by never allowing our picture of the world to become rigid. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 700

If we do not fashion for ourselves a picture of the world, we do not see ourselves either, who are the faithful reflections of that world. Only when mirrored in our picture of the world can we see ourselves in the round. Only in our creative acts do we step forth into the light and see ourselves whole and complete. Never shall we put any face on the world other than our own, and we have to do this precisely in order to find ourselves. For higher than science or art as an end in itself stands man, the creator of his instruments. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 737

In the same way one can withhold the material content of primitive myths from a child but not take from him the need for mythology, and still less his ability to manufacture it for himself. One could almost say that if all the world's traditions were cut off at a single blow, the whole of mythology and the whole history of religion would start all over again with the next generation. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 30

The conscious mind must have reason, firstly to discover some order in the chaos of disorderly individual events occurring in the world, and secondly to create order, at least in human affairs. We are moved by the laudable and useful ambition to extirpate the chaos of the irrational both within and without to the best of our ability. Apparently the process has gone pretty far. As a mental patient once told me: "Doctor, last night I disinfected the whole heavens with bichloride of mercury, but I found no God." Something of the sort has happened to us as well. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 104A

The myth of the hero is first and foremost a self-representation of the longing of the unconscious, of its unquenched and unquenchable desire for the light of consciousness. But consciousness, continually in danger of being led astray by its own light and of becoming a rootless will o'the wisp, longs for the healing power of nature, for the deep wells of being and for unconscious communion with life in all its countless forms. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 299

People often behave as if they did not rightly understand what constitutes the destructive character of the creative force. A woman who gives herself up to passion, particularly under present-day civilized conditions, experiences this all too soon. We must think a little beyond the framework of purely bourgeois moral conditions to understand the feeling of boundless uncertainty which befalls the man who gives himself over unconditionally to fate. Even to be fruitful is to destroy oneself, for with the creation of a new generation the previous generation has passed beyond its climax. Our offspring thus become our most dangerous enemies, with whom we cannot get even, for they will survive us and so inevitably will take the power out of our weakening hands. Fear of our erotic fate is quite understandable, for there is something unpredictable about it. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 101

Fear of fate is a very understandable phenomenon, for it is incalculable, immeasurable, full of unknown dangers. The perpetual hesitation of the neurotic to launch out into life is readily explained by his desire to stand aside so as not to get involved in the dangerous struggle for existence. But anyone who refuses to experience life must stifle his desire to live—in other words, he must commit partial suicide. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 165

Flight from life does not exempt us from the laws of old age and death. The neurotic who tries to wriggle out of the necessity of living wins nothing and only burdens himself with a constant foretaste of aging and dying, which must appear especially cruel on account of the total emptiness and meaninglessness of his life. If it is not possible for the libido to strive forwards, to lead a life that willingly accepts all dangers and ultimate decay, then it strikes back along the other road and sinks into its own depths, working down to the old intimation of the immortality of all that lives, to the old longing for rebirth. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 617

The sun, rising triumphant, tears himself from the enveloping womb of the sea, and leaving behind him the noonday zenith and all its glorious works, sinks down again into the maternal depths, into all-enfolding and all regenerating night. This image is undoubtedly a primordial one, and there was profound justification for its becoming a symbolical expression of human fate: in the morning of life the son tears himself loose from the mother, from the domestic hearth, to rise through battle to his destined heights. Always he imagines his worst enemy in front of him, yet he carries the enemy within himself—a deadly longing for the abyss, a longing to drown in his own source, to be sucked down to the realm of the Mothers. His life is a constant struggle against extinction, a violent yet fleeting deliverance from ever-lurking night. This death is no external enemy, it is his own inner longing for the stillness and profound peace of all-knowing non-existence, for all-seeing sleep in the ocean of coming-to-be and passing away. Even in his highest strivings for harmony and balance, for the profundities of philosophy and the raptures of the artist, he seeks death, immobility, satiety, rest. If, like Peirithous, he tarries too long in this abode of rest and peace, he is overcome by apathy, and the poison of the serpent paralyses him for all time. If he is to live, he must fight and sacrifice his longing for the past in order to rise to his own heights. And having reached the noonday heights, he must sacrifice his love for his own achievement, for he may not loiter. The sun, too, sacrifices its greatest strength in order to hasten onward to the fruits of autumn, which are the seeds of rebirth. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 553

When the libido leaves the bright upper world, whether from choice, or from inertia, or from fate, it sinks back into its own depths, into the source from which it originally flowed, and returns to the point of cleavage, the navel, where it first entered the body. This point of cleavage is called the mother, because from her the current of life reached us. Whenever some great work is to be accomplished, before which a man recoils, doubtful of his strength, his libido streams back to the fountainhead—and that is the dangerous moment when the issue hangs between annihilation and new life. For if the libido gets stuck in the wonderland of this inner world, then for the upper world man is nothing but a shadow, he is already moribund or at least seriously ill. But if the libido manages to tear itself loose and force its way up again, something like a miracle happens: the journey to the underworld was a plunge into the fountain of youth, and the libido, apparently dead, wakes to renewed fruitfulness. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 449

To the degree that the modern mind is passionately concerned with anything and everything rather than religion, religion and its prime object—original sin—have mostly vanished into the unconscious. That is why, today, nobody believes in either. People accuse psychology of dealing in squalid fantasies, and yet even a cursory glance at ancient religions and the history of morals should be sufficient to convince them of the demons hidden in the human soul. This disbelief in the devilishness of human nature goes hand in hand with a blank incomprehension of religion and its meaning. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 106

At a time when a large part of mankind is beginning to discard Christianity, it may be worth our while to try to understand why it was accepted in the first place. It was accepted as a means of escape from the brutality and unconsciousness of the ancient world. As soon as we discard it, the old brutality returns in force, as has been made overwhelmingly clear by contemporary events. We have had bitter experience of what happens when a whole nation finds the moral mask too stupid to keep up. The beast breaks loose, and a frenzy of demoralization sweeps over the civilized world. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 341

The conflict between horse and snake or bull and snake represents a conflict within the libido itself, a striving forward and backwards at one and the same time. It is as if the libido were not only a ceaseless forward movement, an unending will for life, evolution, creation, such as Schopenhauer envisaged in his cosmic Will, where death is a mishap or fatality coming from outside; like the sun, the libido also wills its own descent, its own involution. During the first half of life it strives for growth; during the second half, softly at first and then ever more perceptibly, it points towards an altered goal. And just as in youth the urge for limitless expansion often lies hidden under veiling layers of resistance to life, so that "other urge" often hides behind an obstinate and purposeless cleaving to life in its old form. This apparent contradiction in the nature of the libido is illustrated by a statue of Priapus in the archaeological museum at Verona: Priapus, with a sidelong smile, points with his finger to a snake biting his phallus. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 680

"The demands of the unconscious act at first like a paralysing poison on a man's energy and resourcefulness, so that it may well be compared to the bite of a poisonous snake. Apparently it is a hostile demon who robs him of energy, but in actual fact it is his own unconscious whose alien tendencies are beginning to check the forward striving of the conscious mind. The cause of this process is often extremely obscure, the more so as it is complicated by all kinds of external factors and subsidiary causes, such as difficulties in work, disappointments, failures, reduced efficiency due to age, depressing family problems, and so on and so forth. According to the myths it is the woman who secretly enslaves a man, so that he can no longer free himself from her and becomes a child again. It is also significant that Isis, the sister-wife of the sun-god, creates the poisonous serpent from his spittle, which, like all bodily secretions, has a magical significance, being a libido equivalent. She creates the serpent from the libido of the god, and by this means weakens him and makes him dependent on her. Delilah acts in the same way with Samson: by cutting off his hair, the sun's rays, she robs him of his strength. This demon-woman of mythology is in truth the "sister-wife-mother," the woman in the man, who unexpectedly turns up during the second half of life and tries to effect a forcible change of personality. I have dealt with certain aspects of this change in my essay on "The Stages of Life." It consists in a partial feminization of the man and a corresponding masculinization of the woman. Often it takes place under very dramatic circumstances: the man's strongest quality, his Logos principle, turns against him and as it were betrays him. The same thing happens with the Eros of the woman. The man becomes rigidly set in his previous attitude, while the woman remains caught in her emotional ties and fails to develop her reason and understanding, whose place is then taken by equally obstinate and inept "animus" opinions. The fossilization of the man shrouds itself in a smoke-screen of moods, ridiculous irritability, feelings of distrust and resentment, which are meant to justify his rigid attitude. A perfect example of this type of psychology is Schreber's account of his own psychosis, Memoirs of My Nervous Illness. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 458

But what we have here is a masculine figure which, in view of the role it plays in the Miller fantasies, must be regarded as a personification of the masculine component of the woman's personality. (Cf. pi. xvii.) In my later writings I have called this personification the "animus." Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 267

The mother's influence is mainly on the Eros of her son; therefore it was only logical that Oedipus should end up by marrying his mother. But the father exerts his influence on the mind or spirit of his daughter—on her "Logos." This he does by increasing her intellectuality, often to a pathological degree which in my later writings I have described as "animus possession. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 272

The man becomes rigidly set in his previous attitude, while the woman remains caught in her emotional ties and fails to develop her reason and understanding, whose place is then taken by equally obstinate and inept "animus" opinions. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 458

Chiwantopel is a typical animus-figure, that is to say, a personification of the masculine side of the woman's psyche. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 462

It is all up with the man whom the whims of fortune bring into contact with this infantile woman: he will at once be made identical with her animus-hero and relentlessly set up as the ideal figure, threatened with the direst punishments should he ever make a face that shows the least departure from the ideal! Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 465

The animus, a typical "son"-hero, is not after her at all; true to his ancient prototype, he is seeking the mother. This youthful hero is always the son-lover of the mother-goddess and is doomed to an early death. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 466

The hero as an animus-figure acts vicariously for the conscious individual; that is to say, he does what the subject ought, could, or would like to do, but does not do. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 469

Hiawatha to his task is represented by Nokomis, the mother, who is a feminine principle in the breast of the hero. The latter is Hiawatha's anima, and the former would correspond to the animus of the Terrible Mother. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 543

These are archetypes like the anima, animus, wise old man, witch, shadow, earth-mother, etc., and the organizing dominants, the self, the circle, and the quaternity, i.e., the four functions or aspects of the self (cf. pis. lvi, lx) or of consciousness. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 611

The morally significant act is delegated to the hero, while Miss Miller only looks on admiringly and applaudingly, without, it seems, realizing that her animus-figure is constrained to do what she herself so signally fails to do. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 675

When Chiwantopel calls the snake his "little sister," this is not without significance for Miss Miller, because the hero is in fact her brother-beloved, her "ghostly lover," the animus. She herself is his life-snake which brings death to him. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 679

Any very intensive train of thought works itself out more or less in verbal form if, that is to say, one wants to express it, or teach it, or convince someone of it. It is evidently directed outwards, to the outside world Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 11

To that extent, directed or logical thinking is reality-thinking, a thinking that is adapted to reality, by means of which we imitate the successiveness of objectively real things, so that the images inside our mind follow one another in the same strictly causal sequence as the events taking place outside it Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 11

We also call this "thinking with directed attention." It has in addition the particularity of causing fatigue, and is for that reason brought into play for short periods only Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 11

The whole laborious achievement of our lives is adaptation to reality, part of which consists in directed thinking. In biological terms it is simply a process of psychic assimilation that leaves behind a corresponding state of exhaustion, like any other vital achievement Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 11

The material with which we think is language and verbal concepts something which from time immemorial has been directed outwards and used as a bridge, and which has but a single purpose, namely that of communication. So long as we think directedly, we think for others and speak to others Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 12

Directed thinking or, as we might also call it, thinking in words, is manifestly an instrument of culture, and we shall not be wrong in saying that the tremendous work of education which past centuries have devoted to directed thinking, thereby forcing it to develop from the subjective, individual sphere to the objective, social sphere, has produced a readjustment of the human mind to which we owe our modern empiricism and technics Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 17

These are absolutely new developments in the history of the world and were unknown to earlier ages. Inquiring minds have often wrestled with the question of why the first-rate knowledge which the ancients undoubtedly had of mathematics, mechanics, and physics, coupled with their matchless craftsmanship, was never applied to developing the rudimentary techniques already known to them (e.g., the principles of simple machines) into real technology in the modern sense of the word, and why they never got beyond the stage of inventing amusing curiosities Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 17

There is only one answer to this: the ancients, with a few illustrious exceptions, entirely lacked the capacity to concentrate their interest on the transformations of inanimate matter and to reproduce the natural artificially, by which means alone they could have gained control of the forces of nature. What they lacked was training in directed thinking Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 17

The secret of cultural development is the mobility and disposability of psychic energy. Directed thinking, as we know it today, is a more or less modern acquisition which earlier ages lacked Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 17

Directed thinking operates with speech elements for the purpose of communication and is difficult and exhausting. It produces innovations and adaptation, copies reality, and tries to act upon it. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 20

History shows that directed thinking was not always as developed as it is today. The clearest expression of modern directed thinking is science and the techniques fostered by it. Both owe their existence simply and solely to energetic training in directed thinking. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 21

Our thinking then lacks all leading ideas and the sense of direction emanating from them. We no longer compel our thoughts along a definite track, but let them float, sink or rise according to their specific gravity. In Kuelpe's view, thinking is a sort of "inner act of will," and its absence necessarily leads to an "automatic play of ideas" (Outlines, p. 448). William James regards non-directed thinking, or "merely associative" thinking as the ordinary kind (Principles, II, p. 325) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 18

We can supplement James's definitions by saying that this sort of thinking does not tire us, that it leads away from reality into fantasies of the past or future. At this point thinking in verbal forms ceases, image piles on image, feeling on feeling, and there is an ever-increasing tendency to shuffle things about and arrange then not as they are in reality but as one would like them to be. Naturally enough, the stuff of this thinking which shies away from reality can only be the past with its thousand-and-one memory images. Common speech calls this kind of thinking "dreaming" Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 19

Dreaming or fantasy thinking is effortless, working as it were spontaneously, with the contents ready to hand, and guided by unconscious motives. It turns away from reality, sets free subjective tendencies, and as regards adaptation, is unproductive Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 20

At the time when the forerunners of our present-day culture, such as the poet Petrarch, were just beginning to approach nature in a spirit of understanding, an equivalent of our science already existed in scholasticism Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 21

Scholasticism took its subjects from fantasies of the past, but it gave the mind a dialectical training in directed thinking. The one goal of success that shone before the thinker was rhetorical victory in disputation, and not the visible transformation of reality Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 21

The subjects he thought about were often unbelievably fantastic; for instance, it was debated how many angels could stand on the point of a needle, whether Christ could have performed his work of redemption had he come into the world in the shape of a pea etc., etc. The fact that these problems could be posed at all and the stock metaphysical problem of how to know the unknowable comes into this category proves how peculiar the medieval mind must have been, that it could contrive questions which for us are the height of absurdity Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 21

Nietzsche glimpsed something of the background of this phenomenon when he spoke of the "glorious tension of mind" which the Middle Ages produced Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 21

Scholasticism consisted essentially in a dialectical gymnastics which gave the symbol of speech, the word, an absolute meaning, so that words came in the end to have a substantiality with which the ancients could invest their Logos only by attributing to it a mystical value Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 22

The great achievement of scholasticism was that it laid the foundations of a solidly built intellectual function, the sine qua non of modern science and technology Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 22

All the creative power that modern man pours into science and technics the man of antiquity devoted to his myths. This creative urge explains the bewildering confusion, the kaleidoscopic changes and syncretistic regroupings, the continual rejuvenation, of myths in Greek culture Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 24

We move in a world of fantasies which, untroubled by the outward course of things, well up from an inner source to produce an ever-changing succession of plastic or phantasmal forms Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 24

This activity of the early classical mind was in the highest degree artistic: the goal of its interest does not seem to have been how to understand the real world as objectively and accurately as possible, but how to adapt it aesthetically to subjective fantasies and expectations Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 24

The naïve man of antiquity saw the sun as the great Father of heaven and earth, and the moon as the fruitful Mother. Everything had its demon, was animated like a human being, or like his brothers the animals. Everything was conceived anthropomorphically or theriomorphically, in the likeness of man or beast. Even the sun's disc was given wings or little feet to illustrate its motion. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 24

Thus there arose a picture of the universe, which was completely removed from reality, but which corresponded exactly to man's subjective fantasies. It needs no very elaborate proof to show that children think in much the same way. They too animate their dolls and toys, and with imaginative children it is easy to see that they inhabit a world of marvels Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 24

This idea is not at all strange; we know it quite well from comparative anatomy and from evolution, which show that the structure and function of the human body are the result of a series of embryonic mutations corresponding to similar mutations in our racial history Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 26

The supposition that there may also be in psychology a correspondence between ontogenesis and phylogenesis therefore seems justified. If this is so, it would mean that infantile thinking and dream-thinking are simply a recapitulation of earlier evolutionary stages. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 26

Faced by the vast uncertainty of the future, the adolescent puts the blame for it on the past, saying to himself: "If only I were not the child of my very ordinary parents, but the child of a rich and elegant count and had merely been brought up by foster-parents, then one day a golden coach would come and the count would take his long-lost child back with him to his wonderful castle," and so on, just as in a Grimms' fairy-story Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 34

There was a time, however, in the ancient world, when the fantasy was a legitimate truth that enjoyed universal recognition. Hence the fantasy of our adolescent is simply a re-echo of an ancient folk-belief which was once very widespread Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 34

The fantasy of ambition therefore chooses, among other things, a classical form which at one time had real validity Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 34

The Judas legend is itself a typical motif, namely that of the mischievous betrayal of the hero. One is reminded of Siegfried and Hagen, Baldur and Loki: Siegfried and Baldur were both murdered by a perfidious traitor from among their closest associates Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 42

This myth is moving and tragic, because the noble hero is not felled in a fair fight but through treachery Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 42

At the same time it is an event that was repeated many times in history, for instance in the case of Caesar and Brutus. Through the myth is extremely old it is still a subject for repetition, as it expresses the simple fact that envy does not let mankind sleep in peace Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 42

This rule can be applied to the mythological tradition in general: it does not perpetuate accounts of ordinary everyday events in the past, but only of those which express the universal and ever-renewed thoughts of mankind Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 42

Thus the lives and deeds of the culture-heroes and founders of religions are the purest condensations of typical mythological motifs, behind which the individual figures entirely disappear Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 42

Why should the pious Abbé Oegger worry about the old Judas legend? We are told that he went out into the world to preach the gospel of God's unending mercy. Not long afterwards he left the Catholic Church and became a Swedenborgian Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 43

Now we understand his fantasy: he was the Judas who betrayed his Lord. Therefore he had first of all to assure himself of God's mercy in order to play the role of Judas undisturbed Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 43

Oegger's case throws light on the mechanism of fantasies in general. The conscious fantasy may be woven of mythological or any other material; it should not be taken literally, but must be interpreted according to its meaning Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 44

If it is taken too literally it remains unintelligible, and makes one despair of the meaning and purpose of the psychic function Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 44

But the case of the Abbé Oegger shows that his doubts and his hopes are only apparently concerned with the historical person of Judas, but in reality revolve round his own personality, which was seeking a way to freedom through the solution of the Judas problem Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 44

Conscious fantasies therefore illustrate, through the use of mythological material, certain tendencies in the personality which are either not yet recognized or are recognized no longer Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 45

It will be readily understood that a tendency which we fail to recognize and which we treat as non-existent can hardly contain anything that would fit in with our conscious character. Hence it is mostly a question of things which we regard as immoral or impossible, and whose conscious realization meets with the strongest resistances Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 45

What would Oegger have said had one told him in confidence that he was preparing himself for the role of Judas Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 45

Because he found the damnation of Judas incompatible with God's goodness, he proceeded to think about this conflict. That is the conscious causal sequence Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 45

Hand in hand with this goes the unconscious sequence: because he wanted to be Judas, or had to be Judas, he first made sure of God's goodness Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 45

For him Judas was the symbol of his own unconscious tendency, and he made use of this symbol in order to reflect on his own situation its direct realization would have been too painful for him Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 45

There must, then, be typical myths which serve to work out our racial and national complexes. Jacob Burckhardt seems to have glimpsed this truth when he said that every Greek of the classical period carries in himself a little bit of Oedipus, and every German a little bit of Faust. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 45

One might describe the theater, somewhat unaesthetically, as an institution for working out private complexes in public Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 48

The enjoyment of comedy, or of the blissful dénouement of the plot, is the direct reslt of identifying one's own complexes with those personified by the actors, while enjoyment of tragedy lies in the thrilling yet satisfying feeling that what is happening to somebody else may very well happen to you Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 48

The fantasies reveal the symbolic transition from sun to man in the third and last of her creations which she calls "Chiwantopel, A hypnagogic drama" Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 251

It is hardly to be supposed that Miss Miller, who evidently had not the faintest clue as to the real meaning of her visions would be able to meet the next phase of the process, namely the assimilation of the hero to her conscious personality, with the right attitude Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 683

Miss Miller's fantasies show Chiwantopel as the hero, or brother-beloved of the author, Miss Miller, i.e., as her animus. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 679

In order to do so she would have had to recognize what fate demanded of her, and what was the meaning of the bizarre images that had broken in upon her consciousness Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 683

That there was already some degree of dissociation is obvious, since the unconscious went ahead independently and kept on churning out images which she had not consciously produced herself and which she felt as strange and portentous Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 683

Their melancholy outcome is due largely to the fact that they break off at the critical moment when the threat of invasion by the unconscious is plainly apparent Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 683

To the objective observer it is perfectly clear that the fantasies were products of a psychic energy not under the control of the conscious mind. They were longings, impulses, and symbolic happenings which it was quite unable to cope with either positively or negatively Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 683

The instinctual impulse that was trying to rouse the dreamer from the sleep of childhood was opposed by a personal pride that was distinctly out of place, and also, one must suppose, by a correspondingly narrow moral horizon, so that there was nothing to help her understand the spiritual content of the symbols Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 683

Our civilization has long since forgotten how to think symbolically, and even the theologian has no further use for the hermeneutics of the Church Fathers. The cure of souls in Protestantism is in an even more parlous condition. Whoever would go to the trouble, nowadays, of patching together the basic ideas of Christianity from a "welter of pathological fantasies"? Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 683

For patients in this situation it is a positive life-saver when the doctor takes such products seriously and gives the patient access to the meanings they suggest. In this way he makes it possible for the patient to assimilate at least part of the unconscious and to repair the menacing dissociation by just that amount Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 683

At the same time the assimilation guards against the dangerous isolation which everyone feels when confronted by an incomprehensible and irrational aspect of his personality. Isolation leads to panic, and that is only too often the beginning of a psychosis Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 683

The wider the gap between conscious and unconscious, the nearer creeps the fatal splitting of the personality, which in neurotically disposed individuals leads to neurosis, and, in those with a psychotic constitution, to schizophrenia and fragmentation of personality Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 683

The aim of psychotherapy is therefore to narrow down and eventually abolish the dissociation by integrating the tendencies of the unconscious into the conscious mind Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 683

We know from analytical experience that the initial dreams of patients at the beginning of an analysis are of especial interest, not least because they often bring out a critical evaluation of the personality of the doctor or psychoanalyst which previously he would have asked for in vain Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 62

They enrich the patient's conscious impression of the doctor, often on very important points, and they frequently contain erotic comments which the unconscious had to make in order to counterbalance the patient's underestimation and uncertain appraisal of the impression Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 62

Expressed in the drastic and hyperbolic manner peculiar to dreams, the impression often appears in almost unintelligible form owing to the incongruity of the symbolism Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 62

A further peculiarity, which seems due to the historical stratification of the unconscious, is that when an impression is denied conscious recognition it reverts to an earlier form of relationship Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 62

That explains why young girls, at the time of their first love, have great difficulty in expressing themselves owing to disturbances brought about by regressive reactivation of the father-imago Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 62

I purposely give preference to the term "imago" rather than to "complex," in order to make clear, by this choice of a technical term, that the psychological factor which I sum up under "imago" has a living independence in the psychic hierarchy, i.e., possesses that autonomy which wide experience has shown to be the essential feature of feeling-toned complexes. This is brought out by the term "imago" Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 62

My critics have seen in this view a return to medieval psychology and have therefore repudiated it. This "return" was made consciously and deliberately on my part, because the psychology of ancient and modern superstition furnishes abundant evidence for my point of view Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 62

Since, psychologically speaking, the God-image is a complex of ideas of an archetypal nature, it must necessarily be regarded as representing a certain sum of energy (libido) which appears in projection Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 89

In most of the existing religions it seems that the formative factor which creates the attributes of divinity is the father-imago, while in older religions it was the mother-imago. These attributes are omnipotence, a sternly persecuting paternalism ruling through fear (Old Testament), and loving paternalism (New Testament) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 89

I am of the opinion that, in general, psychic energy or libido creates the God-image by making use of archetypal patterns, and that man in consequence worships the psychic force active within him as something divine (fig. 258.05a) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 129

We thus arrive at the objectionable conclusion that, from the psychological point of view, the God-image is a real but subjective phenomenon Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 129

As Seneca says: "God is near you, he is with you, he is within you," or, as in the First Epistle of John, "He who does not love does not know God; for God is love," and "If we love one another, God abides in us" Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 129

To anyone who understands libido merely as the psychic energy over which he has conscious control, the religious relationship, as we have defined it, is bound to appear as a ridiculous game of hide-and-seek with oneself. But it is rather a question of the energy which belongs to the archetype, to the unconscious, and which is therefore not his to dispose of

Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 130

This idea of becoming a god is age-old. The old belief relegates it to the time after death, but the mystery cults bring it about in this world. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 133

The naïve intellect cannot help taking its autonomy into account and putting the dialectical relationship to practical use. It does this by calling upon the divine presence in all difficult or dangerous situations, for the purpose of unloading all its unbearable difficulties upon the Almighty and expecting help from that quarter Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 95

In the psychological sense this means that complexes weighing on the soul are consciously transferred to the God-image. This, it should be noted, is the direct opposite of an act of repression, where the complexes are handed over to an unconscious authority, inasmuch as one prefers to forget them Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 95

But in any religious discipline it is of the highest importance that one should remain conscious of one's difficulties in other words, of one's sins. An excellent means to this end is the mutual confession of sin (James 5: 16), which effectively prevents one from becoming unconscious Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 95

These measures aim at keeping the conflicts conscious, and that is also a sine qua non of the psychotherapeutic procedure. Just as medical treatment appoints the person of the doctor to take over the conflicts of his patients, so Christian practice appoints the Saviour, "in whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins" (Ephesians I:7 and Colossians I:14) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 95

He is the deliverer and redeemer of our guilt, a God who stands above sin, who "committed no sin, no guile was found on his lips" (I Peter 2:22), who "himself bore our sins in his body on the tree" (I Peter 2: 24) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 95

The conscious projection at which Christian education aims therefore brings a double psychic benefit: firstly, one keeps oneself conscious of the conflict ("sin") of two mutually opposing tendencies, thus preventing a known suffering from turning into an unknown one, which is far more tormenting, by being repressed and forgotten; and secondly, one lightens one's burden by surrendering it to God, to whom all solutions are known Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 95

Religious experience in antiquity was frequently conceived as bodily union with the deity, and certain cults were saturated with sexuality of every kind. Sexuality was all too close to the relations of people with one another Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 102

The Stoics called this condition Heimarmene, compulsion by the stars, to which every "unredeemed" soul is subject Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 644

The moral degeneracy of the first centuries of the Christian era produced a moral reaction which then, in the second and third centuries, after germinating in the darkness of the lowest strata of society, expressed itself at its purest in the two mutually antagonistic religions, Christianity and Mithraism Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 102

These religions strove after precisely that higher form of social intercourse symbolized

by a projected ("incarnate") idea (the Logos), whereby all the strongest impulses of man which formerly had flung him from one passion to another and seemed to the ancients like the compulsion of evil stars, Heimarmene, or like what we psychologists would call the compulsion of libido could be made available for the maintenance of society Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 102

There is no doubt this is one of the main causes of the singular melancholy that reigned all through the time of the Caesars Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 104

It was not in the long run possible for those who wallowed in pleasure not to be infected, through the mysterious working of the unconscious, by the deep sadness and still deeper wretchedness of their brothers Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 104

The old idea of a mediator in whose name new ways of love would be opened, became a fact, and with that human society took an immense stride forward. This was not the result of any speculative, sophisticated philosophy, but of an elementary need in the great masses of humanity vegetating in spiritual darkness Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 104

They were evidently driven to it by the profoundest inner necessities, for humanity does not thrive in a state of licentiousness. The meaning of these cults Christianity and Mithraism is clear: moral subjugation of the animal instincts Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 104

The spread of both these religions betrays something of that feeling of redemption which animated their first adherents, and which we can scarcely appreciate today. We can hardly realize the whirlwinds of brutality and unchained libido that roared through the streets of Imperial Rome Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 104

The world and its beauty had to be shunned, not only because of their vanity and transitoriness, but because love of created nature soon makes man its slave. As St. Augustine says (X, 6): "they love these things too much and become subject to them, and subjects cannot judge" Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 112

One would certainly think it possible to love something, to have a positive attitude towards it, without supinely succumbing to it and losing one's power of rational judgment Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 112

But St. Augustine knew his contemporaries, and knew furthermore how much godliness and godlike power dwelt in the beauty of the world Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 112

Thus Lucretius extols "alma Venus" as the ruling principle of nature. To such a daimonion man falls an abject victim unless he can categorically reject its seductive influence at the outset. It is not merely a question of sensuality and of aesthetic corruption, butane this is the point of paganism and nature worship (fig. 001) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 113

Because gods dwell in created things, man falls to worshipping them, and for that reason he must turn away from them utterly lest he be overwhelmed. In this respect the fate of Alypius is extremely instructive Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 113

If the flight from the world is successful, man can then build up an inner, spiritual world which stands firm against the onslaught of sense-impressions Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 113

The struggle with the world of the senses brought to birth a type of thinking independent of external factors. Man won for himself that sovereignty of the idea, which was able to withstand the aesthetic impact, so that thought was no longer fettered by the emotional effect of sense-impressions, but could assert itself and even rise, later, to reflection and observation Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 113

In the flight from the world during the first few centuries after Christ (cities of the anchorites in the desert), the Desert Fathers mortified themselves through spirituality in order to escape the extreme brutality of the decadent Roman civilization Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 119

Asceticism occurs whenever the animal instincts are so strong that they need to be violently exterminated. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 119

I believe that miscegenation makes rather for a coarsened joie de vivre. To all appearances the ascetics were ethical people who, disgusted with the melancholy of the age which was merely an expression of the disruption of the individual, put an end to their lives in order to mortify an attitude that was itself obsolete Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 119

His [Faust] equally importunate longing for the beauties of this world plunged him into renewed ruin, doubt and wretchedness, which culminated in the tragedy of Gretchen's death Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 119

Faust's mistake was that he made the worst of both worlds by blindly following the urge of his libido, like a man overcome by strong and violent passions. Faust's conflict is a reflection of the collective conflict at the beginning of the Christian era, but in him, curiously enough, it takes the opposite course Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 119

Faust takes the opposite road; for him the ascetic ideal is sheer death. He struggles for liberation and wins life by binding himself over to evil, thereby bringing about the death of what he loves most: Gretchen Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 120

He tears himself away from his grief, and sacrifices his life in unceasing work, thus saving many lives. His double mission as saviour and destroyer had been hinted at from the beginning Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 120

Faust's desire, like that of every hero, is a yearning for the mystery of rebirth, for immortality; therefore his way leads out to sea and down into the maw of death, that frighteningly narrow "passage" which signals the new day Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 417

Nature is beautiful because I love it, and good is everything that my feeling regards as good. Values are chiefly created by the quality of one's subjective reactions Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 126

In the erotic sphere, it is abundantly evident how little the object counts, and how much the subjective reaction counts Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 126

The well-known fact that in worshipping the sun's strength we pay homage to the great generative force of Nature is the plainest possible evidence if evidence were still needed that in God we honour the energy of the archetype Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 135

Religious regression makes use of the parental imago, but only as a symbol that is to say, it clothes the archetype in the image of the parents, just as it bodies forth the archetype's energy by making use of sensuous ideas like fire, light, heat, fecundity, generative power, and so on Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 138

The phallus is the source of life and libido the creator and worker of miracles, and as such it was worshipped everywhere Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 146

Ikhnaton (Amenophis IV) achieved, by his reforms, a psychologically valuable work of interpretation. He united all the bull, ram, crocodile, and pile-dwelling gods into the sun-disc, and made it clear that their various attributes were compatible with those of the sun Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 148

But the striving for unity is opposed by a possibly even stronger tendency to create multiplicity, so that even in strictly monotheistic religions like Christianity the polytheistic tendency cannot be suppressed Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 149

The deity is divided into three parts, and on top of that come all the heavenly hierarchies. These two tendencies are in constant warfare: sometimes there is only one God with countless attributes, sometimes there are many gods, who are simply called by different names in different places, and who personify one or the other attribute of their respective archetype, as we have seen in the case of the Egyptian gods Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 149

We saw, however, that the snake is to be taken not only in the phallic sense, but as an attribute of the sun's image (the Egyptian uraeus) and as a libido-symbol. It is therefore possible for the sun-disc to be equipped not only with hands and feet (cf.fig. 007) and (fig. 258.01), but also with a phallus. We find proof of this in a strange vision in the Mithraic liturgy: "And likewise the so-called tube, the origin of the ministering wind. For you will see hanging down from the disc of the sun something that looks like a tube" (Dieterich, Mithras liturgie, pp. 6-7) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 149

The Holy Ghost of the New Testament appeared to the apostles in the form of flames, because the pneuma was believed to be fiery Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 149

The Iranian conception of Hvareno was similar: it signified the "Grace of Heaven" through which the monarch ruled Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 149

This "Grace" was understood as a sort of fire or shining glory, something very substantial. We come across ideas of the same type in Kerner's Seeress of Prevorst Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 149

The various attributes of the sun appear one after another in the Mithraic liturgy. After the vision of Helios, seven maidens appear with faces like snakes, and seven gods with the faces of black bulls. The maiden can easily be understood as a causative libido analogy Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 155

The bull is a notorious fertility-symbol. In the Mithraic liturgy, the bull-gods are called guardians of the world's axis,' who turn the axle of the wheel of heaven’ Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 155 The serpent in Paradise is usually thought of as feminine, as the seductive principle in woman, and is represented as feminine by the old painters. Through a similar change of meaning the snake in antiquity became a symbol of the earth, which has always been considered feminine Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 155 The same attribute falls also to Mithras: sometimes he is the Sol invictus itself, sometimes the companion and ruler Helios; in his right hand he holds “the constellation of the Bear, which moves and turns the heavens round” Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 155 The bull-head deities, sacred and valorous youths' like Mithras himself, who is also given the attribute, the younger one,’ are merely aspects of the same divinity Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 155 The chief god of the Mithraic liturgy is himself divided into Mithras and Helios both of whom have closely related attributes Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 155 Numerous fire- and light-symbols are attributed to the saints in Christian legend. The twelve apostles, for example, were likened to the twelve signs of the zodiac and were therefore represented each with a star over his head Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 163 The pictures in the catacombs likewise contain a good deal of sun symbolism. For instance there is a swastika (sun-wheel) on the robe of Fossor Diogenes in the cemetery of Peter and Marcellinus Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 163 The symbols of the rising sun bull and ramare found in the Orpheus frescoes in the cemetery of Domitilla; also the ram and peacock (a sun-symbol like the phoenix) on an epitaph in the Callistus catacomb Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 163 The power of God is menaced by the seductions of passion; heaven is threatened with a second fall of angels Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 170 If we translate this projection back into the psychological sphere whence it came, it would mean that the good and rational Power which rules the world with wise laws is threatened by the chaotic, primitive force of passion Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 170 Therefore passion must be exterminated, which means, in mythological projection, that the race of Cain and the whole sinful world must be wiped out, root and branch, by the Flood Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 170 That is the inevitable result of a passion that sweeps away all barriers. It is like the sea breaking through its dikes, like the waters of the deep and the torrential rains, the creative, fructifying, “motherly” waters, as Indian mythology calls them Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 170 Now [the waters] depart from their natural courses and surge over the mountain-tops and engulf all living things Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 170 If evil were to be utterly destroyed, everything daemonic, including God himself, would suffer a grievous loss; it would be like performing an amputation on the body of the Deity Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 170 Passion raises a man not only above himself, but also above the bounds of his mortality and earthliness, and by the very act of raising him, it destroys him Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 171 This “rising above himself” is expressed mythologically in the building of the heaven-high tower of Babel that brought confusion to mankind, and in the revolt of Lucifer Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 171 (In Byron’s poem [ “Heaven and Earth,” CW 5: par. 169], it is the overweening ambition of the race of Cain, whose strivings make the stars subservient and corrupt the sons of God themselves. Even if a longing for the highest is legitimate in itself, the sinful presumption and inevitable corruption lie in the very fact that it goes beyond the fixed human boundaries Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 171 Through excess of longing man can draw the gods down into the murk of his passions. He seems to be raising himself up to the Divine, but in so doing he abandons his humanity Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 171 There, where the deep fountains of the ocean are, dwells Leviathan; from there the all-destroying flood ascends, the tidal wave of animal passion Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 174 The choking, heart-constricting surge of instinct is projected outwards as a mounting flood to destroy everything that exists, so that a new and better world may arise from the ruins of the old Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 174 The sun’s the only truly “rational” image of God, whether we adopt the standpoint of the primitive savage or of modern science. (In either case the sun is the father-god from whom all living things draw life; he is the fructifier and creator, the source of energy for our world Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 176 Samson as a sun-god. The killing of the lion, like the Mithraic bull-sacrifice, is an anticipation of the god's self-sacrifice Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 176 The same is true of many other sexual images which are found not only in dreams and fantasies but in everyday speech. In neither case should they be taken literally, for they are not to be understood semiotically, as signs for definite things, but as symbols Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 180 A symbol is an indefinite expression with many meanings, pointing to something not easily defined and therefore not fully known. But the sign always has a fixed meaning, because it is a conventional abbreviation for, or a commonly accepted indication of, something known Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 180 The symbol therefore has a large number of analogous variants, and the more of these variants it has at its disposal, the more complete and clear-cut will be the image it projects of its object Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 180 The same creative force, which is symbolized by Tom Thumb, etc., can also be represented by the phallus or by numerous other symbols which delineate further aspects of the process underlying them all. Thus the creative dwarfs toil away in secret; the phallus, also working in darkness, begets a living being and the key unlocks the mysterious forbidden door behind which some wonderful thing awaits discovery. One thinks, in this connection, of "The Mothers" in Faust: Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 180 Here the devil again puts into Faust's hand the marvelous tool [the key], as once before when, in the form of the black dog, he introduced himself to Faust as part of that power which would ever work evil but engenders good. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 181 What he is describing here is the libido, which is not only creative and procreative, but possesses an intuitive faculty, a strange power to "smell the right place," almost as if it were a live creature with an independent life of its own (which is why it is so easily personified). It is purposive, like sexuality itself, a favorite object of comparison Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 182 The "realm of the Mothers" has not a few connections with the womb with the matrix, which frequently symbolizes the creative aspect of the unconscious Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 182 This libido is a force of nature, good and bad at once, or morally neutral. Uniting himself with it, Faust succeeds in accomplishing his real life's work, at first with evil results and then for the benefit of mankind Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 182 In the realm of the Mothers he finds the tripod, the Hermetic vessel in which the "royal marriage" is consummated. But he needs the phallic wand in order to bring off the greatest wonder of all the creation of Paris and Helen. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 182 The insignificant-looking tool in Faust's hand is the dark creative power of the unconscious, which reveals itself to those who follow its dictates and is indeed capable of working miracles Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 182 This paradox appears to be very ancient, for the Shvetashvatara Upanishad (9, 20) goes on to say of the dwarf-god, the cosmic purusha: Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 182 The phallus often stands for the creative divinity, Hermes being an excellent example. It is sometimes thought of as an independent being, an idea that is found not only in antiquity but in the drawings of children and artists of our own day Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 183 So we ought not to be surprised if certain phallic characteristics are also found in the seers, artists, and wonder-workers of mythology. Hephaestus, Wieland the Smith, and Mani (the founder of Manichaeism, famous also for his artistic gifts), had crippled feet Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 183 The foot, as I shall explain in due course, is supposed to possess a magical generative power. The ancient seer Melampus, who is said to have introduced the cult of the phallus, had a very peculiar name Blackfoot, and it also seems characteristic of seers to be blind Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 183 Ugliness and deformity are especially characteristic of those mysterious chthonic gods, the sons of Hephaestus, the Cabiri, to whom mighty wonder-working powers were ascribed Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 183 Their cult was closely bound up with that of the ithyphallic Hermes, who according to Herodotus was brought to Attica by the Pelasgians. They were called, 'great gods' Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 183 Their near relatives were the Idaean dactyls (fingers or else Tom Thumbs), to whom the mother of the gods had taught the blacksmith's art ("Follow it down, it leads you to the Mothers!") Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 183 They [Idaean dactyls] were the first Wise Men, the teachers of Orpheus, and it was they who invented the Ephesian magic formulae and the musical rhythms Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 183 The characteristic disparity which we noted in the Upanishads and Faust crops up again here, since the giant Hercules was said to be an Idaean dactyl. Also the colossal Phrygians, Rhea's technicians, were dactyls Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 183 The two Dioscuri are related to the Cabiri; they too wear the queer little pointed hat, the pileus, which is peculiar to these mysterious gods and was thenceforward perpetuated as a secret mark of identification. Attis and Mithras both wore the pileus (fig. 020). It had become the traditional headgear of our infantile chthonic gods today, the pixies and goblins Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 183 Cicero gives it a very wide meaning: will is a rational desire, but when it is divorced from reason and is too violently aroused, that is "libido," or unbridled desire, which is found in all fools (Cicero, Tusculan Disputations, Gook IV, vi, 12) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 185 Here libido means a want' or a wish,' and also, in contradiction to the will' of the Stoics, unbridled desire.' Cicero uses it in this sense when he says: ("to do something from willful desire and not from reason") Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 186 The use of libido is so general that the phrase "libido est scire" merely means:

I like,'

it pleases me.' In the phrase libido has the meaning of 'urge' Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 186 It can also have the nuance of 'lasciviousness.' St. Augustine aptly defines libido as a "general term for all desire" and says: There is a lust for revenge, which is called rage; a lust for having money, which is called avarice; a lust for victory at all costs, which is called stubbornness; a lust for self-glorification, which is called boastfulness. There are many and varied kinds of lust (De Civitate Dei, XIV, xv.) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 186 For St. Augustine libido denotes an appetite like hunger and thirst, and so far as sexuality is concerned he says: Pleasure is preceded by an appetite that is felt in the flesh, a kind of desire like hunger and thirst (De Civitate Dei, XIV, xv.) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 187 Libido is connected etymologically with: it pleases, gladly, willingly, to experience violent longing, excites longing, eager, love, hope, praise, and glory Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 188 We can say, then, that the concept of libido in psychology has functionally the same significance as the concept of energy in physics since the time of Robert Mayer Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 189 The term describes the Indian concept of tejas which denotes a subjective intensity, i.e., anything potent and highly charged with energy Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 238 Libido is symbolized by the human figure as demon or hero one that passes from joy to sorrow, from sorrow to joy, and like the sun, now stands high at the zenith and now plunged into darkest night, only to rise again in new splendor Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 251 Libido denotes a desire or impulse which is unchecked by any kind of authority, moral or otherwise. It appetite in its natural state Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 194 From the genetic point of view it is bodily needs like hunger, thirst, sleep, sex, and emotional states or affects which constitute the essence of libido Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 194 Like energy, the libido never manifests itself as such, but only in the form of a "force," that is to say, in the form of something in a definite energic state, be it moving bodies, chemical or electrical tension, etc. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 505 The libido expresses itself in images of sun, light, fire, sex, fertility, and growth Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 324 This leads to a conception of libido which expands into a conception of intentionality in general. We would be better advised, therefore, when speaking of libido, to understand it as an energy-value which is able to communicate itself to any field of activity whatsoever, be it power, hunger, hatred, sexuality, or religion, without ever being itself a specific instinct Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 197 Intricate overlapping's of meaning can only be disentangled if we reduce them to a common denominator. This denominator is the libido Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 659 As a power which transcends consciousness the libido is by nature daemonic: it is both God and devil Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 170 As we know, an important change occurred in the principles of propagation during the ascent through the animal kingdom: the vast numbers of gametes which chance fertilization made necessary were progressively reduced in favor of assured fertilization and effective protection of the young Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 194 The decreased production of ova and spermatozoa set free considerable quantities of energy which soon sought and found new outlets Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 194 Thus we find the first stirrings of the artistic impulse in animals, but subservient to the reproductive instinct and limited to the breeding season Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 194 The original sexual character of these biological phenomena gradually disappears as they become organically fixed and achieve functional independence Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 194 Although there can be no doubt that music originally belonged to the reproductive sphere, it would be an unjustified and fantastic generalization to put music in the same category as sex Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 194 Such a view would be tantamount to treating of Cologne Cathedral in a text-book of mineralogy, on the ground that it consisted very largely of stones Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 194 According to Plotinus, the world-soul has a tendency towards separation and divisibility, the sine qua non of all change, creation, and reproduction. It is an "unending All of life" and wholly energy; a living organism of ideas which only become effective and real in it Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 198 It seems as if the process of analogy-making has gradually altered and added to the common stock of ideas and names, with the result that man's picture of the world was considerably broadened Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 203 Specially colourful or intense contents (the "feeling-toned" complexes) were reflected in countless analogies, and gave rise to synonyms whose objects were thus drawn into the magic circle of the psyche Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 203 In this way there came into being those intimate relationships by analogy which Lévy-Bruhl fittingly describes as participation mystique Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 203 It is evident that this tendency to invent analogies deriving from feeling-toned contents has been of enormous significance for the development of the human mind Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 203 We are in thorough agreement with Steinthal when he says that a positive overwhelming importance attaches to the little word "like" in the history of human thought Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 203 One can easily imagine that the canalization of libido into analogy-making was responsible for some of the most important discoveries ever made by primitive man Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 203 At the same time there develops in the motor sphere in general a pleasurable rhythmic movement of the arms and legs (kicking, etc.) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 206 With the growth of the individual and development of his organs the libido creates for itself new avenues of activity. The primary model of rhythmic movement, producing pleasure and satisfaction, is transferred to the zone of other functions, with sexuality as its ultimate goal Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 206 This is not to say that the rhythmic activity derives from the act of nutrition. A considerable part of the energy supplied by nutrition for growth has to convert itself into sexual libido and other forms of activity Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 206 The transition of libido does not take place suddenly at the time of puberty, as is commonly supposed, but only very gradually during the course of childhood Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 206 Sucking still belongs to the sphere of the nutritive function, but outgrows it by ceasing to be a function of nutrition and becoming an analogous rhythmic activity without intake of nourishment Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 206 At this point the hand comes in as an auxiliary organ. It appears even more clearly as an auxiliary organ in the phase of rhythmic activity, which then leaves the oral zone and turns to other regions. Numerous possibilities now present themselves Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 206 As a rule, it is the other body openings that become the main object of interest; then the skin, or special parts of it; and finally rhythmic movements of all kinds Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 206 In the course of its migrations the libido carries traces of the nutritional phase into its new field of operations, which accounts for the many intimate connections between the nutritive and the sexual function. Should this more developed activity meet with an obstacle that forces it to regress, the regression will be to an earlier stage of development Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 206 The phase of rhythmic activity generally coincides with the development of mind and speech. I therefore propose to call the period from birth up to the time of the first clear manifestations of sexuality the "presexual stage." As a rule it falls between the first and the fourth year and is comparable to the chrysalis stage in butterflies. It is characterized by a varying mixture of elements from the nutritional and sexual phases Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 206 They dig a hole in the ground, so shaping it and setting it about with bushes that it looks like a woman's genitals Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 213 Then they dance round this hole all night, holding their spears in front of them in imitation of an erect penis. As they dance round, they thrust their spears into the hole, shouting:. Obscene dances of this kind are found among other tribes as well Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 213 In this rite of spring there is enacted a sacramental mating, with the hole in the earth representing the woman, and the spear the man. The hierosgamos was an essential component of many cults and played an important part in various sects Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 213 The tensions inside a primitive group are never greater than those involved in the struggle for existence of the group as a whole. Were it otherwise, the group would speedily perish Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 213 What does constitute a serious threat to the primitive group is the endogamous tendency, which has to be checked in order to exorcize the danger Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 217 The best means to this end seems to be the widespread custom of cross-cousin marriage because it keeps the endogamous (incestuous) and exogamous tendencies balanced Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 217 The danger that then threatens the group comes from the very advantages it has gained through checking the endogamous tendency [incest] to which the incest-taboo applies Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 217 The group acquires an inner stability, opportunities for expansion, and hence greater security. That is to say, the source of fear does not lie inside the group, but in the very real risks which the struggle for existence entails Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 217 Fear of enemies and of hunger predominates even over sexuality, which is, as we know, no problem at all for the primitive, as it is far simpler to get a woman than it is to get food Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 217 Fear of the consequences of being unadapted is a compelling reason for checking the instincts Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 217 Confronted with disaster, one is obliged to ask oneself how it is to be remedied. The libido that is forced into regression by the obstacle always reverts to the possibilities lying dormant in the individual. A dog, finding the door shut, scratches at it until it is opened, and a man unable to find the answer to a problem rubs his nose, pulls his lower lip, scratches his ear, and so on Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 217 If he gets impatient, all sorts of other rhythms appear; he starts drumming with his fingers, shuffles his feet about, and it will not be long before certain distinctly sexual analogies manifest themselves, such as masturbation gestures Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 217 Koch-Grünberg, writing on South American rock-paintings, tells us how the Indians sit on the rocks and scratch lines on them with sharp stones while waiting for their canoes to be transported round the rapids Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 217 Now when the libido is forced back by an obstacle, it does not necessarily regress to earlier sexual modes of application, but rather to the rhythmic activities of infancy which serve as a model both for the act of nutrition and for the sexual act itself. The material before us does not seem to preclude the possibility that the invention of fire-making came about in the manner suggested, that is, through the regressive reawakening of rhythm Carl

Jung, CW 5, Para 218 If certain tribes can dance all night long to a monotonous tune of three notes, then, to our way of thinking, the play-element is entirely lacking: it is more like an exercise with a set purpose Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 219 This is in the fact the case, for rhythm is a classic device for impressing certain ideas or activities on the mind, and what has to be impressed and firmly organized is the canalization of libido into a new form of activity Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 219 Since the rhythmic activity can no longer find an outlet in the act of feeding after the nutritional phase of development is over, it transfers itself not only to the sphere of sexuality in the strict sense, but also to the "decoy mechanisms," such as music and dancing, and finally to the sphere of work Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 219 The close connection which work always has with music, singing, dancing, drumming, and all manner of rhythms in primitive societies, indeed its absolute dependence on these things, is very striking Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 219 This [Music] connection forms the bridge to sexuality, thus giving the primitive an opportunity to sidetrack and evade the task in hand Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 219 Because diversions of this kind are a frequent occurrence and are to be found in all spheres of culture, people have been led to believe that there is no differentiated achievement that is not a substitute for some form of sexuality. I regard this as an error, albeit a very understandable one considering the enormous psychological importance of the sexual instinct Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 219 The rhythmic tendency does not come from the nutritional phase at all, as if it had migrated from there to the sexual, but that it is a peculiarity of emotional processes in general Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 219 Any kind of excitement, no matter in what phase of life, displays a tendency to rhythmic expression, perseveration, and repetition, as can easily be seen from the repetition, assonance, and alliteration of complex-toned reaction words in the association experiment Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 219 Rhythmic patterns therefore offer no ground for assuming that the function they affect originated in sexuality Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 219 The psychological importance of sexuality and the existence of plausible sexual analogies make a deviation into sex extremely easy in cases of regression, so that it naturally seems as if all one's troubles were due to a sexual wish that is unjustly denied fulfilment. This reasoning is typical of the neurotic Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 220 Primitives seem to know instinctively the dangers of this deviation: when celebrating the heiros gamos, the Wachandi, of Australia, may not look at a woman during the entire ceremony. Among a certain tribe of American Indians, it was the custom for the warriors, before setting out on the warpath, to move in a circle round a beautiful young girl standing naked in the center. Whoever got an erection was disqualified as unfit for military operation Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 220 The deviation into sex is used not always, but very frequently as a means of escaping the real problem Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 220 One makes oneself and others believe that the problem is purely sexual, that the trouble started long ago and that its causes lie in the remote past Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 220 This provides a heaven-sent way out of the problem of the present by shifting the whole question on to another and less dangerous plane. But the illicit gain is purchased at the expense of adaptation, and one gets a neurosis into the bargain Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 220 The checking of the instincts can be traced back to fear of the very real dangers of existence in this world Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 221 But external reality is not the only source of this instinct-inhibiting fear, for primitive man is often very much more afraid of "inner" reality the world of dreams, ancestral spirits, demons, gods, magicians, and witches Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 221 Although we, with our rationalism, think we can block this source of fear by pointing to its unreality, it nevertheless remains one of those psychic realities whose irrational nature cannot be exorcized by rational argument Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 221 There is a psychic reality which is just as pitiless and just as inexorable as the outer world, and just as useful and helpful, provided one knows how to circumvent its dangers and discover its hidden treasures Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 221 "Magic is the science of the jungle," a famous explorer once said. Civilized man contemptuously looks down on primitive superstitions, which is about as sensible as turning up one's nose at the pikes and halberds, the fortresses and tall-spired cathedrals of the Middle Ages Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 221 Primitive methods are just as effective under primitive conditions as machine-guns or the radio are under modern conditions Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 221 If there is an inhibition of sexuality, a regression will eventually occur in which the sexual energy flowing back from this sphere activates a function in some other sphere. In this way the energy changes its form Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 226 Let us take as an example the Wachandi ceremony: in all probability the hole in the earth is an analogy of the mother's genitals, for when a man is forbidden to look at a woman, his Eros reverts to the mother. But as incest has to be avoided at all costs, the hole in the earth acts as a kind of mother-substitute Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 226 Thus, by means of ceremonial exercise, the incestuous energy-component becomes, as it were, desexualized, is led back to an infantile level where, if the operation is successful, it attains another form, which is equivalent to another function Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 226 It is to be assumed, however, that the operation is accomplished only with difficulty, for the primary instinct is composed of an endogamous ("incestuous") tendency and an exogamous one and must therefore be split into two. This splitting is connected with consciousness and the process of becoming conscious Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 226 The regression is always attended by certain difficulties because the energy clings with specific force to its object, and on being changed from one form carries something of its pervious character into the next form. So although the resultant phenomena have the character of a sexual act, it is not a sexual act any longer Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 226 In the same way, fire-boring is only an analogy of the sexual act, just as the latter often has to serve as a linguistic analogy for all sorts of other activities. The presexual, early infantile state to which the libido reverts is characterized by numerous possibilities of application, because, once the libido has arrived there, it is restored to its original undifferentiated polyvalency Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 226 It is therefore understandable that the libido which regressively "invests" this stage sees itself confronted with a variety of possible applications Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 226 Since, in the Wachandi ceremony, the libido is bound to its object sexuality it will carry at least part of this function into the new form as an essential characteristic Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 226 But the aim of the action is to bring forth the fruits of the field, and it is magical rather than sexual. Here the regression leads to a reactivation of the mother as the goal of desire, this time as a symbol not of sex but of the giver of nourishment Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 226 The libido, forced into regression by the checking of instinct, reactivates the infantile boring and provides it with objective material to work unfittingly called "material" because the object at this stage is the mother (mater) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 227 As I have pointed out above, the act of boring requires only the strength and perseverance of an adult man and suitable "material" in order to generate fire Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 227 Consequently, the production of fire may have originally occurred as the objective expression of a quasi-masturbatory activity analogous to the aforementioned case of masturbatory boring. Though we can never hope to advance any real proof of our contention, it is at least thinkable that some traces of these first exercises in fire-making may have been preserved. I have succeeded in finding a passage in a monument of Indian literature [the Brihadaranyaka Upanishad] which describes this conversion of libido into fire-making Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 227 The pleasure and satisfaction the baby finds in feeding is localized in the mouth, but to interpret this pleasure as sexual is quite unjustified. Feeding is a genuine activity, satisfying in itself, and because it is a vital necessity nature has here put a premium on pleasure Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 229 The mouth soon begins to develop another significance as the organ of speech. The extreme importance of speech doubles the significance of the mouth in small children Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 229 The rhythmic activities it carries out express a concentration of emotional forces, i.e., of libido, at this point. Thus the mouth (and to a lesser degree the anus) becomes the prime place of origin Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 229 According to the Brihadaranyaka Upanishad, the most important discovery ever made by primitive man, the discovery of fire, came out of the mouth. As we might expect, there are texts which draw a parallel between fire and speech. The Aitareya Upanishad says: From the mouth came speech, and from speech fire Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 229 Tejas, therefore, describes the psychological situation covered by the word "libido." It really denotes subjective intensity. Anything potent, any content highly charged with energy, therefore has a wide range of symbolic meanings Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 238 Agni is the sacrificial flame, the sacrificer and the sacrificed Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 246 The wise Diotima in Plato's Symposium has a conception of the divine messenger and mediator. She teaches Socrates that Eros is "the intermediary between mortals and immortals a mighty daemon, dear Socrates; for everything daemonic is the intermediary between God and man" Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 242 His function is to "interpret and convey messages to the gods from men and to men from the gods, prayers and sacrifices from the one, and commands and rewards from the other, thus bridging the gap between them, so that by his mediation the universe is at one with itself" Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 242 He is neither mortal nor immortal; but on one and the same day he will live and flourish (when things go well with him), and also meet his death; and then come to life again through the force of his father's nature Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 242 We read in the third chapter of the book of the prophet Daniel that Nabuchodonosor, the King of Babylon, caused three men to be placed in a glowing furnace, and that the king came to the furnace and looked in, and saw with the three a fourth, who was like the Son of God. The three signify for us the Holy Trinity of the person, and the fourth the unity of being. Thus Christ in his transfiguration signified the Trinity of the person and the unity of being Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 244 The fiery furnace, like the fiery tripod in Faust, is a mother symbol. From the tripod come Paris and Helen, the royal pair of alchemy, and in popular tradition children are baked in the oven Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 245 The alchemical athanor, or melting pot, signifies the body, while the alembic or cucurbita, the Hermetic vessel, represents the uterus Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 245 The "fourth" in the fiery furnace appears like a son of God made visible in the fire. Jehovah himself is a fire. Isaiah 10:17 (RSV) says of the saviour of Israel: "And the light of Israel will become a fire, and his Holy One a flame" Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 245 A hymn of Ephraem the Syrian says of Christ: "Thou who art all fire, have pity on me." This view is based on the apocryphal saying of our Lord: "He who is near unto me is near unto the fire" Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 245 So far our exposition has been based on the pramantha component of the Agni sacrifice, and we have concerned ourselves with only one meaning of the word manthami or mathnami, namely with that which expresses the idea of rubbing Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 248 It is the custom in the Catholic Church to light a new fire at Easter. So, even in the Occident, fire-making is an element in a religious mystery, which testifies to its symbolical and ambiguous character. The rules of the ritual must be scrupulously observed if it is to have its intended magical effect Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 248 Speech and fire-making represent primitive man's victory over his brutish unconsciousness and subsequently became powerful magical devices for overcoming the ever present "daemonic" forces lurking in the unconscious Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 248 The blocking of libido leads to an accumulation of instinctuality and, in consequence, to excesses and aberrations of all kinds. Among them, sexual disturbances are fairly frequent, as we might expect Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 249 A particularly instructive example is the psychology of incendiarism: incendiarism is really a regressive act of fire-making, and in certain cases it is combined with masturbation Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 249 Schmid tells of an imbecile peasant youth who started numerous fires. On one occasion he aroused suspicion by standing in the door of a house with his hands in his trouser pockets, gazing with delight at the conflagration. Later, under examination, he admitted that he always masturbated while enjoying the spectacle of the fires he had started ("Zu Psychologie der Brandstifter," p. 80) Carl Jung,

CW 5, Para 249 But there was always a tendency to prepare fire in a mysterious ceremonial manner on special occasions just as with ritual eating and drinking and to do it according to prescribed rules from which no one dared to differ Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 250 This ritual serves to remind us of the original numinosity of fire-making, but apart from that it has no practical significance. The anamnesis of fire-making is on a level with the recollection of the ancestors among primitives and of the gods at a more civilized stage Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 250 From the psychological point of view the ceremony has the significance of a meaningful institution, inasmuch as it represents a clearly defined procedure for canalizing the libido Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 250 It has, in fact, the functional value of a paradigm, and its purpose is to show us how we should act when the libido gets blocked. What we call the "blocking of libido" is, for the primitive, a hard and concrete fact: his life ceases to flow, things lose their glamour, plants, animals, and men no longer prosper Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 250 The ancient Chinese philosophy of the I Ching devised some brilliant images for this state of affairs. Modern man, in the same situation, experiences a standstill ("I am stuck"), a loss of energy and enjoyment ("the zestlibidohas gone out of life"), or a depression Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 250 One frequently has to tell the patient what is happening to him, for modern man's powers of introspection leave much to be desired Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 250 If, even today, the new fire is kindled at Eastertide, it is in commemoration of the redemptive and saving significance of the first fire-boring. In this way man wrested a secret from nature the Promethean theft of fire. He made himself guilty of an unlawful intervention, incorporating a fragment of the age-old unconscious into the darkness of his mind. With this theft he appropriated something precious and offended against the gods Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 250 Anyone who knows the primitive's fear of innovations and their unforeseen consequences can imagine the uncertainty and uneasy conscience which such a discovery would arouse Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 250 This primordial experience finds an echo in the widespread motif of robbery (sun-cattle of Geryon, apples of the Hesperides, herb of immortality). And it is worth remembering that in the cult of Diana at Aricia [Lake Nemi], only he could become her priest who plucked the golden bough from the sacred grove of the goddess Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 250 The pramantha, or instrument of the manthana (fire-sacrifice), is conceived under a purely sexual aspect in India Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 210 The fire-stick being the phallus or man, and the bored wood underneath the vulva or woman Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 210 The fire that results from the boring is the child, the divine son Agni. The two pieces of wood are ritually known as pururavas and urvasi, and, when personified, are thought of as man and woman Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 210 The fire is born from the genitals of the woman. Weber gives the following account of the fire-producing ceremony: Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 210 A sacrificial fire is kindled by rubbing two fire-sticks together Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 210 One of the fire-sticks is taken up with the words: "Thou art the birthplace of fire," and two blades of grass are placed upon it: "Ye are the two testicles" Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 210 The priest then places on them the adhararani (the underlying piece of wood), saying: "Thou art Urvasi," and anoints the uttararani (uppermost piece) with butter: "Thou art the power" (semen) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 210 This is then placed on the adhararani, with the words: "Thou art Pururavas." Rubbing them together three times the priest says: "I rub thee with the Gayatrimetrum: I rub thee with the Trishtubhmetrum: I rub thee with the Jagatimetrum" (Weber, Indische Studien, I, p. 197, cited in Kuhn, p. 71) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 210 The sexual symbolism is unmistakable. We find the same idea and symbolism in a hymn of the Rig-Veda Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 211 These examples, coming from different periods of history and from different peoples, prove the existence of a widespread tendency to equate fire-making with sexuality Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 213 The ceremonial or magical repetition of this age-old discovery shows how persistently the human mind clings to the old forms, and how-deep rooted is the memory of fire-boring Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 213 The finest of all symbols of the libido is the human figure, conceived as a demon or hero.

Here the symbolism leaves the objective, material realm of astral and meteorological images and takes on human form, changing into a figure who passes from joy to sorrow, from sorrow to joy, and, like the sun, now stands high at the zenith and now is plunged into darkest night only to rise again in new splendour Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 251 Hence the beautiful name of the sun-hero Gilgamesh, "The Man of Joy and Sorrow," Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 251 Just as the sun, by its own motion and in accordance with its own inner law, climbs from morn till noon, crosses the meridian and goes its downward way towards evening, leaving its radiance behind it, and finally plunges into all-enveloping night, so man sets his course by immutable laws and, his journey over, sinks into darkness to rise again in his children and begin the cycle anew Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 251 The symbolic transition from sun to man is easily made, and the third and last creation of the Miller Fantasies follows this pattern. She calls it "Chiwantopel, A hypnogogic drama" Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 251 These, so far as psychological experience is concerned, are the archetypal contents of the (collective) unconscious, the archaic heritage of humanity, the legacy left behind by all differentiation and development and bestowed upon all men like sunlight and air Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 259 But in loving this inheritance men love that which is common to all; they turn back to the mother of humanity, to the psyche, which was before consciousness existed, and in this way they make contact with the source and regain something of that mysterious and irresistible power which comes from the feeling of being part of the whole Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 259 It is the problem of Antaeus, who could only keep his giant strength through contact with mother earth. This temporary withdrawal into oneself seems, within certain limits, to have a favourable effect upon the psychic well-being of the individual Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 259 The concrete reality of religious figures assists the canalization of libido into the equivalent symbols, provided that the worship of them does not get stuck at the outward object Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 259 But even if it does, it at least remains bound to the representative human figure and loses its original primitive form, even though it does not attain the desired symbolic form Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 259 These, so far as psychological experience is concerned, are the archetypal contents of the (collective) unconscious, the archaic heritage of humanity, the legacy left behind by all differentiation and development and bestowed upon all men like sunlight and air Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 259 But in loving this inheritance men love that which is common to all; they turn back to the mother of humanity, to the psyche, which was before consciousness existed, and in this way they make contact with the source and regain something of that mysterious and irresistible power which comes from the feeling of being part of the whole Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 259 Dreams are full of these theriomorphic representations of libido. Hybrids and monsters, like the one found here, are not at all infrequent. Bertschinger has given us a series of illustrations in which the lower (animal) half in particular is represented theriomorphically. The libido so represented is the "animal" instinct which has got repressed Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 261 It is therefore conceivable that my patient was damaging his instinct precisely through his manifest lack of sexual repression. His fear of my imposing some medical prohibition on him is reflected a little too faithfully in the dream for the latter to be altogether above suspicion Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 261 Dreams which repeat the real situation too emphatically, or insist too plainly in some anticipated reality, are making use of conscious contents as a means of expression Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 261 His dream is really expressing a projection: he projects the killing of the animal on to the doctor. That is the way it appears to him, because he does not know that he himself is injuring his instinct Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 261 The pointed instrument generally means the needle of the intellect, with which insects are pinned down and classified Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 261 He has "modern" ideas about sex and does not know that he has an unconscious fear of my taking his pet theories away from him. This possibility is rightly feared, for if it were not in him he would hardly have had this dream Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 261 Thus the theriomorphic symbols always refer to unconscious manifestations of libido Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 261 Repression, as we have seen, is not directed solely against sexuality, but against the instincts in general which are the vital foundations, the laws governing all life Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 263 The regression caused by repressing the instincts always leads back to the psychic past, and consequently to the phase of childhood where the decisive factors appear to be, and sometimes actually are, the parents Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 263 But the inborn instincts of the child play a distinct role aside from the parents, as can be seen from the fact that the parents do not exercise a uniform influence on their children, who each react to them in a different way. They [inborn instincts] must, therefore, possess individual determinants Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 263 Yet, to the empty consciousness of the child, it must seem as if all the determining influences came from outside, because children cannot distinguish their own instincts from the influence and will of their parents Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 263 This lack of discrimination in the child makes it possible for the animals which represent the instincts to appear at the same time as attributes of the parents, and for the parents to appear in animal form, the father as a bull, the mother as a cow, and so on Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 263 If the regression goes still further back, beyond the phase of childhood to the preconscious, prenatal stage, then archetypal images appear, no longer connected with the individual's memories, but belonging to the stock of inherited possibilities of representation that are born anew in every individual Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 264 It is from them [archetypal images] that there arise those images of "divine" beings which are part animal, part human. The guise in which these figures appear depend on the attitude of the conscious mind: if it is negative towards the unconscious, the animals will be frightening: if positive, they appear as the "helpful animals" of fairytale and legend Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 264 It frequently happens that if the attitude towards the parents is too affectionate and too dependent, it is compensated in dreams by frightening animals, who represent the parents just as much as the helpful animals did. The Sphinx is a fear-animal of this kind and still shows clear traces of a mother derivative Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 264 Oedipus, thinking he had overcome the Sphinx sent by the mother-goddess merely because he had solved her childishly simple riddle, fell victim to matriarchal incest and had to marry Jocasta, his mother, for the throne and the hand of the widowed queen belonged to him who freed the land from the plague of the Sphinx. This had all those tragic consequences which could easily have been avoided if only Oedipus had been sufficiently intimidated by the frightening appearance of the terrible' or devouring' Mother whom the Sphinx personified Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 264 It is evident that a factor of such magnitude cannot be disposed of by solving a childish riddle. The riddle was, in fact, the trap which the Sphinx laid for the unwary wanderer. Overestimating his intellect in a typically masculine way, Oedipus walked right into it, and all unknowingly committed the crime of incest. The riddle of the Sphinx was herself the terrible mother-imago, which Oedipus would not take as a warning Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 265 Echidna was a monster with the top half of a beautiful maiden, and a hideous serpent below Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 265 This double-being corresponds to the mother-imago: above, the lovely and attractive human half; below, the horrible animal half, changed into a fear-animal by the incest prohibition Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 265 Echidna was born of the All-Mother, Mother Earth, Gaia, who conceived her with Tartarus, the personification of the underworld Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 265 Echidna herself was the mother of all terrors, of the Chimera, Scylla, the Gorgon, of frightful Cerberus, of the Nemean lion, and of the eagle that devoured the liver of Prometheus Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 265 She also gave birth to a number of dragons. One of her sons was Orthrus, the dog of the monster Geryon, who was slain by Heracles. With this dog, her own son, Echidna incestuously begat the Sphinx Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 265 The act of naming is, like baptism, extremely important as regards the creation of personality, for a magical power has been attributed to the name since time immemorial Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 274 To know the secret name of a person is to have power over him. A well-known example of this is the tale of Rumpelstiltskin. In an Egyptian myth, Isis permanently robs the sun-god Ra of his power by compelling him to tell her his real name Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 274 Therefore, to give a name means to give power, to invest with a definite personality or soul. Hence the old custom of giving children the names of saints Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 274 The anal region is very closely connected with veneration. An Oriental fairy-tale relates that the Crusaders used to anoint themselves with the excrement of the Pope in order to make themselves more formidable Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 276 One of my patients, who had a special veneration for her father, had a fantasy in which she saw her father sitting on a commode in a dignified manner, while people filed past greeting him effusively Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 276 We might also mention the intimate connection between excrement and gold: the lowest value allies itself to the highest Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 276 The alchemists sought their prima materia in excrement, one of the arcane substances from which it was hoped that the mystic figure of the filius philosophorum would emerge ("in stercore invenitur"). A very religiously brought-up young patient once dreamt that she saw the Crucifix formed of excrement on the bottom of a blue-flowered chamber-pot Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 276 The contrast is so enormous that one can only assume that the valuations of childhood are totally different from ours. And so, indeed, they are Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 276 Children bring to the act of defecation and its products an interest such as is later evinced only by the hypochondriac Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 276 We can only begin to understand this interest when we realize that the young child connects defecation with a theory of propagation. This puts a somewhat different complexion on the matter. The child thinks: that is how things are produced, how they "come out" Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 276 In popular humour excrement is often regarded as a monument or souveniran idea related to anal birth or creation by throwing something behind oneself Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 279 The two-horned derives from an Arabic term referring to the strength of the sun-bull. Alexander is often found on coins with the horns of Jupiter Ammon.This is one of the identifications of the legendary ruler with the spring sun in the sign of the Ram. There can be no doubt that mankind felt a great need to eliminate everything personal and human from its heroes so as to make them equal to the sun, i.e., absolute libido-symbols, through a kind of metastasis Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 283 Dhulqarnein brought his "friend" Khidr to the source of life, that he might drink of immortality. Alexander himself bathed in the stream of life and performed the ritual ablutions Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 288 There are, therefore, two figures who resemble one another but are nevertheless distinct Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 288 The analogous situation in Christianity is the scene by the Jordan, where John leads Christ to the source of life Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 288 Christ, as the baptized, is here the subordinate, while John plays the superior role, as in the case of Dhulqarnein and Khidr, or Khidr and Moses, and Khidr and Elias Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 288 The god, Tages, bore the epithet 'the fresh-ploughed boy,' because, according to legend, he sprang out of a furrow behind a peasant ploughing his fields. This image illustrates the Mondamin motif very clearly; the plough has the well-known phallic meaning, and the furrow, as in India, stands for the woman Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 527 Psychologically this image is a symbolical equivalent of copulation, the son being the edible fruit of the field Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 527 The Etruscan Tages, the boy who sprang from the freshly ploughed furrow, was also a teacher of wisdom. In the Litaolane myth of the Basuto, we are told how a monster devoured all human beings and left only one woman alive, who gave birth to a son, the hero, in a cowshed (instead of a cave). Before she could prepare a bed of straw for the infant, he was already grown up and spoke "words of wisdom" Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 291 The rapid growth of the hero, a recurrent motif, seems to indicate that the birth and apparent childhood of the hero are extraordinary because his birth is really a rebirth, for which reason he is able to adapt so quickly to his heroic role Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 291 The journey of Moses with his servant Joshua is a life-journey (it lasted eighty years). They grow old together and lose the life-force, i.e., the fish, which "in wondrous wise took its way to the sea" (setting of the sun) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 291 When the two notice their loss, they discover at the place where the source of life is found (where the dead fish revived and sprang into the sea) Khidr wrapped in his mantle, sitting on the ground Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 291 Where the fish vanished Khidr, the Verdant One, was born as a "son of the watery deep," his head veiled, proclaiming divine wisdom Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 291 They form a pair of brothers whose characters are revealed by the symbolic position of the torches. Cumont not unjustly connects then with the sepulchral Erotes, who as genies with inverted torches have a traditional meaning. One would stand for death, the other for life Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 294 There are certain points of resemblance between the Mithraic sacrifice (where the bull in the center is flanked on either side by dadophors) and the Christian sacrifice of the lamb (or ram). The Crucified is traditionally flanked by two thieves, one of whom ascends to paradise while the other descends to hell Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 294 The two dadophors are, as Cumont has offshoots from the main figure of Mithras, who was supposed to have a secret triadic character. Dionysius the Areopagite reports that the magicians held a feast in honor of (the threefold Mithras) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 294 As Cumont observes Cautes and Cautopates sometimes carry in their hands the head of a bull and of a scorpion respectively Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 295 Taurus and Scorpio are equinoctial signs, and this is a clear indication that the sacrifice was primarily connected with the sun cycle: the rising sun that sacrifices itself at the summer solstice, and the setting sun. Since it was not easy to represent sunrise and sunset in the sacrificial drama, this idea had to be shown outside it Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 295 We have already pointed out that the Dioscuri represent a similar idea in somewhat different form: one sun is mortal, the other immortal. As this whole solar mythology is psychology projected into the heavens, the underlying idea could probably be paraphrased thus: just as man consists of a mortal and an immortal part, so the sun is a pair of brothers, one of whom is mortal (the setting sun), the other immortal (the ever-renewing sun). Man is mortal, yet there is something immortal in us Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 296 Thus the gods, or figures like Khidr and the Comte de Saint-Germain, are our immortal part which continue intangibly to exist 296. The sun comparison tells us over and over again that the dynamic of the gods is psychic energy. This is our immortality, the link through which man feels inextinguishably one with the continuity of all life. The life of the psyche is the life of mankind. Welling up from the depths of the unconscious, its springs gush forth from the root of the whole human race, since the individual is, biologically speaking, only a twig broken off from the mother and transplanted Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 296 Both possibilities are found on a late Babylonian gem from Lajard's collection. In the middle stands an androgynous deity. On the masculine side there is a snake with a sun halo round its head; on the feminine side another snake with a sickle moon above it Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 297 This picture has a symbolic sexual nuance: on the masculine side there is a lozenge, a favourite symbol of the female genitals, and on the feminine side a wheel without its rim. The spokes are thickened at the ends into knobs, which, like the fingers we mentioned earlier, have a phallic meaning Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 297 It seems to be a phallic wheel such as was not unknown in antiquity. There are obscene gems on which Cupid is shown turning a wheel consisting entirely of phalli. As to what the sun signifies, I discovered in the collection of antiquities at Verona a late Roman inscription Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 297 The symbolism is plain: sun = phallus, moon = vessel (uterus). This interpretation is confirmed by another monument from the same collection. The symbols are the same, except that the vessel has been replaced by the figure of a woman Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 298 Certain symbols on coins can probably be interpreted in a similar manner. In Lajard's Recherches sur la culte de Vénus there is a coin from Perga, showing Artemis as a conical stone flanked by a masculine figure (alleged to be the deity Men) and a female figure (alleged to be Artemis). Men (otherwise called Lunus) appears on an Attic bas-relief with a spear, flanked by Pan with a club, and a female figure. From this it is clear that sexuality as well as the sun can be used to symbolize the libido Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 298 Sex being one of the most obvious examples of instinctuality, it is sex which is liable to be most affected by these sacrificial measures, i.e., through abstinence Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 299 Just as Attis unmans himself for the sake of his mother, and his effigy was hung on the pine-tree in memory of this deed, so Christ hangs on the tree of life, on the wood of martyrdom, the and mother, and ransoms creation from death Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 671 Attis also wears the pileus [or "Phrygian cap"] like Men, Mithras, and the dadophors Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 29 The hero himself appears as a being of more than human stature. He is distinguished from the very beginning by his godlike characteristics Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 612 Since he is psychologically an archetype of the Self, his divinity only confirms that the Self is numinous, a sort of god, or having some share in the divine nature Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 612 The hero is the protagonist of God's transformation in man; he corresponds to what I call the "mana personality." The mana personality has such an immense fascination for the conscious mind that the ego all too easily succumbs to the temptation to identify with the hero, thus bringing on a psychic inflation with all its consequences. For this reason the repugnance felt by certain ecclesiastical circles for the "inner Christ" is understandable enough, at least as a preventive measure against the danger of psychic inflation which threatens the Christian European Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 612 Heroes are usually wanderers, and wandering is a symbol of longing, of the restless urge which never finds its object, of nostalgia for the lost mother. The sun comparison can easily be taken in this sense: the heroes are like the wandering sun, from which it is concluded that the myth of the hero is a solar myth Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 299 It seems to us, rather, that he is first and foremost a self-representation of the longing of the unconscious, of its unquenched and unquenchable desire for the light of consciousness. But consciousness, continually in danger of being led astray by its own light and of becoming a rootless will o' the wisp, longs for the healing power of nature, for the deep wells of being and for unconscious communion with life in all its countless forms Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 299 It is not man as such who has to be regenerated or born again as a renewed whole, but, according to the statements of mythology, it is the hero or god who rejuvenates himself. These figures are generally expressed or characterized by libido-symbols (light, fire, sun, etc.), so that it looks as if they represented psychic energy. They are, in fact, personifications of the libido Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 388 The hero is a hero just because he sees resistance to the forbidden goal in all life's difficulties and yet fights that resistance with the whole-hearted yearning that strives towards the treasure hard to attain, and perhaps unattainable yearning that paralyses and kills the ordinary man Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 510 The hero is an extraordinary being who is inhabited by a daemon, and it is this that makes him a hero. That is why the mythological statements about heroes are so typical and so impersonal Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 536 It is therefore understandable that the three mother-goddesses, Rhea, Cybele, and Diana, all wear the mural crown. The Old Testament treats the cities of Jerusalem, Babylon, etc. just as if they were women Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 303 The Boeotian city of Thebes founded by Cadmus received on that account the cognomen "Ogygian." This cognomen was also applied to the great Flood, which was called "Ogygian" because it happened under Ogyges. We shall see later on that this coincidence can hardly be accidental Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 306 There is a similar idea in Hindu mythology, where Indra appears as the husband of Urvara. But Urvara means the "fertile land." In the same way the seizure of a country by the king was regarded as his marriage with the land Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 306 Similar ideas must also have existed in Europe. Princes at their accession had to guarantee a good harvest. The Swedish king Domaldi was actually killed as a result of failure of the crops. In the Hindu Ramayana, the hero Rama marries Sita, the furrow  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 306  To the same circle of ideas belongs the Chinese custom of the emperor's having to plough a furrow on ascending the throne  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 306  The motif of continuous cohabitation is expressed in the well-known lingam symbol found everywhere in Indian temples: the base is a female symbol, and within it stands the phallus (fig. 258.25). This symbol is rather like the phallic baskets and chests of the Greeks  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 306  The chest or casket is a female, i.e., the womb, a common enough conception in the older mythologies. The chest, barrel, or basket with its precious contents was often thought of as floating on the water, thus forming an analogy to the course of the sun. The sun sails over the sea like an immortal god who every evening is immersed in the maternal waters and is born anew in the morning  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 306  Another form of the same motif is the Persian idea of the tree of life, which stands in the lake of rain, Vouru-Kasha. The seeds of this tree were mixed with the water and so maintained the fertility of the earth. The Vendidad, says that the waters flow "to the sea Vouru-Kasha, towards the well-watered tree, whereon grow the seeds of my plants of every kind"  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 306  It is easy to see what the battle with the sea monster means: it is the attempt o free the ego-consciousness from the deadly grip of the unconscious. The making of a fire in the monster's belly suggests as much, for it is a piece of apotropaic magic aimed at dispelling the darkness of unconsciousness  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 539  The bird probably signifies the renewed ascent of the sun, the rebirth of the phoenix, and is at the same time one of those "helpful animals" who render supernatural aid during the birth: birds as aerial beings, symbolize spirits or angels  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 538  Divine messengers frequently appear at these mythological births, as can be seen from the use we still make of god-parents  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 538  The sun-symbol of the bird rising from the water is preserved etymologically in the idea of the singing swan.

Swan' derives from the root sven, like sun' and 'sound'  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 538  This ascent signifies rebirth, the bringing forth of life from the mother, and the ultimate conquest of death, which, according to an African Negro myth, came into the world through the carelessness of one old woman: when the season of universal skin-casting came round again (for in those days people renewed themselves by casting their skins like snakes), she was absent-minded enough to put on her old skin instead of the new one, and in consequence died  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 538  The myth often spans a period of three-days. The "three-days" are a stereotyped expression for the "night sea imprisonment" (December 21-24). Christ, too, spent three days in the underworld  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 512  The myth is exemplified in the battle of Hiawatha with Mishe-Nahma, the fish-king. Mishe-Nahma is a monster fish who lives at the bottom of the waters. Challenged to battle by Hiawatha, he swallows the hero together with his boat 537.  Just as Hera, in her role of the pursuing mother, is the real source of the mighty deeds performed by Heracles, so Nokomis allows Hiawatha no rest, but piles up new difficulties in his path, hazardous adventures in which the hero may be victorious, but may also meet with his death  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 540  Man with his consciousness is always a long way behind the goals of the unconscious; unless his libido calls him forth to new dangers he sinks into slothful inactivity, or in the prime of life he is overcome with longing for the past and is paralysed  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 540  A Polynesian myth tells how the hero, in the belly of Kombili, the King Fish, seized his obsidian knife and cut open the fish's belly. "He slipped out and beheld a splendour. Then he sat down and began to think. 'I wonder where I am?' he said to himself"  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 311  In the light of these ideas we can understand the mythological statements about Ogyges: it is he who possesses the mother, the city, and is thus united with the mother; therefore under him came the great flood, for it is typical of the sun myth that the hero, once he is united with the woman "hard to attain," is exposed in a cask and thrown out to sea, and then lands on a distant shore to begin a new life Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 312 The middle section, the night sea journey in the ark, is lacking in the Ogyges tradition. But the rule in mythology is that the typical parts of a myth can be fitted together in every conceivable variation, which makes it extraordinarily difficult to interpret one myth without a knowledge of all the others Carl Jung, CW 5, Para312 The meaning of this cycle of myths is clear enough: it is the longing to attain rebirth through a return to the womb, and to become immortal like the sun. This longing for the mother is amply expressed in the literature of the Bible Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 312 The symbol-creating process substitutes for the mother the city, the well, the cave, the Church, etc. This substitution is due to the fact that the regression of libido reactivates the ways and habits of childhood, and above all the relation to the mother; but what was natural and useful to the child is a psychic danger for the adult, and this is expressed by the symbol of incest Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 313 Because the incest taboo opposes the libido and blocks the path to regression, it is possible for the libido to be canalized into the mother analogies thrown up by the unconscious Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 313 In that way the libido becomes progressive again, and even attains a level of consciousness higher than before Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 313 The meaning and purpose of this canalization are particularly evident when the city appears in place of the mother: the infantile attachment (whether primary or secondary) is a crippling limitation for the adult, whereas attachment to the city fosters his civic virtues and at least enables him to lead a useful existence Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 313 In primitives the tribe takes the place of the city Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 313 The birds are soul-images, by which are meant the souls of the damned and evil spirits. Thus the mother becomes the underworld, the City of the Damned Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 315 In this primordial image of the woman on the dragon we recognize Echidna, the mother of every hellish horror Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 315 Babylon is the symbol of the Terrible Mother, who leads the peoples into whoredom with her devilish temptations and makes them drunk with her wine. Here the intoxicating drink is closely associated with fornication, for it too is a libido symbol, as we have already seen in the soma-fire-sun parallel Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 31 From water comes life; hence, of the two deities who here interest us most, Christ and Mithras, the latter is represented as having been born beside a river, while Christ experienced his “rebirth” in the Jordan Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 319 Christ, moreover, was born of the, the sempiternal fons amoris or Mother of God, whom pagan-Christian legend turned into a nymph of the spring Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 319 The spring is also found in Mithraism. A Pannonian dedication reads “Fonti perenni.” An inscription from Apulum is dedicated to the “Fons aeternus.” In Persian, Ardvisura is the fount of the water of life Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 319 Ardvisura-Anahita is a goddess of water and love (just as Aphrodite is the “foam-born”) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 319 In the Vedas, the waters are called matritamah, ‘most maternal.’ All living things rise, like the sun, from water, and sink into it again at evening Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 319 Born of springs, rivers, lakes, and seas, man at death comes to the waters of the Styx, and there embarks on the “night sea journey.” Those black waters of death are the water of life, for death with its cold embrace is the maternal womb, just as the sea devours the sun but brings it forth again Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 319 The projection of the mother-imago upon water endows the water with a number of numinous or magical qualities peculiar to the mother. A good example of this is the baptismal water symbolism in the Church Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 320 The maternal aspect of water coincides with the nature of the unconscious, because the unconscious (particularly in men) can be regarded as the mother or matrix of consciousness Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 320 Numerous myths say that human beings came from trees, and many of them tell how the hero was enclosed in the maternal tree-trunk, like the dead Osiris in the cedar-tree, Adonis in the myrtle, ecocar Jung, CW 5, Para 321 Hence when Attis castrates himself under a pine-tree, he did so because the tree has a maternal significance Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 321 Not only the gods, but the goddesses, too, are libido-symbols, when regarded from the point of view of their dynamism. The libido expresses itself in images of sun, light, fire, sex, fertility, and growth Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 324 In this way the goddesses, as we have seen, come to possess phallic symbols, even though the latter are essentially masculine. One of the main reasons for this is that, just as the female lies hidden in the male (fig. 258.29), so the male lies hidden in the female Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 324 The feminine quality of the tree that represents the goddesses contaminated with the phallic symbolism, as is evident from the genealogical tree that grows out of Adam's body. In my Psychology and Alchemy I have reproduced, from a manuscript in Florence, a picture of Adam showing the membrum virile as a tree Thus the tree has a bisexual character, as is also suggested by the fact that in Latin the names of trees have masculine endings and feminine gender Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 324 She was in a garden, where she found an exotic-looking tree with strange red fleshy flowers or fruits. She picked and ate them. Then, to her horror, she felt that she was poisoned Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 325 It is the tree of libido, which here represents the feminine as well as the masculine side, because it simply expresses the relationship of the two to one another Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 326 The various meanings of the treesun, tree of Paradise, mother, phallus are explained by the fact that it is a libido-symbol and not an allegory of this or that concrete object. Thus a phallic symbol does not denote the sexual organ, but the libido, and however clearly it appears as such, it does not mean itself but is always a symbol of the libido Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 329 Symbols are not signs or allegories for something known; they seek rather to express something that is little known or completely unknown. The tertium comparationis [the 'third for comparison'] for all these symbols is the libido, and the unity of meaning lies in the fact that they are all analogies of the same thing. In this realm the fixed meaning of things comes to an end Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 329 The sole reality is the libido, whose nature we can only experience through its effect on us. Thus, it is not the mother who is symbolized, but the libido of the son, whose object was once the mother Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 329 We take mythological symbols much too concretely and are puzzled at every turn by the endless contradictions of myths. But we always forget that it is the conscious creative force which wraps itself in images Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 329 When, therefore, we read: "His mother was a wicked witch," we must translate it as: the son is unable to detach his libido from the mother-imago, he suffers from resistances because he is tied to the mother Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 329 One of the simplest ways would be to impregnate the mother and beget oneself in identical form all over again. But here the incest prohibition intervenes; consequently the sun myths and rebirth myths devise every conceivable kind of mother-analogy for the purpose of canalizing the libido into new forms and effectively preventing it from regressing to actual incest Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 332 The effect of the incest-taboo and of the attempts at canalization is to stimulate the creative imagination, which gradually opens up possible avenues for the self-realization of libido. In this way the libido becomes imperceptibly spiritualized Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 332 The power which "always desires evil" thus creates spiritual life. That is why the religions exalt this procedure into a system. It is instructive to see the pains they take to further the translation into symbols Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 332 To the above, I would add that it is hardly possible to restrict this impulse to sexuality. It is primarily a question of primitive instinctuality, of insufficiently differentiated libido which prefers to take a sexual form. Sexuality is by no means the only form of the "full feeling of life." There are some passions that cannot be derived from sex Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 332 It is not possible to discuss the problem of symbol-formation without reference to the instinctual processes, because it is from them that the symbol derives its motive power. It has no meaning whatever unless it strives against the resistance of instinct, just as undisciplined instincts would bring nothing but ruin to man if the symbol does not give them form Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 338 Vollers compares Khidr and Elias on the one hand with Gilgamesh and his primitive brother Eabani or Enkidu, and on the other hand with the Dioscuri, one of whom was mortal and the other immortal (Vollers, “Chidher,” pp. 234-84) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 288 The rapid growth of the hero, a recurrent motif, seems to indicate that the birth and apparent childhood of the hero are extraordinary because his birth is really a rebirth, for which reason he is able to adapt so quickly to his heroic role Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 291 The journey of Moses with his servant Joshua is a life-journey (it lasted eighty years). They grow old together and lose the life-force, i.e., the fish, which “in wondrous wise took its way to the sea” (setting of the sun) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 291 It is not man as such who has to be regenerated or born again as a renewed whole, but, according to the statements of mythology, it is the hero or god who rejuvenates himself. These figures are generally expressed or characterized by libido-symbols (light, fire, sun, etc.), so that it looks as if they represented psychic energy. They are, in fact, personifications of the libido Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 388 The hero is a hero just because he sees resistance to the forbidden goal in all life’s difficulties and yet fights that resistance with the whole-hearted yearning that strives towards the treasure hard to attain, and perhaps unattainable yearning that paralyses and kills the ordinary man Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 510 The hero is an extraordinary being who is inhabited by a daemon, and it is this that makes him a hero. That is why the mythological statements about heroes are so typical and so impersonal Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 536 He [the hero] shares this paradoxical nature with the snake. According to Philo the snake is the most spiritual of all creatures; it is of a fiery nature, and its swiftness is terrible. It has a long life and sloughs off old age with its skin. In actual fact the snake is a cold-blooded creature, unconscious and unrelated. It is both toxic and prophylactic, equally a symbol of the good and bad daemon (the Agathodaimon), of Christ and the devil. Among the Gnostics it was regarded as an emblem of the brain-stem and spinal cord, as is consistent with its predominantly reflex psyche. It is an excellent symbol for the unconscious, perfectly expressing the latter’s sudden and unexpected manifestations, its painful and dangerous intervention in our affairs, and it’s frightening effects Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 580 It is therefore understandable that the three mother-goddesses, Rhea, Cybele, and Diana, all wear the mural crown. The Old Testament treats the cities of Jerusalem, Babylon, etc. just as if they were women Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 303 The fact that the city and the wife of Ogyges both have the same name indicates that there must be some relation between the city and the woman, which is not difficult to understand because the city is identical with the woman Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 306 Another form of the same motif is the Persian idea of the tree of life, which stands in the lake of rain, Vouru-Kasha. The seeds of this tree were mixed with the water and so maintained the fertility of the earth. The Vendidad, says that the waters flow “to the sea Vouru-Kasha, towards the well-watered tree, whereon grow the seeds of my plants of every kind” Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 306 Frobenius describes the hero’s journey as going through eight stages: Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 310 Jung believed that the causal explanation was incorrect because the so-called “incest prohibition” which is supposed to operate here is not in itself a primary phenomenon, but goes back to something much more fundamental, namely the primitive system of marriage classes which, in its turn, is a vital necessity in the organization of the tribe Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 332 So it is more a question of phenomena requiring a teleological explanation than of simple causalities. Moreover it must be pointed out that the basis of the “incestuous” desire is not cohabitation, but, as every sun myth shows, the strange idea of becoming a child again, of returning to the parental shelter, and of entering into the mother in order to be reborn through her. But the way to this goal lies through incest, i.e., the necessity of finding some way into the mother’s body Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 332 It is not incestuous cohabitation that is desired, but rebirth. The incest prohibition acts as an obstacle and makes the creative fantasy inventive: for instance, there are attempts to make the mother pregnant by means of fertility magic Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 332 The effect of the incest-taboo and of the attempts at canalization is to stimulate the creative imagination, which gradually opens up possible avenues for the self-realization of libido. In this way the libido becomes imperceptibly spiritualized Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 332 The power which "always desires evil" thus creates spiritual life. That is why the religions exalt this procedure into a system. It is instructive to see the pains they take to further the translation into symbols Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 332 It is less than two thousand years since the cult of sex was in full bloom. In those days, of course, they were heathens and did not know any better, but the nature of the symbol-creating forces does not change from age to age Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 339 If one has any conception of the sexual content of those ancient cults, and if one realizes that the experience of union with God was understood in antiquity as a more or less concrete coitus, then one can no longer pretend that the forces motivating the production of symbols have suddenly become different since the birth of Christ Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 339 The fact that primitive Christianity resolutely turned away from nature and the instincts in general, and, through its asceticism, from sex in particular, clearly indicates the source from which its motive forces came Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 339 So it is not surprising that this transformation has left noticeable traces in Christian symbolism. Had it not done so; Christianity would never have been able to transform libido. It succeeded in this largely because its archetypal analogies were for the most part in tune with the instinctual forces it wanted to transform Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 339 At a time when a large part of mankind is beginning to discard Christianity, it may be worth our while to try to understand why it was accepted in the first place Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 341 It was accepted as a means of escape from the brutality and unconsciousness of the ancient world. As soon as we discard it [Christianity], the old brutality returns in force, as has been made overwhelmingly clear by contemporary events Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 341 He who throws Christianity overboard and with it the whole basis of morality, is bound to be confronted with the age-old problem of brutality. We have had bitter experience of what happens when a whole nation finds the moral mask too stupid to keep up. The beast breaks loose, and a frenzy of demoralization sweeps over the civilized world Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 341 Today there are countless neurotics who are neurotic simply because they do not know why they cannot be happy in their own way they do not even know that the fault lies with them Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 342 Besies these neurotics there are many more normal people, men and women of the better kind, who feel restricted and discontented because they have no symbol which would act as an outlet for their libido Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 342 For all these people a reductive analysis down to the primal facts should be undertaken, so that they can become acquainted with their primitive personality and learn how to take due account of it. Only in this way can certain requirements be fulfilled and others rejected as unreasonable because of their infantile character Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 342 We like to imagine that our primitive traits have long since disappeared without trace. In this we are cruelly disappointed, for never before has our civilization been so swamped with evil. Mere faith cannot be counted as an ethical ideal either, because it too is an unconscious transformation of libido. Faith is a charisma for those who possess it, but it is no way for those who need to understand before they can believe. This is a matter of temperament and cannot be discounted as valueless. For, ultimately, even the believer believes that God gave man reason, and for something better than to lie and cheat with Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 342 Although we naturally believe in symbols in the first place, we can also understand them, and this is indeed the only viable way for those who have not been granted the charisma of faith Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 342 Psychological truth by no means excludes metaphysical truth, though psychology, as a science, has to hold aloof from all metaphysical assertions. Its subject is the psyche and its contents. Both are realities, because they work Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 344 Though we do possess a physics of the soul, and are not even able to observe it and judge it from some Archimedean point "outside" ourselves, and can therefore know nothing objective about it since all knowledge of the psyche is itself psychic, in spite of all this the soul is the only experiment of life and existence Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 344 It is, in fact, the only immediate experience we can have and the sine qua non of the subjective reality of the world. The symbols it creates are always grounded in the unconscious archetype, but their manifest forms are moulded by the ideas acquired by the conscious mind Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 344 The archetypes are the numinous, structural elements of the psyche and possess a certain autonomy and specific energy which enables them to attract, out of the conscious mind, those contents which are best suited to themselves Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 344 The symbols act as transformers, their function to convert libido from a "lower" into a "higher" form. This function is so important that feeling accords it the highest values Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 344 The symbol works by suggestion; that is to say, it carries conviction and at the same time expresses the content of the conviction. It is able to do this because of the numen, the specific energy stored up in the archetype. Experience of the archetype is not only impressive, but it also seizes and possesses the whole personality, and is naturally productive of faith Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 344 Rhea was pregnant with Osiris and his twin sister Isis, and they mated together even in their mother's womb (night sea journey with incest) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 349 Isis is said to have been born in the "All-Wetness", and of Osiris it is related that a certain Pamyles of Thebes, whilst drawing water, heard a voice from the temple of Zeus which commanded him to proclaim that Osiris, "the great and beneficent king", was born. In honour of this Pamyles the Pamylia were celebrated, similar to the Phallophoria Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 349 Pamyles seems, therefore, to have been originally a phallic daimon, like Dionysus. In his phallic form he represents the creative power which "draws" things out of the unconscious (i.e., the water) and begets the god (Osiris) as a conscious content Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 349 This process can be understood both as an individual experience: Pamyles drawing water, and as a symbolic act or experience of the archetype: a drawing up from the depths Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 349 What is drawn up is a numinous, previously unconscious content which would remain dark were it not interpreted by the voice from above as the birth of a god. This type of experience recurs in the baptism [Christ's] in the Jordan (Matthew 3: 17) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 349 Typical of the trees found in myth is the tree of paradise, or tree of life; most people know of the pine-tree of Attis, the tree or trees of Mithras, and the word-ash Yggdrasill of Nordic mythology, and so on Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 349 The hanging of Attis, in effigy, on a pine-tree, the hanging of Marsyas, which became a popular theme for art, the hanging of Odin, the Germanic hanging sacrifices and the whole series of hanged gods all teach us that the hanging of Christ on the Cross is nothing unique in religious mythology, but belongs to the same circle of ideas Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 349 In this world of images the Cross is the Tree of Life and at the same time a Tree of Death coffin (fig. 258.36). Just as the myths tell us that human beings were descended from trees, so there were burial customs where people were buried in hollow tree-trunks, whence the German Totenbaum, 'tree of death,' for coffin, which is still in use today Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 349 If we remember that the tree is predominantly a mother-symbol, then the meaning of this mode of burial becomes clear. The dead are delivered back to the mother for rebirth Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 349 Osiris was killed in a crafty manner by the god of the underworld, Set (Typhon in Greek) who locked him in a chest Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 350 After completing the night sea journey, the coffer containing Osiris was cast ashore at Byblos and came to rest in the branches of a cedar-tree which shot up and enclosed the coffer in its trunk (fig. 023) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 353 The king of the country, admiring the splendid tree, caused it to be cut down and made into a pillar supporting the roof of his house time that coincides with the age-old lament for the dead god Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 353 Isis collected the pieces together again with the help of the jackal-headed Anubis. Here the dogs and jackals, devourers of corpses by night, assist in the reconstitution or reproduction of Osiris. To this necrophagous function the Egyptian vulture probably owes its symbolic mother significance Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 354 Although Isis had managed to collect the pieces of the body, its resuscitation was only partially successful because the phallus could not be found; it had been eaten by the fishes, and the reconstituted body lacked vital force Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 356 The phantom Osiris lay once more with Isis, but the fruit of their union was Harpocrates [the young Horus] who was weak "in the lower limbs," i.e., in the feet Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 356 Osiris, although only a phantom, now makes the young sun (his son Horus), ready for battle with Set, the evil spirit of darkness Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 356 Osiris and Horus represent the father-son symbolism mentioned at the beginning. Osiris is thus flanked by the comely Horus and the misshapen Harpocrates, who is mostly shown as a cripple, sometimes distorted to the point of freakishness Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 356 The serpent symbolizes the mysterious numen of the "mother" (and of other daimonia) who kills, but who is at the same time man's only security against death, as she is the source of life. Accordingly, only the mother can cure him who is sick unto death, and the hymn goes on to describe how the gods were called together to take counsel: Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 452 Finally Ra decides to utter his true name. He was only partially cured, just as Osiris was only incompletely reconstituted, and in addition he lost his power and finally had to retire on the back of the heavenly cow Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 454 From this wound Ra never recovered, so that he finally had to retire on the back of the heavenly cow. But the cow was the cow-headed mother-goddess (fig. 258.30b), just as Osiris was the bull Apis. The mother is accused as though she were the cause of his having to fly to her in order to be cured of the wound she herself had inflicted Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 351 So when the sun-god Ra retires on the back of the heavenly cow, it means that he is going back into the mother in order to rise again as Horus. In the morning the goddess is the mother, at noon she is the sister-wife, and at evening once more the mother who takes back the dead into her womb Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 360 The poisonous worm is a deadly form of libido instead of an animating form. The "true name" is Ra's soul and magic power (his libido). What Isis demands is the transference of libido to the mother. This request is fulfilled to the letter, for the aging god returns to the heavenly cow, the symbol of the mother Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 455 But the real cause of the wound is the incest-taboo, which cuts a man off from the security of childhood and early youth, from all those unconscious, instinctive happenings that allow the child to live without responsibility as an appendage of his parents Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 351 It is significant that it is "evil" which lures Osiris into the chest; for, in the light of teleology, the motif of containment signifies the latent state that precedes regeneration Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 351 Actually Isis collected the pieces of Osiris' body together with the help of the jackal-headed Anubis. Here the dogs and jackals, devourers of corpses by night, assist in the reconstitution or reproduction of Osiris. To this necrophagous function the Egyptian vulture probably owes its symbolic mother significance Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 354 In ancient times the Persians used to throw out their corpses for the dogs to devour, just as, today in Tiber, the dead are left to the vultures, and in Bombay, where the Parsis expose their corpses on the "tower of silence" Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 354 The Persians had the custom of leading a dog to the bedside of a dying man, who then had to give the dog a morsel to eat. This custom suggests that the morsel should belong to the dog, so that he will spare the body of the dying man, just as Cerberus was pacified with the honey-cakes which Heracles gave him on his journey to hell Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 354 Hence the bringing in of the dog would have a compensatory significance, death being made equal to the sun at its highest point. This is a thoroughly psychological interpretation, as can be seen from the fact that death is quite commonly regarded as an entry into the mother's womb (for rebirth) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 354 The interpretation would seem to be supported by the otherwise enigmatic function of the dog in the Mithraic sacrifice. In the monuments a dog is often shown leaping upon the bull killed by Mithras. In the light of the Persian legend, and on the evidence of the monuments themselves, this sacrifice should be conceived as the moment of supreme fruitfulness Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 354 This moment of supreme fruitfulness is most beautifully portrayed in the Mithraic relief at Heddernheim. On one side of a large (formerly rotating) stone slab there is a stereotyped representation of the overthrow and sacrifice of the bull, while on the other side stand Sol with a bunch of grapes in his hand, Mithras with the cornucopia, and the dadophors bearing fruits, in accordance with the legend that from the dead bull comes all fruitfulness: fruits from his horns, wine from his blood, corn from his tail, cattle from his semen, garlic from his nostrils, and so forth. Over this scene stands Sylvanus, the beasts of the forest leaping away from him Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 354 In this context the dog might very well have the significance suspected by Creuzer. Moreover the goddess of the underworld, Hecate, is dog-headed, like Anubis. As Canicula, she received dog sacrifices to keep away the pest Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 355 Hecate's close relation to the moon-goddess suggests that she was a promoter of growth. Hecate was the first to bring Demeter news of her stolen daughter, another reminder of Anubis Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 355 Dog sacrifices were also offered to Eileithyia, the goddess of birth, and Hecate herself (fig. 258.58) is, on occasion, a goddess of marriage and birth Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 355 The dog is also the regular companion of Aesculapius, the god of healing, who, while still a mortal, raised a man from the dead and was struck by a thunderbolt as a punishment. These associations help to explain the following passage in Petronius: I earnestly beseech you to paint a small dog round the foot of my statue so that by your kindness I may attain to life after death Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 355 Diocletian dedicated a crypt to Hecate, with 365 steps leading down to it. Cave mysteries in her honor seem also to have been celebrated in Samothrace. The Hecate mysteries flourished in Rome towards the end of the fourth century Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 577 Hecate plays an important part in Greek syncretism, being confused with Artemis, who was also called the, 'far-hitting,' or 'she who hits at will,' a name that once more reveals her superordinate power. Artemis is the huntress with hounds, and Hecate too is the wild huntress prowling at night Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 577 The goddess of the underworld, Hecate, is sometimes represented with a horse's head As goddess of the underworld, Hecate, is dog-headed, like Anubis. As Canicula, she received dog sacrifices to keep away the pest Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 355 As guardian of the gate of Hades and as the triple-bodied goddess of dogs, she is more or less identical with Cerberus. Thus, in bringing up Cerberus, Heracles was really bringing the vanquished mother of death to the upper world Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 577 It is she who sends that horrible and fearful night-time apparition, the Empusa, which Aristophanes says comes wrapped in a bladder swollen with blood. According to Libanius, the mother of Aischines was also called Empusa, because she "rushed out upon women and children from dark places" Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 577 As an incubus or vampire she appears in the form of Empusa, or as a man-eating lamia or again in that more beautiful guise, the "Bride of Corinth". The Empusa had peculiar feet: one foot was of brass, the other of ass's dung Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 577 Hecate is a real spook-goddess of the night and phantoms, a nightmare; she is sometimes shown riding a horse, and in Hesiod she is counted the patron goddess of riders Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 577 She [Hecate] is the mother of all witchcraft and witches, the patron goddess of Medea, because the power of the Terrible Mother is irresistible, coming as it does from the unconscious Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 577 The pillory where criminals were scourged was also known as the Hekate; and to her, as to the Roman Trivia, were dedicated junctions of three roads, forked roads, and crossroads. Where the roads branch off or meet, dog-sacrifices were offered to her, and there too were thrown the bodies of the executed: the sacrifice occurs at the point of union Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 577 Where the roads cross and enter into one another, thereby symbolizing the union of opposites, there is the "mother," the object and epitome of all union Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 577 Where the roads divide, where there is parting, separation, splitting, there we find the "division," the cleft the symbol of the mother and at the same time the essence of what the mother means for us, namely cleavage and farewell. Accordingly, the meaning of a sacrifice on this spot would be propitiation of the mother in both senses Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 577 Hecate is a birth-goddess (), the 'multiplier of cattle,' and goddess of marriage. In Orphic cosmogony, she occupies the centre of the world as Aphrodite and Gaia, if not as the world-soul itself Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 577 In Tralles, Hecate appears side by side with Priapus; there is also a Hecate Aphrodisias Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 577 The identification of Hecate with Brimo as the underworldly mother is understandable, also her identification with Persephone and Rhea, the primitive All-Mother. Her maternal significance also explains her confusion with Eileithyia, the goddess of childbirth Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 577 In the Hecate mysteries a wand, named the ('white leaved') was broken. This wand protected the purity of virgins and caused madness in anyone who touched it. We recognize here the motif of the sacred tree, the mother who might not be touched. Only a madman would attempt to do so Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 577 Her close relation to the moon-goddess suggests that she was a promoter of growth. Hecate was the first to bring Demeter news of her stolen daughter, another reminder of Anubis. Hecate herself is, on occasion, a goddess of marriage and birth Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 355 As the "spirit-mother" she sends madness, the moon sickness. This idea is perfectly sensible, because most forms of lunacy consist of affections which amount to an invasion by the unconscious and an inundation of the conscious mind Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 577 Nun is therefore invoked as Amon, the primordial waters, which was in the beginning." He is also called the father of fathers, the mother of mothers Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 358 The word nun means 'young, fresh, new,' and also the new flood-waters of the Nile. In a metaphorical sense it is used for the chaotic waters of the beginning, and for the birth-giving primary substance, which is personified as the goddess Naunet Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 359 From her sprang Nut, the sky-goddess, who is represented with a starry body or as a heavenly cow dotted with stars Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 359 A primitive myth tells of a sun-hero who has to be freed from a creeping plant. The girl dreams that her lover has fallen into the water; she tries to rescue him, but first has to pull seaweed out of the water, then she catches him Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 362 In an African myth the hero, after his deed, has to be disentangled from the seaweed Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 362 In a Polynesian story the hero's canoe is caught in the tentacles of a giant polyp, just as Ra's barge was entwined by the nocturnal serpent on the night sea journey Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 362 The motif of entwining also occurs in Sir Edwin Arnold's poetic version of the story of Buddha's birth: Queen Maya stood at noon, her days fulfilled, Under a palsa in the palace-grounds, A stately trunk, straight as a temple-shaft, With crown of glossy leaves and fragrant blooms. And knowing the time come for all things knew The conscious tree bent down its boughs to make. A bower about Queen Maya's majesty: And Earth put forth a thousand sudden flowers. To spread a couch; while, ready for the bath, The rock hard by gave out a limpid stream. Of crystal flow. So brought she forth her child (The Light of Asia, p. 5) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 362 There is a very similar motif in the cult-legend of the Samian Hera. Every year her image "disappeared" from the temple, attached itself to a lygos-tree somewhere on the seashore, and was entwined in its branches Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 363 In Plataea and Argos a wedding procession was staged in their honour with bridesmaids, wedding feast, etc. The festival took place in the "wedding month" of Gamelion (beginning of February). The image was carried to a lonely spot in the woods, which is in keeping with Plutarch's story that Zeus kidnapped Hera and hid her in a cave on Mount Cithaeron Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 363 After our previous remarks we have to conclude that there is still another train of thought connected with the hierosgamos, namely, rejuvenation magic. The disappearance and hiding of the image in the wood, in the cave, on the seashore, its twining-about by the lygos-treefall this points to death and rebirth. The early springtime, Gamelion, fits in very well with this theory. In fact, Pausanias tells us that the Argive Hera became a virgin again by taking a yearly dip in the fountain of Kanathos Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 363 The motif of "devouring" which Frobenius has shown to be one of the commonest com- ponents of the sun myth, is closely connected with embracing and entwining Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 365 The "whale-dragon" always "devours" the hero, but the devouring can also be partial. For instance, a six-year-old girl who hated going to school once dreamt that her leg was encircled by a large red worm. Contrary to what might be expected, she evinced a tender interest in the creature Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 365 The motif of entwining is a mother-symbol. The entwining trees are at the same time birth-giving mothers, as in the Greek myth where there ash-trees, the mothers of the men of the Bronze Age. According to a Nordic myth, God created man by breathing life into a substance called tre (tree, wood) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 367 In the wood of the world-ash Yggdrasill a human pair hide themselves at the end of the world, and from them will spring a new race of men. At the moment of universal destruction the world-ash becomes the guardian mother, the tree pregnant with death and life Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 367 The regenerative function of the world-ash helps to explain the image in the chapter of the Egyptian Book of the Dead called "The Gate of Knowledge of the Souls of the East": Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 367 The hero often has to steer his ship between two rocks that clash together. (A similar idea is that of the biting door or the snapping tree-trunk.) In its passage the stern of the ship (or the tail of the bird) is pinched off, another reminder of the mutilation motif (twisting out the arm) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 367 The 19th-cent. German poet J. V. von Scheffel uses this image in his poem "A herring loved an oyster." The poem ends with the oyster nipping off the herring's head in a kiss. The doves which bring Zeus his ambrosia have to pass through the clashing rocks Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 367 Frobenius points out that these rocks are closely connected with the rocks or caves that only open at a magic word. The most striking illustration of this is a South African myth: "You must call the rock by name and cry loudly: 'Rock Untunjambili, open, so that I may enter."' But if the rock does not want to open, it answers: "The rock will not open to children, it opens to the swallows that fly in the air" (Frobenius, Zeitalter p. 407) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 367 The remarkable thing is that no human power can open the rock, only the magic word or a bird. This formulation implies that opening the rock is an undertaking that can never be accomplished in reality, it can only be wished. Wünschen (wish) in Middle High German means the "power to do something extraordinary." The bird is a symbol of "wishful thinking" Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 367 The idea is that Ra rises up, born from the tree. The representations of the sun-god Mithras should probably be interpreted in the same way Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 368 In the Heddernheim Relief, Mithras is shown with half his body rising from the top of a tree, and in other monuments half his body is stuck in the rock, which clearly points to the rock-birth Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 368 Often there is a stream near Mithras' birthplace. This conglomeration of symbols is also found in the birth of Aschanes, the first Saxon king, who grew from the Harz rocks in the middle of a wood near a fountain Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 368 Nor is it surprising that Christian legend transformed the tree of death, the Cross, into the Tree of Life, so that Christ is often shown hanging on a green tree among the fruit Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 368 The derivation of the Cross from the Tree of Life, which was an authentic religious symbol even in Babylonian times, is considered entirely probable by Zöckler, an authority on the history of the Cross. The pre-Christian meaning of so universal a symbol does not contradict this view; quite the contrary, for its meaning is life Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 368 Nor does the existence of the cross in the sun-cult (where the regular cross and the swastika represent the sun-wheel) and in the cult of the love-goddesses in any way contradict its historical significance. Christian legend has made abundant use of this symbolism Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 368 As we know, it was through Adam's guilt that sin and death came into the world, and Christ through his death redeemed us from the guilt. If we ask, In what did Adam's guilt consist? the answer is that the unpardonable sin to be punished by death was that he dared to eat of the tree of Paradise Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 368 The consequences of this are described in a Jewish legend: one who was permitted to gaze into Paradise after the Fall saw the tree and the four streams, but the tree was withered, and in its branches lay a babe. The "mother" had become pregnant Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 368 According to German legend, the saviour will be born when he can be rocked in a cradle made from the wood of a tree that is now but a feeble shoot sprouting from a wall Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 368 The formula runs: "A lime tree shall be planted, that shall throw out two plantschen [boughs] above, and out of their wood is a poie [buoy] to be made; the first child that therein lies is doomed to be brought from life to death by the sword, and then will salvation ensue" (Grimm, III, p. 969) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 368 The legend relates that Lilith rose up into the air through the magic of God's name and hid herself in the sea. Adam forced her to come back with the help of three angels, whereupon Lilith changed into a nightmare or lamia who haunted pregnant women and kidnapped new-born infants Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 369 The original legend is that Lamia seduced Zeus, but the jealous Hera caused her to bring only dead children into the world. Ever since then, the raging Lamia has persecuted children, whom she destroys whenever she can Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 369 This motif is a recurrent one in fairytales, where the mother often appears as a murderess or eater of human flesh; a well-known German paradigm is the story of Hansel and Gretel. Lamia is also the name of a large, voracious fish, which links up with the whale-dragon motif worked out by Frobenius. Once again we meet the idea of the Terrible Mother in the form of a voracious fish, a personification of death Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 369 As mentioned above, Adam forced Lilith to come back with the help of three angels. Here we may discern, perhaps, the motif of the "helpful bird "angels are really birds. Cf. the feather-dress of the "soul-birds" in the underworld Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 369 In the Mithraic sacrifice the messenger of the gods the "angel "was a raven; the messenger is winged (Hermes) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 369 In Jewish tradition angels are masculine. The symbolism of the three angels is important because it signifies the upper, aerial, spiritual triad in conflict with the one lower, feminine power Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 369 The riding takes on a special aspect in the light of researches into child psychology: the two contributions of Freud and myself have established the fear-significance of horses on the one hand, and the sexual meaning of riding fantasies on the other Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 370 The essential feature is the rhythm, which assumes a sexual significance only secondarily. If we take these factors into account, it will not surprise us to hear that the maternal world-ash Yggdrasill is called the Schreckross (terrible horse) in German Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 370 Cannegieter says of nightmares: Even today the peasants drive away these female spirits (mother-goddesses, moirae) by throwing the bone of a horse's head upon the roof, and you can often see such bones on peasant houses hereabouts. But at night lamias are believed to ride at the time of the first sleep and to tire out the horses for long journeys (Epistola de ara ad Noviomagum reperta, p. 25) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 370 A synonym for the nightmare is the troll or "treader." The treading movement has been verified by the experience of Freud and myself with children, which shows that a secondary sexual meaning attaches to stamping or kicking, though the rhythm is obviously primary Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 370 May it perhaps point back to the great primordial image of the mother, who was once our only world and later became the symbol of the whole world? Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 373 Goethe says of the Mothers that they are "thronged round with images of all creation." Even the Christians could not refrain from reuniting their Mother of God with the water: "Ave maris stella" are the opening words of a hymn to Mary Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 373 It is probably significant that the infantile word ma-ma (mother's breast) is found in all languages, and that the mothers of two religious heroes were called Mary and Maya Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 373 Horus vanquished the wicked Set who had murdered his father Osiris, but Isis set him free again Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 374 Outraged, Horus lifted his hand against his mother and snatched the royal diadem from her head, in place of which Thoth gave her a cow's head. Horus then vanquished Set for a second time Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 374 In the Greek legend, Typhon (Set) is a dragon. But even without this confirmation it is evident that Horus' fight is the typical fight of the sun-hero with the “whale dragon” who, as we know, is a symbol of the Terrible Mother, of the voracious maw, the jaws of death in which men are crunched and ground to pieces Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 374 Whoever conquers this monster wins to eternal youth. But to this end, defying all danger, he must descend into the belly of the monster (“journey to hell”) and sojourn there for some time (“night sea imprisonment:” Frobenius) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 374 The fight with the “nocturnal serpent” accordingly signifies conquest of the mother, who is suspected of an infamous crime, namely the betrayal of her son. Complete confirmation of all this is furnished by the fragments of the Babylonian Creation Epic discovered by George Smith, most of which come from the library of Assurbanipal. The text dates from about the time of Hammurabi (2000 B.C.) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 375 From this account of the Creation we learn that Ea, the son of the watery deep and god of wisdom, has overthrown Apsu. Apsu is the progenitor of the great gods, so Ea has conquered the father. But Tiamat, the mother of the gods, plots revenge, and arrays herself for battle against them Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 375 Against the fearful hosts of Tiamat the gods finally put up Marduk, the god of spring, who represents the victorious sun. Marduk prepares himself for battle and forges his invincible weapons Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 376 Since he [Marduk] is psychologically an archetype of the Self, his divinity only confirms that the Self is numinous, a sort of god, or having some share in the divine nature Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 612 The hero is the protagonist of God’s transformation in man; he corresponds to what I call the “mana personality.” The mana personality has such an immense fascination for the conscious mind that the ego all too easily succumbs to the temptation to identify with the hero, thus bringing on a psychic inflation with all its consequences. For this reason the repugnance felt by certain ecclesiastical circles for the “inner Christ” is understandable enough, at least as a preventive measure against the danger of psychic inflation which threatens the Christian European Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 612 Heroes are usually wanderers, and wandering is a symbol of longing, of the restless urge which never finds its object, of nostalgia for the lost mother. The sun comparison can easily be taken in this sense: the heroes are like the wandering sun, from which it is concluded that the myth of the hero is a solar myth Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 299 It seems to us, rather, that he is first and foremost a self-representation of the longing of the unconscious, of its unquenched and unquenchable desire for the light of consciousness. But consciousness, continually in danger of being led astray by its own light and of becoming a rootless will o’ the wisp, longs for the healing power of nature, for the deep wells of being and for unconscious communion with life in all its countless forms Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 299 It is not man as such who has to be regenerated or born again as a renewed whole, but, according to the statements of mythology, it is the hero or god who rejuvenates himself. These figures are generally expressed or characterized by libido-symbols (light, fire, sun, etc.), so that it looks as if they represented psychic energy. They are, in fact, personifications of the libido Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 388 Thus Khnum, the potter,’ the ‘builder,’ shapes his egg on the potter’s wheel, for he is “immortal growth, his own generation and his own self-birth, the creator of the egg that came out of the primeval waters” Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 389 The Egyptian Book of the Dead says: “I have risen like the mighty hawk that comes forth from his egg,” and: “I am the creator of Nun, who has taken up his abode in the underworld. My nest is not seen and my egg is not broken” Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 389 Yet another passage speaks of “that great and glorious god in his egg, who created himself for that which came forth from him”. Therefore the god is also called Nagaga-uer, the “Great Cackler.” (Book of the Dead 98:2: “I cackle like the goose, and whistle like the hawk”) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 389 The legend says that all creatures had pledged themselves not to harm Baldur; only the mistletoe was forgotten, because she was supposed to be too young

Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 392 Mistletoe was also a sovereign remedy against barrenness. In Gaul, it was only after offering sacrifice that the Druid was allowed, amid solemn ceremonies, to climb the sacred oak and cut the ritual branch of mistletoe Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 392 That which grows on the tree is the child, or oneself, in renewed and rejuvenated form; and that is precisely what one cannot have, because the incest prohibition forbids it Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 392 We are told that the mistletoe which killed Baldur was "too young"; hence this clinging parasite could be interpreted as the "child of the tree" Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 392 But as the tree signifies the origin in the sense of the mother, it represents the source of life, of that magical life-force whose yearly renewal was celebrated in primitive times by the homage paid to a divine son, a puer aeternus Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 392 The graceful Baldur is such a figure. This type is granted only a fleeting existence, because he is never anything but an anticipation of something desired and hoped for Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 392 This is so literally true that a certain type of "mother's son" actually exhibits all the characteristics of the flower-like, youthful god, and even dies an early death Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 392 The reason is that he only lives on and through the mother and can strike no roots in the world, so that he finds himself in a state of permanent incest. He is, as it were, only a dream of the mother, an ideal which she soon takes back to herself, as we can see from the Near Eastern "son-gods," like Tammuz, Attis, Adonis, and Christ Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 392 The mistletoe, like Baldur, represents the "child of the mother," the longed-for, revivified life-force that flows from her Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 392 But, separated from its host, the mistletoe dies. Therefore, when the Druid cuts it, he kills it and by this act symbolically repeats the fatal self-castration of Attis and the wounding of Adonis by the boar's tusk Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 392 This is the dream of the mother in matriarchal times, when there was as yet no father to stand by the side of the son Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 392 But why should the mistletoe kill Baldur, since it is, in a sense, his sister or brother? The lovely apparition of the puer aeternus is, alas, a form of illusion. In reality he is a parasite on the mother, a creature of her imagination, who only lives when rooted in the maternal body Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 393 In actual psychic experience the mother corresponds to the collective unconscious, and the son to consciousness, which fancies itself free but must ever again succumb to the power of sleep and a deadening unconsciousness Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 393 The mistletoe, however, corresponds to the shadow brother, and whom the psychotherapist regularly meets as a personification of the personal unconscious. Just as, at evening, the shadows lengthen and finally engulf everything, so the mistletoe betokens Baldur's end. Being an equivalent of Baldur himself, it is fetched down from the tree like the "treasure hard to attain "The shadow becomes fatal when there is too little vitality or too little consciousness in the hero for him to complete his heroic task Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 393 The "son of the mother" as a mere mortal, dies young, but as a god he can do that which is forbidden and superhuman: he commits the magical incest and thus obtains immortality. In the myths the hero does not die; instead, he has to overcome the dragon of death Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 394 The black horse Apaosha also has this meaning in the old Persian Song of Tishtriya, where he blocks up the sources of the rain-lake. The white horse, Tishtriya, makes two futile attempts to vanquish Apaosha; at the third attempt he succeeds with the help of Ahura-Mazda. Whereupon the sluices of heaven are opened and the fertilizing rain pours down upon the earth Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 395 In this symbolism we can see very clearly how libido fights against libido, instinct against instinct, how the unconscious is in conflict with itself, and how mythological man perceived the unconscious in all the adversities and contrarieties of external nature without ever suspecting that he was gazing at the paradoxical background of his own consciousness Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 395 The dragon represents the negative mother-imago and thus expresses resistance to incest or fear of it. Dragon and snake are symbolic representations of the fear of the consequences of breaking the taboo and regressing to incest. It is therefore understandable that we should come over and over again upon the motif of the tree and the snake. Snakes and dragons are especially significant as guardians or defenders of the treasure Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 395 The tree entwined by the snake may therefore be taken as the symbol of the mother who is protecting against incest by fear. This symbol is frequently found on Mithraic monuments. The rock with a snake coiled round it has a similar meaning, for Mithras was born from a rock, as was the god Men Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 396 This fact points to the father as the cause of the fear, which as we know prompted Freud to his famous aetiological myth of the primal horde with the jealous old patriarch at the top Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 396 The immediate model for this is obviously the jealous Yahweh, struggling to protect his wife Israel from whoredoms with strange gods Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 396 The father represents the world of moral commandments and prohibitions, although, for lack of information about conditions in prehistoric times, it remains an open question how far the first moral laws arose from dire necessity rather than from the family preoccupations of the tribal father. At all events it would be easier to keep one's eye on a box full of spiders than on the females of a primal horde Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 396 The father is the representative of the spirit, whose function it is to oppose pure instinctuality. That is his archetypal role, which falls to him regardless of his personal qualities; hence he is very often an object of neurotic fears for the son Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 396 Accordingly, the monster to be overcome by the son frequently appears as a giant who the treasure Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 396 An excellent example of this is the giant Humbaba in the Gilgamesh Epic, who guards the garden of Ishtar. Gilgamesh conquers the giant and wins Ishtar, whereupon Ishtar immediately makes sexual advances to her deliverer. These facts should be sufficient to explain the role played by Horus in Plutarch, and especially the violent treatment of Isis Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 396 Here the bull has the same significance as the monster and may be compared with the bull that was conquered by Gilgamesh. He represents the father who paradoxically enforces the incest prohibition as a giant and dangerous animal Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 396 The paradox lies in the fact that, like the mother who gives life and takes it away again as the "terrible" or "devouring" mother, the father apparently lives a life of unbridled instinct and yet is the living embodiment of the law that thwarts instinct Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 396 There is, however, a subtle though important distinction to be made here: the father commits no incest, whereas the son has tendencies in that direction. The paternal law is directed against incest with all the violence and fury of the uninhibited instinct. Freud overlooks the fact that the spirit too is dynamic, as indeed it must be if the psyche is not to lose its self-regulating equilibrium Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 396 But as the "father," the representative of moral law, is not only an objective fact, but a subjective psychic factor in the son himself, the killing of the bull clearly denotes an overcoming of animal instinct, and at the same time a secret and furtive overcoming of the power of the law, and hence a criminal usurpation of justice. Since the better is always the enemy of the good, every drastic innovation is an infringement of what is traditionally right, and may sometimes even be a crime punishable by death Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 396 As we know, this dilemma played an important part in the psychology of early Christianity, at the time when it came into conflict with Jewish law. In the eyes of the Jews, Christ was undoubtedly a law-breaker. Not unjustly is he called Adam Secundus; for just as the first Adam became conscious through sin, through eating of the tree of knowledge, so the second Adam broke through to the necessary relation with a fundamentally different God Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 396 A third image shows Mithras reaching for the nimbus on the head of Sol. This act recalls the Christian idea that those who have conquered win the crown of eternal life Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 397 In the fourth image Sol kneels before Mithras These last two pictures [3 and 4], show that Mithras has arrogated to himself the strength of the sun and become its lord. He has conquered his animal nature (the bull). Animals represent instinct, and also the prohibition of instinct, so that man becomes human through conquer- ing his animal instinctuality. Mithras has thus sacrificed his animal naturae solution already anticipated in the Gilgamesh Epic by the hero's renunciation of the terrible Ishtar  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 398  In the Mithraic sacrifice the conquest of instinctuality no longer takes the archaic form of overpowering the mother, but of renouncing one's own instinctive desires. The primitive idea of reproducing oneself by entering into the mother's body has become so remote that the hero, instead of committing incest, is now sufficiently far advanced in the domestic virtues to seek immortality through the sacrifice of the incest tendency  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 398  This significant change finds its true fulfillment only in the symbol of the crucified God. In atonement for Adam's sin a bloody human sacrifice is hung upon the tree of life. Although the tree of life has a mother significance, it is no longer the mother, but a symbolic equivalent to which the hero offers up his life. One can hardly imagine a symbol which expresses more drastically the subjugation of instinct  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 398  Underlying all fertility magic is the thought of renewal, which in turn is intimately connected with the cross. The idea of union expressed in the cross symbol is found in Plato's Timaeus, where the demiurge joins the parts of the world-soul together by means of two sutures, which form a X (chi)  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 404  A peculiar use is made of the cross symbol by the Muyscas Indians, of Peru; two ropes are stretched crosswise over the surface of the water (pool or stream), and fruits, oil, and precious stones are thrown in as a sacrifice at the point of intersection  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 407  Here the divinity is evidently the water, not the cross, which only signifies the place of sacrifice. The symbolism is somewhat obscure. Water, and particularly deep water, usually has a maternal significance, roughly corresponding to "womb." The point of intersection of the two ropes is the point of union where the "crossing" takes place  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 407  t is clear from all this that the cross is a many-faceted symbol, and its chief meaning is that of the "tree of life" and the "mother." Its symbolization in human form is therefore quite understandable  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 411  Underlying all fertility magic is the thought of renewal, which in turn is intimately connected with the cross. The idea of union expressed in the cross symbol is found in Plato's Timaeus, where the demiurge joins the parts of the world-soul together by means of two sutures, which form a X (chi)  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 404  It is important to know something about the attributes of this life-giving god. Tum of On-Heliopolis bears the name "the father of his mother," and his attendant goddess, Jusas or Nebit-Hotpet, is called sometimes the mother, sometimes the daughter, and sometimes the wife of the god  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 408  The first day in autumn is known in the Heliopolitan inscriptions as the "feast-day of the goddess Jusasit," as the arrival of the "sister who makes ready to unite herself with her father." It is the day on which "the goddess Mehnit completes her work, so that the god Osiris may enter the left eye." It is also called "the day for filling the sacred eye with what it needs"  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 408  In the autumn equinox the heavenly cow with the moon-eye, Isis, receives the seed that begets Horus (the moon being the guardian of the seed)  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 408  The "eye" evidently stands for the female genitals, as is clear from the myth of Indra, who, as a punishment for his wantonness, was smitten with yonis all over his body, but was so far pardoned by the gods that the shameful yonis were changed into eyes  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 408  The little image reflected in the eye, the "pupilla," is a "child." The great god becomes a child again: he enters into the mother's womb for self-renewal  Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 408  Tum of Pithum-Heroopolis not only carries the crux ansata as a symbol, but even has this emblem as the commonest of his titles, ankh or ankhi, which means sun-symbol, which was believed to be of masculine sex only and to beget itself Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 410 "Khnum" (another name for Tum, but always the sun-god is meant) comes from the verb num, 'to combine or unite.' Khnum appears as the potter and maker of his own egg Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 410 The various forms of the crux ansata have the meaning of "life" and "fruitfulness," and also of "union," which can be interpreted as the hierosgamos of the god with his mother for the purpose of conquering death and renewing life. This mythologem, it is plain, has passed into Christianity CW Carl Jung, CW 5, 411 The separation of the son from the mother signifies man's leave-taking from animal unconsciousness. It was only the power of the "incest prohibition" that created the self-conscious individual, who before had been mindlessly one with the tribe; and it was only then that the idea of the final death of the individual became possible Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 415 Thus through Adam's sin, which lay precisely in his becoming conscious, death came into the world Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 415 The neurotic who cannot leave his mother has good reasons for not doing so: ultimately, it is the fear of death that holds him there. It seems as if no idea and no word were powerful enough to express the meaning of this conflict Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 415 Certainly the struggle for expression which has continued through the centuries cannot be motivated by what is narrowly and crudely conceived as "incest" Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 415 We ought rather to conceive the law that expresses itself first and last in the "incest prohibition" as the impulse to domestication, and regard the religious systems as institutions which take up the instinctual forces of man's animal nature, organize them, and gradually make them available for higher cultural purposes Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 415 Incest prohibition is more a question of phenomena requiring a teleological explanation than of simple causalities Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 332 The incest prohibition acts as an obstacle and makes the creative fantasy inventive: for instance, there are attempts to make the mother pregnant by means of fertility magic Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 332 It does not constitute a primary phenomenon [as Freud believed] in the process of symbol-formation, but goes back to something more fundamental, namely the primitive system of marriage classes Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 332 His [Faust] equally importunate longing for the beauties of this world plunged him into renewed ruin, doubt and wretchedness, which culminated in the tragedy of Gretchen's death Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 119 Faust's mistake was that he made the worst of both worlds by blindly following the urge of his libido, like a man overcome by strong and violent passions. Faust's conflict is a reflection of the collective conflict at the beginning of the Christian era, but in him, curiously enough, it takes the opposite course Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 119 Faust takes the opposite road; for him the ascetic ideal is sheer death. He struggles for liberation and wins life by binding himself over to evil, thereby bringing about the death of what he loves most: Gretchen Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 120 He [Faust] tears himself away from his grief, and sacrifices his life in unceasing work, thus saving many lives. His double mission as saviour and destroyer had been hinted at from the beginning Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 120 Faust's desire, like that of every hero, is a yearning for the mystery of rebirth, for immortality; therefore his way leads out to sea and down into the maw of death, that frighteningly narrow "passage" which signals the new day Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 417 We have already seen that the libido directed towards the mother actually symbolizes her as a horse. The mother-imago is a libido-symbol and so is the horse; at some points the meaning of the two symbols overlaps. But the factor common to both is the libido Carl Jung, CW 5 Para 421 The steeds of mythology are always invested with great significance and very often appear anthropomorphized. Thus Men's horse has human forelegs, Balaam's ass human speech, and the bull upon whose back Mithras springs to deliver the death blow is a life-giving deity Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 421 In the Iliad, the horse prophesies evil. They hear the words the corpse utters on its way to the grave words which no human can hear. Caesar was told by his human-footed horse (probably derived from an identification of Caesar with the Phrygian Men) that he would conquer the world Carl Jung,

CW 5, Para 421 An ass prophesied to Augustus the victory of Actium. Horses also see ghosts. All these things are typical manifestations of the unconscious. We can therefore see why the horse, as a symbol of the animal component in man, has numerous connections with the devil Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 421 The Creator God [takes] on an astromythological, or rather an astrological, character. He has become the sun, and thus finds a natural expression that transcends his moral division into a Heavenly Father and his counterpart the devil. Carl Jung; CW 5, Para 176. Horses also signify fire and light, like the fiery horses of Helios. Hector's horses were called Xanthos (yellow, glaring), Podargos (swift-footed), Lampos (shining), and Aithon (burning). Siegfried leaps over the wall of fi re on the thunder-horse Grani, who was sired by Sleipnir and was the only one capable of taking the fiery hedge. There is a distinct fi re symbolism in the mysticquadriga mentioned by Dio Chrysostom: the highest god always drives his chariot round in a circle. The chariot is drawn by four horses, and the outside horse moves very quickly. He has a shining coat, bearing on it the signs of the zodiac and the constellations. The second horse goes more slowly and is illuminated on one side only. The third horse is slower still, and the fourth horse runs round himself. Once, however, the outside horse set the mane of the second horse on fi re with his fiery breath, and the third horse drenched the fourth with streams of sweat. Then the horses dissolve and merge with the substance of the strongest and most fiery, which now becomes the charioteer. The horses represent the four elements. The catastrophe signifies world conflagration and the deluge, after which the division of God into Many cases, and the divine One is restored. 27 There can be no doubt that the quadriga is meant as an astronomical symbol of Time. We saw in Part I that the Stoic conception of fate is a fi re-symbol, so it is a logical continuation of this idea when the closely related conception of time exhibits the same libido symbolism. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 423 The Brihadaranyaka Upanishad says: Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 424 Here the horse is undoubtedly conceived as a time-symbol, besides being the whole world. In the Mithraic religion we meet with a strange god, Aion (pl. XLIV), also called Chronos or deus leontocephalus because he is conventionally represented as a lion-headed human figure. He stands in a rigid attitude, wrapped in the coils of a serpent whose head juts forward over the head of the lion. In each hand he holds a key, on his breast is a thunderbolt, on his back are the four wings of the wind, and on his body are the signs of the zodiac. His attributes are a cock and implements. In the Carolingian Utrecht Psalter, which was based on classical models, Aion is shown as a naked man bearing in his hand a snake. As the name indicates, he is a time-symbol, and is composed entirely of libido-images. The lion, the zodiacal sign for the torrid heat of summer, is the symbol of concupiscentia effrenata, "frenzied desire." ("My soul roars with the voice of a hungry lion," says Mechthild of Magdeburg.) In the Mithraic mysteries the snake is often shown as the antagonist of the lion, in accordance with the myth of the sun's fight with the dragon. In the Egyptian Book of the Dead, Tum is addressed as a tom-cat, because in that form he fought the Apophis-serpent. To be "entwined" or embraced is the same as to be "devoured," which as we saw means entering into the mother's womb. Time is thus defined by the rising and setting sun, by the death and renewal of libido, the dawning and extinction of consciousness. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 425 The attribute of the cock again points to time, and the implements to creation through time (Bergson's "durée créatrice"). Oazdes (Ahura-Mazda) and Ahriman came into being through Zrwan akarana, "infinitely long duration." So time, this empty and purely formal concept, is expressed in the mysteries through transformations of the creative force, libido, just as time in physics is identical with the flow of the energic process. Macrobius remarks: "By the lion's head the present time is indicated . . . because its condition is strong and fervent." 31 Philo Judaeus evidently knows better: Time is regarded as a god by evil men who wish to hide the Essential Being. . .. Vicious men think that Time is the cause of the world, but the wise and good think it is God. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 425 There is a similar instinct-sacrificing symbolism in the Mithraic religion, where the essential portions of the mystery consisted in the catching and subduing of the bull. A parallel figure to Mithras is the Original Man, Gayomart. He was created together with his ox, and the two lived in a state of bliss for six thousand years. But when the world entered the Aeon of Libra (the seventh zodiacal sign), the evil principle broke loose. In astrology, Libra is known as the "Positive House" of Venus, so the evil principle came under the dominion of the goddess of love, who personifies the erotic aspect of the mother. Since this aspect, as we have seen, is psychologically extremely dangerous, the classical catastrophe threatened to overtake the son. As a result of this constellation, Gayomart and his ox died only thirty years later. (The trials of Zarathustra also lasted for thirty years.) Fifty-five species of grain and twelve kinds of healing plants came from the dead ox. His seed entered into the moon for purification, but the seed of Gayomart entered into the sun. This seems to suggest that the bull has a hidden feminine significance. Gosh or Drvashpa was the bull's soul and it was worshipped as a female divinity. At first she was so faint-hearted that she refused to become the goddess of cattle until, as a consolation, the coming of Zarathustra was announced to her. This has its parallel in the Purana where the earth received the promise of Krishna's coming. 33 Like Ardvisura, the goddess of love, Gosh rides in a chariot. So the bull-anima appears to be decidedly feminine. In astrology Taurus, too, is a House of Venus. The myth of Gayomart repeats in modified form the primitive "closed circle" of a self-reproducing masculine and feminine divinity. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 662 That the thing perceived as an inner light, as the sun of the other world, is an emotional component of the psyche, is clear from Symeon's words: And questing after it, my spirit sought to comprehend the splendour it had seen but found it not as a creature and could not get away from created things, that it might embrace that uncreated and uncomprehended splendour. Nevertheless it wandered everywhere and strove to behold it. It searched through the air, it wandered over the heavens, it crossed the abysses, it searched, so it seemed, to the ends of the world. 36 But in all that it found nothing, for all was created. And I lamented and was sorrowful, and my heart burned, and I lived as one distraught in mind. But it came as it was wont, and descending like a luminous cloud, seemed to envelop my whole head, so that I cried out dismayed. But flying away again it left me alone. And when I wearily sought it, I realized suddenly that it was within me, and in the midst of my heart it shone like the light of a spherical sun. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 141 Amenophis IV achieved, by his reforms, a psychologically valuable work of interpretation. He united all the bull, ram, crocodile, and pile-dwelling gods into the sun-disc and made it clear that their various attributes were compatible with those of the sun. A similar fate overtook Hellenic and Roman polytheism as a result of the syncretistic strivings of later centuries. An excellent illustration of this is in the beautiful prayer of Lucius to the Queen of Heaven (the moon): Queen of heaven, whether thou be named Ceres, bountiful mother of earthly fruits, or heavenly Venus, or Phoebus' sister, or Proserpina, who strikest terror with midnight ululations . . .. thou that with soft feminine brightness dost illume the walls of all cities . . . Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 138 Not a few traces of sun-worship are preserved in ecclesiastical art, for instance the nimbus round the head of Christ, and the haloes of the saints. Numerous fi re- and light-symbols are attributed to the saints in Christian legend. The twelve apostles, for example, were likened to the twelve signs of the zodiac and were therefore represented each with a star over his head. No wonder the heathen, as Tertullian reports, took the sun for the God of the Christians! "Some, in a more human and probable way, believe the Sun to be our god." Among the Manichees the sun actually was God. One of the most remarkable records of this period, an amalgam of pagan-Asiatic, Hellenistic, and Christian beliefs, is the 'Εξηϒησις περι των εν Ιερσιδι πραχθεντων, a book of fables which affords deep insight into syncretistic symbolism. There we find the following magical dedication: Διι 'Ηλιω θεϖ μεϒαλω βασιλει 'Ιησον. In certain parts of Armenia, Christians still pray to the rising sun, that it may “let its foot rest on the face of the worshipper.” Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 163 Before I enter upon the contents of this second part, it seems necessary to cast a backward glance over the singular train of thought which the analysis of the poem “The Moth to the Sun” has revealed. Although this poem is very different from the preceding “Hymn of Creation,” closer investigation of the longing for the sun has led us into a realm of mythological ideas that are closely related to those considered in the first poem: the Creator God, whose dual nature was plainly apparent in the case of Job, has now taken on an astromythological, or rather an astrological, character. He has become the sun, and thus finds a natural expression that transcends his moral division into a Heavenly Father and his counterpart the devil. The sun, as Renan has observed, is the only truly “rational” image of God, whether we adopt the standpoint of the primitive savage or of modern science. In either case the sun is the father-god from whom all living things draw life; he is the fructifier and creator, the source of energy for our world. The discord into which the human soul has fallen can be harmoniously resolved through the sun as a natural object which knows no inner conflict. The sun is not only beneficial, but also destructive; hence the zodiacal sign for August heat is the ravaging lion which Samson slew in order to rid the parched earth of its torment. Yet it is in the nature of the sun to scorch, and its scorching power seems natural to man. It shines equally on the just and the unjust and allows useful creatures to flourish as well as the harmful. Therefore the sun is perfectly suited to represent the visible God of this world, i.e., the creative power of our own soul, which we call libido, and whose nature it is to bring forth the useful and the harmful, the good and the bad. That this comparison is not just a matter of words can be seen from the teachings of the mystics: when they descend into the depths of their own being they find “in their heart” the image of the sun, they find their own life-force which they call the “sun” for a legitimate and, I would say, a physical reason, because our source of energy and life actually is the sun. Our physiological life, regarded as an energy process, is entirely solar. The peculiar nature of this solar energy as inwardly perceived by the mystic is made clear in Indian mythology. The following passages, referring to Rudra, are taken from the Shvetashvatara Upanishad: There is one Rudra only, they do not allow a second, who rules all the worlds by his powers. Behind all creatures he stands, the Protector; having treated them, he gathers all beings together at the end of time. He has eyes on all sides, faces on all sides, arms on all sides, feet on all sides. He is the one God who created heaven and earth, forging all things together with his hands and wings. You who are the source and origin of the gods, the ruler of all, Rudra, the great seer, who of old gave birth to the Golden Seed – give us enlightenment! Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 176 The symbol for that portion of the zodiac in which the sun re-enters the yearly cycle at the time of the winter solstice is Capricorn, originally known as the “Goat-Fish” (αίγόχερως, “goat-horned”): the sun mounts like a goat to the tops of the highest mountains, and then plunges into the depths of the sea like a fish. The fish in dreams occasionally signifies the unborn child, because the child before its birth lives in the water like a fish; similarly, when the sun sinks into the sea, it becomes child and fish at once. The fish is therefore a symbol of renewal and rebirth. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 290 The journey of Moses with his servant Joshua is a life-journey (it lasted eighty years). They grow old together and lose the life-force, i.e., the fish, which “in wondrous wise took its way to the sea” (setting of the sun). When the two notice their loss, they discover at the place where the source life is found (where the dead fish revived and sprang into the sea) Khidr wrapped in his mantle, sitting on the ground. In another version he was sitting on an island in sea, “in the wettest place on earth,” which means that he had just been born from the maternal depths. Where the fish vanished Khidr, the Verdant One, was born as a “son of the watery deep,” his head veiled, proclaiming divine wisdom, like the Babylonian Oannes-Ea, who was represented in fish form and daily came out of the sea as a fish to teach the people wisdom. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 291 Oannes’ name was brought into connection with John’s. With the rising of the reborn sun the fish that dwelt in darkness, surrounded by all the terrors of night and death, becomes the shining, fiery day-star. This gives the words of John the Baptist a special significance (Matthew 3:11): I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance; but he that cometh after me is mightier than I . . . he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost, and with fire. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 292 Following Vollers, we may compare Khidr and Elias (or Moses and his servant Joshua) with Gilgamesh and his brother Eabani (Enkidu). Gilgamesh wanders through the world, driven by fear and longing, to find immortality. His journey takes him across the sea to the wise Utnapishtim (Noah), who knows how to cross the waters of death. There Gilgamesh has to dive down to the bottom of the sea for the magical herb that is to lead him back to the land of men. On the return journey he is accompanied by an immortal mariner, who, banished by the curse of Utnapishtim, has been forbidden to return to the land of the blessed. But when Gilgamesh arrives home, a serpent steals the magic herb from him (i.e., the fish slips back into the sea). Because of the loss of the magic herb, Gilgamesh's journey has been in vain; instead he comes back in the company of an immortal, whose fate we cannot learn from the fragments of the epic. Jensen believes that this banished immortal is the prototype of Ahasuerus. Once again we meet the motif of the Dioscuri: mortal and immortal, the setting and rising sun. The Mithraic bull-sacrifice is often represented as flanked by the two dadophors, Gautes and Cautopates, one with a raised and the other with a lowered torch. They form a pair of brothers whose characters are revealed by the symbolic position of the torches. Cumont not unjustly connects them with the sepulchral Erotes, who as genies with inverted torches have a traditional meaning. One would stand for death, the other for life. There are certain points of resemblance between the Mithraic sacrifice (where the bull in the centre is flanked on either side by dadophors and the Christian sacrifice of the lamb (or ram). The Crucified is traditionally flanked by two thieves, one of whom ascends to paradise while the other descends to hell. The Semitic gods were often flanked by two paredroi; for instance, the Baal of Edessa was accompanied by Aziz and Monimos (Baal being astrologically interpreted as the sun, and Aziz and Monimos as Mars and Mercury). According to the Babylonian view, the gods are grouped into triads. Thus the two thieves somehow go together with Christ. The two dadophors are, as Cumont has shown, offshoots 61 from the main figure of Mithras, who was supposed to have a secret triadic character. Dionysius the Areopagite reports that the magicians held a feast in honour of τοϋ τρι-πλασίου Μίθρον (the threefold Mithras). Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 293 As Cumont observes, Cautes and Cautopates sometimes carry in their hands the head of a bull and of a scorpion respectively. Taurus and Scorpio are equinoctial signs, and this is a clear indication that the sacrifice was primarily connected with the sun cycle: the rising sun that sacrifices itself at the summer solstice, and the setting sun. Since it was not easy to represent sunrise and sunset in the sacrificial drama, this idea had to be shown outside it. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 295 We have already pointed out that the Dioscuri represent a similar idea in somewhat different form: one sun is mortal, the other immortal. As this whole solar mythology is psychology projected into the heavens, the underlying idea could probably be paraphrased thus: just as man consists of a mortal and an immortal part, so the sun is a pair of brothers, one of whom is mortal, the other immortal. Man is mortal, yet there are exceptions who are immortal, or there is something immortal in us. Thus the gods, or figures like Khidr and the Comte de Saint-Germain, are our immortal part which continues intangibly to exist. The sun comparison tells us over and over again that the dynamic of the gods is psychic energy. This is our immortality, the link through which man feels inextinguishably one with the continuity of all life. The life of the psyche is the life of mankind. Welling up from the depths of the unconscious, its springs gush forth from the root of the whole human race, since the individual is, biologically speaking, only a twig broken off from the mother and transplanted. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 296 The psychic life-force, the libido, symbolizes itself in the sun or personifies itself in figures of heroes with solar attributes. At the same time it expresses itself through phallic symbols. Both possibilities are found on a late Babylonian gem from Lajard's collection. In the middle stands an androgynous deity. On the masculine side there is a snake with a sun halo round its head; on the feminine side another snake with a sickle moon above it. This picture has a symbolic sexual nuance: on the masculine side there is a lozenge, a favourite symbol of the female genitals, and on the feminine side a wheel without its rim. The spokes are thickened at the ends into knobs, which, like the fingers we mentioned earlier, have a phallic meaning. It seems to be a phallic wheel such as was not unknown in antiquity. There are obscene gems on which Cupid is shown turning a wheel consisting entirely of phalli. As to what the sun signifies, I discovered in the collection of antiquities at Verona a late Roman inscription with the following symbols. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 297 The symbolism is plain: sun = phallus, moon = vessel (uterus). This interpretation is confirmed by another monument from the same collection. The symbols are the same, except that the vessel has been replaced by the figure of a woman. Certain symbols on coins can probably be interpreted in a similar manner. In Lajards Recherches sur la culte de Vénus there is a coin from Perga, showing Artemis as a conical stone flanked by a masculine figure (alleged to be the deity Men) and a female figure (alleged to be Artemis). Men (otherwise called Lunus) appears on an Attic bas-relief with a spear, flanked by Pan with a club, and a female figure. From this it is clear that sexuality as well as the sun can be used to symbolize the libido. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 298 One further point deserves mention here. The dadophor Cautopates is often represented with a cock and pine-cones. These are the attributes of the Phrygian god Men; whose cult was very widespread. He was shown with the pileus (or "Phrygian cap") and pine-cones, riding on the cock, and also in the form of a boy, just as the dadophors were boyish figures. (This latter characteristic relates both them and Men to the Cabiri and Dactyls.) Now Men has affinities with Attis, the son and lover of Cybele. In Imperial times Men and Attis merged into one. Attis also wears the pileus like Men, Mithras, and the dadophors. As the son and lover of his mother he raises the incest problem. Incest leads logically to ritual castration in the Attis-Cybele cult; for according to legend the hero, driven mad by his mother, mutilates himself. I must refrain from going into this question more deeply at present, as I would prefer to discuss the incest problem at the end of this book. Here I would only point out that the incest motif is bound to arise, because when the regressing libido is introverted for internal or external reasons it always reactivates the parental imagos and thus apparently re-establishes the infantile relationship. But this relationship cannot be re-established, because the libido is an adult libido which is already bound to sexuality and inevitably imports an incompatible, incestuous character into the reactivated relationship to the parents. It is this sexual character that now gives rise to the incest symbolism. Since incest must be avoided at all costs, the result is either the death of the son lover or his self-castration as punishment for the incest he has committed, or else the sacrifice of instinctuality, and especially of sexuality, as a means of preventing or expiating the incestuous longing. Sex being one of the most obvious examples of instinctuality, it is sex which is liable to be most affected by these sacrificial measures, i.e., through abstinence. The heroes are usually wanderers, and wandering is a symbol of longing, of the restless urge which never finds its object, of nostalgia for the lost mother. The sun comparison can easily be taken in this sense: the heroes are like the wandering sun, from which it is concluded that the myth of the hero is a solar myth. It seems to us, rather, that he is first and foremost a self-representation of the longing of the unconscious, of its unquenched and unquenchable desire for the light of consciousness. But consciousness, continually in danger of being led astray by its own light and of becoming a rootless will o' the wisp, longs for the healing power of nature, for the deep wells of being and for unconscious communion with life in all its countless forms. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 299 The devil has a horse's hoof and sometimes a horse's form. At critical moments he shows the proverbial cloven hoof, just as, during the abduction of Hadding, Sleipnir suddenly looked out from behind Wotan's mantle. The devil, like the nightmare, rides the sleeper; hence it is said that those who have nightmares are ridden by the devil. In Persian lore the devil is the steed of God. He represents the sexual instinct; consequently at the Witches' Sabbath he appears in the form of a goat or horse Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 421 The sexual nature of the devil is imparted to the horse as well, so that this symbol is found in contexts where the sexual interpretation is the only one that fits. Loki propagates in the form of a horse, and so does the devil, as an ancient god of fire Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 421 Lightning, too, is represented theriomorphically as a horse. An uneducated hysterical patient once told me that as a child she was terrified of thunderstorms, because after each flash of lightning she saw a huge black horse rearing up to the sky. Indian legend tells of the black thunder-horse of Yama, the god of death, who dwells in the south, the mythical place of storms. In German folklore the devil is a god of lightning who hurls the horse's hoof lightning on the rooftops Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 421 In accordance with the primitive idea that thunder fertilizes the earth, lightning and horses' hoofs both have a phallic meaning. An uneducated woman patient who had been violently forced by her husband to have coitus with him often dreamt that a wild horse leapt over her and kicked her in the abdomen with his hind foot Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 421 Pegasus struck the fountain of Hippocrene from the earth with his hoof. A Corinthian statue of Bellerophon, which was also a fountain, was made so that the water flowed from the hoof of the horse. Baldur's horse struck forth a spring with his kick. The horse's foot is therefore the dispenser of fruitful moisture Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 421 In German legend, Mother Holle, the goddess of childbirth, comes on horseback. Pregnant women nearing confinement would often give oats to a white horse from their aprons and ask him for a speedy delivery. Originally it was the custom for the horse to nuzzle the woman's genitals Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 421 The horse, like the ass, has the significance of a priapic animal. Hoof-marks were once worshipped as dispensers of blessings and fertility; they also established the right of possession and were of importance in determining boundaries, like the Priapic statues of Latin antiquity Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 421 It was a horse who, like the Dactyls, discovered the mineral wealth of the Harz Mountains with his hoof. The horse-shoe, an equivalent for the horse's foot, brings luck and has an apotropaic meaning. In the Netherlands, a hoof is hung up in the stable to ward off sorcery. The analogous effect of the phallus is well known, hence the phalli on gates. The shank in particular is supposed to keep off lightning, on the principle that like cures like Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 421 The goddess of the underworld, Hecate, is sometimes represented with a horse's head. Demeter and Philyra, wishing to escape the attentions of Kronos or Poseidon, change themselves into mares Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 421 Witches can easily change into horses; hence the nail-marks of the horseshoe may be seen on their hands. The devil rides on the witch's horse, and priests' housekeepers are changed after death into horses Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 421 On account of their speed, horses signify wind, and here again the tertium comparationis is the libido-symbol. German legend knows the wind as the wild huntsman in lustful pursuit of the maiden. Wotan gallops along in a storm after the wind-bride (Frigg) fleeing before him Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 422 Storm-centres often get their names from horses, e.g., the Schimmelberge ('white horse hills') on Lüneburg heath. The centaurs are, among other things, wind-gods Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 422 We have already seen that the horse is connected through Yggdrasill with the symbolism of the tree. The horse too is a "tree of death;" for instance in the Middle Ages the bier was called "St. Michael's Horse," and the modern Persian word for coffin means 'wooden horse.' The horse also plays the part of a psychopomp who leads the way to the other world the souls of the dead are fetched by horsewomen, the Valkyries. Modern Greek songs speak of Charon as riding on a horse Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 427 Finally, the horse symbol appears in yet another form: sometimes the devil rides on a three-legged horse. The goddess of death, Hel, rides on a three-legged horse in time of pestilence Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 428 In the Bundahish there is a monstrous three-legged ass who stands in the heavenly rain-lake Vouru-Kasha; his urine purifies its waters, and at his cry all useful animals become pregnant and all harmful animals drop their young. The contrasting symbolism of Hel is fused into one image in the ass of Vouru-Kasha. The libido is fructifying as well as destructive Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 428 Mithras springs upon the bull to deliver the death blow the bull being a life-giving deity Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 421 The conquered bull has the same significance as the monster conquered by Gilgamesh who represents the father as a giant and dangerous animal Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 396 Hector's horses were called Xanthos (yellow, glaring), Podargus (swift-footed), Lampos (shining), and Aithon (burning) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 423 Siegfried leaps over the wall of fire on the thunder-horse Grani, who was sired by Sleipnir and was the only one capable of taking the fiery hedge Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 423 The idea is that Ra rises up, born from the tree. The representations of the sun-god Mithras should probably be interpreted in the same way Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 368 In the Heddernheim Relief, Mithras is shown with half his body rising from the top of a tree, and in other monuments half his body is stuck in the rock, which clearly points to the rock-birth Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 368 Often there is a stream near Mithras' birthplace. This conglomeration of symbols is also found in the birth of Aschanes, the first Saxon king, who grew from the Harz rocks in the middle of a wood near a fountain Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 368 Here all the mother symbols are united earth, wood, and water. So it is only logical that in the Middle Ages the tree was poetically addressed with the honorific title of "Lady" Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 368 Nor is it surprising that Christian legend transformed the tree of death, the Cross, into the Tree of Life, so that Christ is often shown hanging on a green tree among the fruit Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 368 The derivation of the Cross from the Tree of Life, which was an authentic religious symbol even in Babylonian times, is considered entirely probable by Zöckler, an authority on the history of the Cross. The pre-Christian meaning of so universal a symbol does not contradict this view; quite the contrary, for its meaning is life Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 368 Nor does the existence of the cross in the sun-cult (where the regular cross and the swastika represent the sun-wheel) and in the cult of the love-goddesses in any way contradict its historical significance. Christian legend has made abundant use of this symbolism Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 368 The student of medieval art will be familiar with the representation of the Cross growing from Adam's grave (fig. 258.37). The legend says that Adam was buried on Golgotha, and that Seth planted on his grave a twig from the tree of Paradise, which grew into Christ's Cross, the Tree of Death Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 368 What is remarkable that in the German legends the heralding of the future event is connected with a budding tree. Christ was sometimes called a "branch" or a "rod" Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 368 In mythology, too, the blossoming and withering of the tree of life denotes the turning point, the beginning of a new age Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 423 The highest god always drives his chariot round in a circle. The chariot is drawn by four horses, and the outside horse moves very quickly. He has a shining coat, bearing on it the sign of the zodiac and the constellations Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 423 The horses represent the four elements. The catastrophe signifies world conflagration and the deluge, after which the division of God into Many cases, and the divine One is restored Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 423 As the name indicates, he is a time-symbol, and is composed entirely of libido-images. The lion, the zodiacal sign for the torrid heat of summer, is the symbol of concupiscentia effrenata, 'frenzied desire.' ("My soul roars with the voice of a hungry lion," says Mechthild of Magdeburg) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 425 In the Mithraic mysteries the snake is often shown as the antagonist of the lion, in accordance with the myth of the sun's fight with the dragon. In the Egyptian Book of the Dead, Tum is addressed as a tom-cat, because in that form he fought the Apophis-serpent. To be "entwined" or embraced is the same as to be "devoured," which as we saw means entering into the mother's womb Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 425 So time, this empty and purely formal concept, is expressed in the mysteries through transformations of the creative force, libido, just as time in physics is identical with the flow of the energic process Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 425 The hero Chiwantopel represents her ideal, who is here projected as a masculine figure; for Miss Miller is still youthful enough to see her ideal in a man. She has evidently received no salutary disappointments in this respect, but is still enjoying her illusions Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 432 She does not yet know that her ideal figure ought really to be feminine, because such a figure might touch her too closely. So long as the ideal is portrayed in the person of a man, it does not commit her to anything; it merely stimulates her fantastic demands Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 432 This yearning for death anticipates the inevitable end of the illusion that the other person is the ideal. Miss Miller's ideal figure is evidently about to change his psychic localization he might even take up his abode in the author herself. That would mark a very critical point in her career Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 432 For when such a vitally important figure as the ideal is about to change, it is as though that figure had to die. It then creates in the individual all sorts of unaccountable and apparently unfounded presentiments of death romantic world weariness. Her infantile world wants to come to an end and be replaced by the adult phase Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 432 The wish of young girls to die is often only an indirect expression of this, but it remains a pose even if they really do die, for even death can be dramatized. Such an outcome merely makes the pose more effective Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 432 As an infantile person Miss Miller cannot realize what her task is in life; she cannot set herself any goal or standard for which she feels responsible. Therefore she is not yet prepared to accept the problem of love either, for this demands full consciousness and responsibility, circumspection and foresight. It is a decision in favour of life, at whose end death stands. Love and death have not a little to do with one another Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 432 It is a well-known fact that hysterics substitute a physical pain for a psychic pain which is not felt because repressed. Catherina Emmerich's biographer has understood this more or less correctly, but her own interpretation of the pain is based, as usual, on a projection: it is always the others who secretly say all sorts of wicked things about her, and this is the cause of her pains Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 436 The facts of the matter are rather different: the renunciation of all life's joys, this fading before the flower, is always painful, and especially painful are the unfulfilled desires and the attempts of nature to break through the barrier of repression, without which no such differentiation would be possible Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 436 It is a well-known fact that scenes of mystic union with the Saviour are strongly tinged with erotic libido. Stigmatization amounts to an incubation with the Saviour, a slight modification of the ancient conception of the unio mystica as cohabitation with the god Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 438 [Dr. Jung acknowledges the work of Sabina Spielrein] Spielrein, Sabina: on archaic definitions of words, in paranoia, 140; on death-instinct, 32871; on symbols, 141; case, 13972, 28172, 43777; allusions to dismemberment, 237; "arrows from God." 353; association of boring with fire and procreation, 153; communion, 40972; God's ray, 412; images, 30277; sickness, 3017?; snake, 437; splitting the earth, 28872; wine and water, 37672 Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 549 "To make sharp arrows" is an Arabic expression for begetting valiant sons. To announce the birth of a son the Chinese used to hang a bow and arrow in front of the house. Accordingly the Psalms declare (127: 4, RV): "As arrows in the hand of a mighty man, so are the children of youth" Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 439 A similar significance attaches to the lance: men are descended from the lance; the ash is the mother of lances; therefore the men of the Bronze Age are derived from her Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 439 Kaineus commanded that his lance was to be worshipped. Pindar says of this Kaineus that, in the legend, "he descended into the depths, splitting the earth with a straight foot." Originally he is supposed to have been a maiden named Kainis, who, as a reward for her submissiveness, was changed by Poseidon into an invulnerable man Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 439 "Iron is used for boring into the earth With iron you can make menthe earth is split, burst open, man is divided Man is cut up and put together again In order to put a stop to being buried alive,

Jesus told his disciples to bore into the earth” Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 439 Mithras shoots water from the rock with his arrow in order to stop the drought. On Mithraic monuments the knife, otherwise used as the sacrificial instrument for killing the bull, is sometimes found stuck in the earth (Cumont, Textes, I, pp. 115, 116, 165) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 439 In other words, they remained stuck in the mother and were lost to the upper world. Later Theseus was rescued by Heracles, who appeared in the role of the death-conquering hero. The Theseus myth is therefore a representation of the individuation process Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 449 When the libido leaves the bright upper world, whether from choice, or from inertia, or from fate, it sinks back into its own depths, into the source from which it originally flowed, and returns to the point of cleavage, the navel, where it first entered the body. This point of cleavage is called the mother, because from her the current of life reached us Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 449 Whenever some great work is to be accomplished, before which a man recoils, doubtful of his strength, his libido streams back to the fountainhead and that is the dangerous moment when the issue hangs between annihilation and new life Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 449 For if the libido gets stuck in the wonderland of this inner world, then for the upper world man is nothing but a shadow, he is already moribund or at least seriously ill Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 449 But if the libido manages to tear itself loose and force its way up again, something like a miracle happens: the journey to the underworld was a plunge into the fountain of youth, and the libido, apparently dead, wakes to renewed fruitfulness Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 449 Vishnu sank into a profound trance, and in his slumber brought forth Brahma who, enthroned on a lotus, rose out of Vishnu’s navel, bringing with him the Vedas, which he diligently read (Birth of creative thought from introversion) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 449 But through Vishnu’s ecstatic absentmindedness a mighty flood came upon the world (Devouring and destruction of the world through introversion) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 449 For if the libido gets stuck in the wonderland of this inner world, then for the upper world man is nothing but a shadow, he is already moribund or at least seriously ill Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 449 A state of introversion. What this means we already know: the libido sinks “into its own depths” (a favourite image of Nietzsche’s), and discovers in the darkness a substitute for the upper world it has abandoned the world of memories (“Amidst a hundred memories”), the strongest and most influential of which are the earliest ones Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 448 It is the world of the child, the paradisal state of early infancy, from which we are driven out by the relentless law of time. In this subterranean kingdom slumber sweet feelings of home and the hopes of all that is to be Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 448 The deadly arrows do not strike the hero from without; it is himself who hunts, fights, and tortures himself. In him, instinct wars with instinct; therefore the poet says, “Thyself pierced through,” which means that he is wounded by his own arrow. As we know that the arrow is a libido-symbol, the meaning of this “piercing” is clear: it is the act of union with oneself, a sort of self-fertilization, and also a self-violation, a self-murder Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 447 These are the primordial images, the archetypes, which have been so enriched with individual memories through the introversion of libido as to become perceptible to the conscious mind, in much the same way as the crystalline structure latent in the saturated solution takes visible shape from the aggregation of molecules Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 450 Since these introversions and regressions only occur at moments when a new orientation and a new adaptation are necessary, the constellated archetype is always the primordial image of the need of the moment Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 450 Although the changing situations of life must appear infinitely various to our way of thinking, their possible number never exceeds certain natural limits; they fall into more or less typical patterns that repeat themselves over and over again Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 450 The archetypal structure of the unconscious corresponds to the average run of events. When therefore a distressing situation arises, the corresponding archetype will be constellated in the unconscious Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 450 Since this archetype is numinous, i.e., possesses a specific energy, it will attract to itself the contents of consciousness conscious ideas that render it perceptible and hence capable of conscious realization. Its passing over into consciousness is felt as an illumination, a revelation, or repeated experience of this process has had the general result that, whenever a critical situation arises, the mechanism of introversion is made to function artificially by means of ritual actions which bring about a spiritual preparation, e.g., magical ceremonies, sacrifices, invocations, prayers, and suchlike. The aim of these ritual actions is to direct the libido towards the unconscious and compel it to introvert Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 450 If the libido connects with the unconscious, it is as though it were connecting with the mother, and this raises the incest-taboo. But as the unconscious is infinitely greater than the mother and is only symbolized by her, the fear of incest must be conquered if one is to gain possession of those "saving" contents the treasure hard to attain Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 450 Since the son is not conscious of his incest tendency, it is projected upon the mother or her symbol. But the symbol of the mother is not the mother herself, so in reality there is not the slightest possibility of incest, and the taboo can therefore be ruled out as a reason for resistance. In so far as the mother represents the unconscious, the incest tendency, particularly when it appears as the amorous desire of the mother (e.g., Ishtar and Gilgamesh) or of the anima (e.g., Chryse and Philoctetes), is really only the desire of the unconscious to be taken notice of Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 450 The rejection of the unconscious usually has unfortunate results; its instinctive forces, if persisently disregarded, rise up in opposition: Chryse changes into a venomous serpent Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 450 The more negative the attitude of the conscious towards the unconscious, the more dangerous does the latter become. Chryse's curse was fulfilled so completely that Philoctetes, on approaching her altar, wounded himself in the foot with his own poison-tipped arrow, or, according to other versions which are in fact better attested, was bitten in the foot by a poisonous snake, and fell into a decline Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 450 So when the sun-god Ra retires on the back of the heavenly cow, it means that he is going back into the mother in order to rise again as Horus. In the morning the goddess is the mother, at noon she is the sister-wife, and at evening once more the mother who takes back the dead into her womb Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 360 The poisonous worm is a deadly form of libido instead of an animating form. The "true name" is Ra's soul and magic power (his libido). What Isis demands is the transference of libido to the mother. This request is fulfilled to the letter, for the aging god returns to the heavenly cow, the symbol of the mother Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 455 But the real cause of the wound is the incest-taboo, which cuts a man off from the security of childhood and early youth, from all those unconscious, instinctive happenings that allow the child to live without responsibility as an appendage of his parents Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 351 The more a person shrinks from adapting himself to reality, the greater becomes the fear which increasingly besets his path at every point. Thus a vicious circle is formed: fear of life and people causes more shrinking back, and this in turn leads to infantilism and finally "into the mother" Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 456 The reasons for this are generally projected outside oneself: the fault lies with external circumstances, or else the parents are made responsible Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 456 And indeed, it remains to be found out how much the mother is to blame for not letting the son go. The son will naturally try to explain everything by the wrong attitude of the mother, but he would do better to refrain from all such futile attempts to excuse his own ineptitude by laying the blame on his parents Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 456 This fear of life is not just an imaginary bogy, but a very real panic, which seems disproportionate only because its real source is unconscious and therefore projected: the young, growing part of the personality, if prevented from living or kept in check, generates fear and changes into fear Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 457 The fear seems to come from the mother, but actually it is the deadly fear of the instinctive, unconscious, inner man who is cut off from life by the continual shrinking back from reality Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 457 If the mother is felt as the obstacle, she then becomes the vengeful pursuer. Naturally it is not the real mother, although she too may seriously injure her child by the morbid tenderness with which she pursues it into adult life, thus prolonging the infantile attitude beyond the proper time Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 457 It is rather the mother-imago that has turned into a lamia. The mother-imago, however, represents the unconscious, and it is as much a vital necessity for the unconscious to be joined to the conscious as it is for the conscious not to lose contact with the unconscious Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 457 Nothing endangers this connection more in a man than a successful life; it makes him forget his dependence on the unconscious. The case of Gilgamesh is instructive in this respect: he was so successful that the gods, the representatives of the unconscious, saw themselves compelled to deliberate how they could best bring about his downfall. Their efforts were unavailing at first, but when the hero had won the herb of immortality and was almost at his goal, a serpent stole the elixir of life from him while he slept Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 457 Apparently it is a hostile demon who robs him of energy, but in actual fact it is his own unconscious whose alien tendencies are beginning to check the forward striving of the conscious mind Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 458 The cause of this process is often extremely obscure, the more so as it is complicated by all kinds of external factors and subsidiary causes, such as difficulties in work, disappointments, failures, reduced efficiency due to age, depressing family problems, and so on and so forth Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 458 According to the myths it is the woman who secretly enslaves a man, so that he can no longer free himself from her and becomes a child again. It is also significant that Isis, the sister-wife of the sun-god, creates the poisonous serpent from his spittle, which, like all bodily secretions, has a magical significance, being a libido equivalent. She creates the serpent from the libido of the god, and by this means weakens him and makes him dependent on her Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 458 Delilah acts in the same way with Samson: by cutting off his hair, the sun's rays, she robs him of his strength Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 458 This demon-woman of mythology is in truth the "sister-wife-mother," the woman in the man, who unexpectedly turns up during the second half of life and tries to effect a forcible change of personality Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 458 I have dealt with certain aspects of this change in my essay on "The Stages of Life." It consists in a partial feminization of the man and a corresponding masculinization of the woman. Often it takes place under very dramatic circumstances: the man's strongest quality, his Logos principle, turns against him and as it were betrays him. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 458 The same thing happens with the Eros of the woman. The man becomes rigidly set in his previous attitude, while the woman remains caught in her emotional ties and fails to develop her reason and understanding, whose place is then taken by equally obstinate and inept "animus" opinions. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 458 The fossilization of the man shrouds itself in a smoke-screen of moods, ridiculous irritability, feelings of distrust and resentment, which are meant to justify his rigid attitude. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 458 It seems like an unwelcome accident or a disagreeable positive catastrophe, which one would naturally rather avoid. In most cases the conscious personality rises up against the assault of the unconscious and resists its demands, which, it is clearly felt, are directed not only against all the weak spots in the man's character, but also against his chief virtue (the differentiated function and the ideal) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 459 It is evident from the myths of Heracles and Gilgamesh that this assault can become the source of energy for a heroic conflict; indeed, so obvious is this impression that one has to ask oneself whether the apparent enmity of the maternal archetype is not a ruse on the part of Mater Natura for spurring on her favored child to his highest achievement Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 459 The vengeful Hera would then appear as the stern "Mistress Soul," who imposes the most difficult labors on her hero and threatens him with destruction unless he plucks up courage for the supreme deed and actually becomes what he always potentially was. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 459 The hero's victory over the "mother," or over her daemonic representative (dragon, etc.), is never anything but temporary. What must be regarded as a regression in a young person feminization of the man (partial identity with the father) acquired different meaning in the second half of life Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 459 The assimilation of contrasexual tendencies then becomes a task that must be fulfilled in order to keep the libido in a state of progression. The task consists in integrating the unconscious, in bringing together "conscious" and "unconscious." I have called this the individuation process. At this stage the mother-symbol no longer connects back to the beginnings, but points towards the unconscious as the creative matrix of the future. "Entry into the mother" then means establishing a relationship between the ego and the unconscious Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 459 The way of this passion leads to the cave in which the bull is sacrificed. So, too, Christ had to bear the Cross to the place of sacrifice, where, according to the Christian version, the Lamb was slain in the form of the god, and was then laid to earth in the sepulchre Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 460 The cross, or whatever other heavy burden the hero carries, is himself, or rather the Self, his wholeness, which is both God and animal not merely the empirical man, but the totality of his being, which is rooted in his animal nature and reaches out beyond the merely human towards the divine Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 460 His [Christ] wholeness implies a tremendous tension of opposites paradoxically at one with themselves, as in the cross, their most perfect symbol Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 460 Ixion first murdered his father-in-law but was afterwards absolved from guilt by Zeus and blessed with his favour Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 460 Ixion, with gross ingratitude, then tried to seduce Hera, but Zeus tricked him by getting the cloud-goddess Nephele to assume Hera's shape. From this union the centaurs are said to have sprung Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 460 Ixion boasted of his deed, but as a punishment for his crimes Zeus cast him into the underworld, where he was bound on a wheel that turned forever in the wind Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 460 Samson carried the gate-posts of the city of Gaza, and died between the pillars of the temple of the Philistines Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 460 Heracles carried his pillars to Gades (Cadiz), where, according to the Syrian version of the legend, he died. The Pillars of Hercules mark the point in the west where the sun sinks into the sea Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 460 The cross of Heracles may well be the sun-wheel, for which the Greeks used the symbol of the cross Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 460 The fantasy of the arrow-shot is part of this struggle for personal independence. As yet, however, the need for such a decision has not penetrated to the conscious mind of the dreamer: the fatal arrow of Cupid has not yet found its mark Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 462 Chiwantopel, playing the role of the author, is not yet wounded or killed. He is the bold adventurer who dares to do what Miss Miller obviously shrinks from doing: he offers himself, of his own free will, as a target for the fatal arrow-shot Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 462 The fact that this gesture of self-exposure is projected upon a masculine figure is direct proof that the dreamer is quite unconscious of its necessity Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 462 Chiwantopel is a typical animus-figure, that is to say, a personification of the masculine side of the woman's psyche. He is an archetypal figure who becomes particularly active when the conscious mind refuses to follow the feelings and instincts prompted by the unconscious: instead of love and surrender there is mannishness, argumentativeness, obstinate self-assertion, and the demon of opinion in every possible shape and form (power instead of love) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 462 The animus is not a real man at all; he is a slightly hysterical, infantile hero whose longing to be loved shows through the gaps in his armour. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 462 Chiwantopel is a significant relation for Miss Miller where the hero is her brother-beloved, her "ghostly lover," she being his life-snake ultimately bringing death to him Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 679 The hero as an animus-figure acts vicariously for the conscious individual; that is to say, he does what the subject ought, could, would like to do, but does not do. All the things that could happen in conscious life, but do not happen, are acted out in the unconscious and consequently appear in projection Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 469 Chiwantopel is characterized as the hero who leaves his family and his ancestral home in order to seek his psychic counterpart. He thus represents what in the normal course of events ought to happen Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 469 The fact that this appears as a fantasy-figure shows how little the author is doing it herself. What happens in fantasy is therefore compensatory to the situation or attitude of the conscious mind. This is also the rule in dreams Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 469 The animus, a typical "son"-hero, true to his ancient prototype, is seeking the mother. This youthful hero is always the son-lover of the mother-goddess and is doomed to an early death (fig. 020) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 466 The libido that will not flow into life at the right time regresses to the mythical world of the archetypes, where it activates images which, since the remotest times, have expressed the non-human life of the gods, whether of the upper world or the lower Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 466 He [Animus [ is therefore sure of his success and cuts out all possible rivals. He wins the soul of the dreamer, not in order to lead her back to normal life, but to her spiritual destiny Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 468 For he is a bridegroom of death, one of the son-lovers who die young because they have no life of their own but are only fast-fading flowers on the maternal tree. Their meaning and their vitality begin and end in the mother-goddess Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 468 The original concrete meaning of words like comprehend, comprendre, begreifen, erfassen (grasp, seize), etc., is literally to seize hold of something with the hands and hold it tight in the arms Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 465 That is just what the mother does with her child when it asks for help or protection, and what binds the child to its mother Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 465 The older the child grows, the greater becomes the danger of this kind of "comprehension" hindering its natural development. Instead of adapting itself, as is necessary, to its new surroundings, the libido of the child regresses to the sheltering ease of the mother's arms and fails to keep pace with the passing of time Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 465 I observed that the dance-step of the Pueblo Indians consisted in a "calcare terram" a persistent, vigorous pounding of the earth with the heels. (: "with unfettered foot now we are to beat on the ground") Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 480 Kaineus, as we saw, descended into the depths, "splitting the earth with a straight foot." Faust reached the Mothers by stamping on the ground: "Stamping descend and stamping rise up again!" Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 480 The heroes in the sun-devouring myths often stamp or kick in the gullet of the monster. Thor stamped clean through the bottom of the boat in his struggle with the monster and touched the bottom of the sea Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 481 The regression of libido makes the ritual act of treading out the dance-step seem like a repetition of the infantile "kicking." Kicking is associated with the mother and with pleasurable sensations and recapitulates a movement that was already practised inside the mother's womb. The foot and the treading movement are invested with a phallic significance, or with that of re-entry into the womb, so that the rhythm of the dance transports the dancer into an unconscious state. The Dancing Dervishes and other primitive dancers offer confirmation of this Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 481 The comparison of the water flowing from Gitche Manito's footprints with a comet means that it is a light- or libido-symbol for the fertilizing moisture (sperma) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 481 According to a note in Humboldt's Cosmos, certain South American Indian tribes call meteors the "piss of the stars" (Humboldt, Cosmos, I, p. 99. n.) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 481 We should also mention that Gitche Manito is a fire-maker: he blows upon a forest so that the trees rub against one another and burst into flame. Hence this god too is a libido-symbol, since he produces not only water but fire Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 481 The answer to this question is that the hero is not born like an ordinary mortal because his birth is a rebirth from the mother-wife. That is why the hero so often has two mothers Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 494 One would think it possible for a hero to be born in the normal manner, and then gradually to grow out of his humble and homely surroundings, perhaps with a great effort and in face of many dangers. (This motif is by no means uncommon in the hero-myths) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 493 As a general rule, however, the story of his origins is miraculous. The singular circumstances of his procreation and birth are part and parcel of the hero-myth. What is the reason for these beliefs? Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 493 The immaculate conception tells us that a content of the unconscious (“child”) has come into existence without the help of a human father, (i.e., consciousness) (fig. 258.08) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 497 It tells us, on the contrary, that some god has begotten the son, and further that the son is identical with the father, which in psychological language means that a central archetype, the God image, has renewed itself (“been reborn”) and become “incarnate” in a way perceptible to consciousness Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 497 The “mother” corresponds to the “virgin anima,” who is not turned towards the outer world and therefore not corrupted by it. She is turned rather to the “inner sun,” the archetype of transcendent wholeness the Self Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 497 This is typical of Hiawatha’s deeds. Whatever he kills generally lies by or in the water, or better still, half in water and half on land. His subsequent adventures will explain why this is so. Further, the roebuck was no ordinary animal, but a magic one with an unconscious (i.e., symbolical) significance Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 503 Hiawatha made himself gloves and moccasins from its hide: the gloves gave such power to his arms that he could crumble rocks to dust, and the moccasins had the virtue of seven-leagued boots. By clothing himself in the hide he became a sort of giant Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 503 Therefore the roebuck killed at the ford was a “doctor animal,” a magician who had changed his shape, or a daemonic being a symbol, that is to say, which points to the “animal” and other such powers of the unconscious Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 503 That is why it was killed at the ford, i.e., at the crossing, on the border-line between conscious and unconscious. The animal is a representative of the unconscious, and the unconscious, as the matrix of consciousness, has a maternal significance, which explains why the mother was also represented by the bear Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 503 All animals belong to the Great Mother (fig. 258.51), and the killing of any wild animal is a transgression against the mother. Just as the mother seems a giantess to the small child, so the attribute of size passes to the archetypal Great Mother, Mother Nature Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 503 Whoever succeeds in killing the “magic” animal, the symbolic representative of the animal mother, acquires something of her gigantic strength. This is expressed by saying that the hero clothes himself in the animal’s skin and in this way obtains for the magic animal a sort of resurrection Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 503 At the Aztec human sacrifices criminals played the part of gods: they were slaughtered and flayed, and the priests then wrapped themselves in the dripping pelts in order to represent the gods’ resurrection and renewal Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 503 In killing his first roebuck, therefore, Hiawatha was killing the symbolic representative of the unconscious, i.e., his own participation mystique with animal nature, and from that comes his giant strength Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 504 He now sallies forth to do battle with Mudjekeewis, the father, in order to avenge his mother Wenonah. (Cf. Gilgamesh’s fight with the giant Humbaba.) In this fight the father may also be represented by some sort of magic animal which has to be overcome, but he can equally well be represented by a giant or a magician or a wicked tyrant Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 504 Mutatis mutandis the animals can be interpreted as the “mother,” as the “mater saeva cupidinum,” or again as that amiable Isis who laid a horned viper in her husband’s path in short, they can be interpreted as the Terrible Mother who devours and destroys, and thus symbolizes death itself Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 504 I remember the case of a mother who kept her children tied to her with unnatural love and devotion. At the time of the climacteric she fell into a depressive psychosis and had delirious states in which she saw herself as an animal, especially as a wolf or pig, and acted accordingly, running about on all fours, howling like a wolf or grunting like a pig. In her psychosis she had herself become the symbol of the all-devouring mother Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 504 The imagos are representations which have arisen from the conjunction of parental peculiarities with the individual disposition of the child Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 505 The imagos are activated and varied in every possible manner by an energy which likewise pertains to the individual; it derives from the sphere of instinct and expresses itself as instinctuality. This dynamism is represented in dreams by theriomorphic symbols Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 505 All the lions, bulls, dogs, and snakes that populate our dreams represent an undifferentiated and as yet unnamed libido, which at the same time forms part of the human personality and can therefore fittingly be described as the anthropoid psyche Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 505 The archetype of the wise old man first appears in the father, being a personification of meaning and spirit in its procreative sense Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 515 The question of nourishment has to be considered here because regression to the mother is bound to revive the memory of the "alma mater," the mother as the nourishing source. Incest is not the only aspect characteristic of regression: there is also the hunger that drives the child to its mother Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 519 Whoever gives up the struggle to adapt and regresses into the bosom of the family, which in the last resort is the mother's bosom, expects not only to be warmed and loved, but also to be fed. If the regression has an infantile character, it aims without of course admitting it at incest and nourishment Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 519 When the regression is only apparent, and is in reality a purposive introversion of libido directed towards a goal, then the endogamous relationship, which is in any case prohibited by the incest-taboo, will be avoided, and the demand for nourishment replaced by intentional fasting Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 519 Solitude and fasting have from time immemorial been the best-known means of strengthening any meditation whose purpose is to open the doors to the unconscious Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 519 Mondamin is the maize, the Indian corn. Hiawatha's introversion gives birth to a god who is eaten. His hunger in the twofold sense his longing for the nourishing mother, calls forth from the unconscious another hero, an edible god, the maize, son of the Earth Mother Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 522 The Christian parallel is obvious. It is hardly necessary to suppose any Christian influence here, since Fray Bernardino de Sahagún had already described the eucharist of Huitzilopochtli among the Aztecs early in the sixteenth century. This god, too, was ceremonially eaten Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 522 Mondamin, the "friend of man," challenges Hiawatha to single combat in the glow of evening. In the "purple twilight" of the setting sun (i.e., in the western land) there now ensues the mythological struggle with the god who has sprung out of the unconscious like a transformed reflection of Hiawatha's introverted consciousness Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 522 As a god or god-man he is the prototype of Hiawatha's heroic destiny; that is to say, Hiawatha has in himself the possibility, indeed the necessity, of confronting his daemon Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 522 On the way to this goal he conquers the parents and breaks his infantile ties. But the deepest tie is to the mother. Once he has conquered this by gaining access to her symbolic equivalent, he can be born again Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 522 In this tie to the maternal source lies the strength that gives the hero his extraordinary powers, his true genius, which he frees from the embrace of the unconscious by his daring and sovereign independence. Thus the god is born in him Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 522 The mystery of the "mother" is divine creative power, which appears here in the form of the corn-god Mondamin Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 522 How the remarkable thing here is that it is not Hiawatha who passes through death and emerges reborn, as might be expected, but the god. It is not man who is transformed into a god, but the god who undergoes transformation in and through man. It is as though he had been asleep in the "mother," i.e., in Hiawatha's unconscious, and had then been roused and fought with so that he should not overpower his host, but should, on the contrary, himself experience death and rebirth and reappear in the corn in a new form beneficial to mankind 524. Consequently he [the god] appears at first in hostile form, as an assailant with whom the hero has to wrestle. This is in keeping with the violence of all unconscious dynamism. In this manner the god manifests himself and in this form he must be overcome. The struggle has its parallel in Jacob's wrestling with the angel at the ford Jabbok Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 524 The onslaught of instinct then becomes an experience of divinity, provided that man does not succumb to it and follow it blindly, but defends his humanity against the animal nature of the divine power Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 524 This ravenous hunger aptly describes man's repressive instinctuality at the stage where the parents have a predominantly nutritive significance Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 526 The image of Iacchus was carried at the head of the great Eleusinian procession. It is not easy to say exactly what god Iacchus is, but he was probably a boy or a new-born son, similar perhaps to the Etruscan Tages, who bore the epithet "the fresh-ploughed boy," because, according to legend, he sprang out of a furrow behind a peasant ploughing his fields Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 527 The lexicographers called him "Demeter's daimon." He was identified with Dionysus, especially with the Thracian Dionysus-Zagreus, who is supposed to have undergone the typical fate of being reborn Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 527 Hera, we are told, had stirred up the Titans against Zagreus, who tried to escape them by changing into various shapes. In the end they caught him when he had taken on the form of a bull. They then killed him, cut him in pieces, and threw the pieces into a cauldron; but Zeus slew the Titans with a thunderbolt and swallowed the still-throbbing heart of Zagreus. In this manner he was regenerated, and Zagreus stepped forth again as Iacchus Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 527 Another thing carried in the Eleusinian procession was the winnowing-basket, the cradle of Iacchus (, mystica vannus Iacchi). The Orphic legend relates that Iacchus was reared by Persephone in the underworld, where after slumbering for three years, he awoke in the winnowing-basket. The 20th of Boedromion (the month of Boedromion lasted from about September 5 to October 5) was called Iacchus, in honour of the hero Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 528 In the Eleusinian procession the 20th of Boedromion (the month of Boedromion lasted from about September 5 to October 5) was called Iacchus, in honour of the hero. On the evening of this day a great torchlight procession was held on the sea-shore, where the search and lament of Demeter were re-enacted Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 527 The part of Demeter, who, abstaining from food and drink, wanders over the face of the earth seeking her lost daughter, has, in the American Indian epic, been taken over by Hiawatha. He turns to all creatures, but receives no answers Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 528 Just as Demeter first gets news of her daughter from the moon-goddess Hecate, so Hiawatha only finds the one he is looking for Mondamin through profound introversion, by a descent into the darkness of night, to the Mothers Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 528 The priestess of Demeter seems to have represented the earth-goddess, or possibly the ploughed furrow Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 528 The parallel to the motif of dying and rising again is that of being lost and found again. It appears ritually at exactly same place, in connection with the hierosgamos-like spring festivities, where the image of the god was hidden and then found again Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 531 There is an uncanonical tradition that Moses left his father's house at the age of twelve in order to instruct mankind Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 531 Similarly, Christ was lost by his parents, and they found him teaching wisdom in the temple, just as in the Mohammedan legend Moses and Joshua, lose the fish and find in its stead Khidr, the teacher of wisdom Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 531 So, too, does the corn-god, lost and believed dead, suddenly spring from the earth in the splendor of youth Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 531 The believer descends into the grave in order to rise again from the dead with the hero. It can scarcely be doubted that the underlying meaning of the Church is the mother's womb. The Tantric texts interpret the interior of the temple as the interior of the body, and the adyton is called "garbha griha," the seeding-place or uterus Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 536 We can see this quite plainly in the worship of the Holy Sepulchre, a good example being the Holy Sepulchre of San Stefano in Bologna Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 536 The church itself, an extremely ancient polygonal building, was built from the remains of a temple to Isis. Inside, there is an artificial spelaeum, known as the Holy Sepulchre, into which one creeps through a tiny door. Worshippers in such a spelaeum could hardly help identifying themselves with him who died and rose again, i.e., with the reborn Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 536 trees are anointed with sweet-smelling waters, sprinkled with powder, adorned with garlands and draperies Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 545 Just as the people pierce their ears as an apotropaic charm against death, so they pierce the sacred tree Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 545 Of all the trees in India there is none more sacred to the Hindus than the peepul or aswatha (Ficus religiosa). It is known to them as Vriksha Raja (king of trees). Brahma, Vishnu, and Maheswar live in it, and the worship of it is the worship of the Triad. Almost every Indian village has an aswatha (Negelein, ed., Der Traumschlüssel des Jaggadeva, p. 256) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 545 The woodpecker owes his special significance to the fact that he hammers holes in trees. Hence we can understand why he was honoured in Roman legend as an ancient king of the country, who was the possessor or ruler of the sacred tree, and the prototype of the pater familias Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 547 An old fable relates that Circe, the wife of king Picus, changed him into Picus martius, the woodpecker. She killed and magically transformed him into a soul-bird Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 547 Picus was also regarded as a wood demon and incubus, and a soothsayer. He was sometimes equated with Picumnus, the inseparable companion of Pilumnus, both of whom were called infantium dii, 'gods of small children.' Pilumnus especially was said to protect new-born infants from the wicked attacks of the wood-imp Sylvanus Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 547 This helpful little bird now counsels our hero [Hiawatha] to aim under the magician's topknot, the only vulnerable spot. It is situated on the crown of the head, at the point where the mythical "head birth" takes place, which even today figures among the birth-theories of children Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 547 There Hiawatha shoots in three arrows and so makes an end of Megissogwon. He then steals the magic belt of wampum which makes him invisible; the dead magician he leaves lying in the water Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 547 He is the spirit of regression, who threatens us with bondage to the mother and with dissolution and extinction in the unconscious (cf. fig. 035) and (fig. 258.62) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 551 For the hero, fear is a challenge and a task, because only boldness can deliver from fear Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 551 If the risk is not taken, the meaning of life is somehow violated, and the whole future is condemned to hopeless staleness, to a drab grey lit only by will-o'-the wisps. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 551 This image is undoubtedly a primordial one, and there was profound justification for its becoming a symbolical expression of human fate Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 553 In the morning of life the son tears himself loose from the mother, from the domestic hearth, to rise through battle to his destined heights Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 553 Always he imagines his worst enemy in front of him, yet he carries the enemy within himself a deadly longing for the abyss, a longing to drown in his own source, to be sucked down to the realm of the Mothers Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 553 His life is a constant struggle against extinction, a violent yet fleeting deliverance from ever-lurking night. This death is no external enemy, it is his own inner longing for the stillness and profound peace of all-knowing non-existence, for all-seeing sleep in the ocean of coming-to-be and passing away Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 553 Even in his highest strivings for harmony and balance, for the profundities of philosophy and the raptures of the artist, he seeks death, immobility, satiety, rest Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 553 If, like Peirithous, he tarries too long in this abode of rest and peace, he is overcome by apathy, and the poison of the serpent paralyses him for all time Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 553 If he is to live, he must fight and sacrifice his longing for the past in order to rise to his own heights. And having reached the noonday heights, he must sacrifice his love for his own achievement, for he may not loiter Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 553 The sun, too, sacrifices its greatest strength in order to hasten onward to the fruits of autumn, which are the seeds of rebirth Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 553 The natural course of life demands that the young person should sacrifice his childhood and his childish dependence on the physical parents, lest he remain caught body and soul in the bonds of unconscious incest Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 553 This regressive tendency has been consistently opposed from the most primitive times by the great psychotherapeutic systems which we know as the religions. They seek to create an autonomous consciousness by weaning mankind away from the sleep of childhood Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 553 This archaic fact is expressed here in a rather veiled way. In the legend of the "Entkrist" it is expressed openly by the devil, the father of the Anti-Christ Carl Jung,

CW 5, Para 565 Wotan is justly indignant with Brünhilde, for she has taken over the role of Isis and through the birth of a son has deprived the old man of his power Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 565 In psychological terms this means that the "treasure hard to attain" lies hidden in the mother-imago, i.e., in the unconscious. This symbol points to one of life's secrets which is expressed in countless symbolical ways in mythology. When such symbols occur in individual dreams, they will be found on examination to be pointing to something like a centre of the total personality, of the psychic totality which consists of both conscious and unconscious. Here I must refer the reader to my later works, where I deal at some length with the symbol of the Self Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 569 Last but not least, Siegfried wins the hoard Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 569 Life is put together again from the broken pieces (miracle of Medea). Just as a blacksmith welds the broken pieces together, so the dismembered corpse is reconstituted Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 556 This comparison also occurs in Plato's Timaeus: the world's parts are joined together with pegs. In the Rig-Veda the world creator Brahmanaspati is a blacksmith Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 556 We have already seen that pastries in the form of snakes and phalli were flung into a pit at the Arrhetophoria. We mentioned this in connection with the earth fertilization ceremonies Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 571 It is significant that the deadly flood flowed off into the fissure, back into the mother again, for it was from the mother that death came into the world in the first place. The Deluge is simply the counterpart of the all-vivifying and all-producing water, of "the ocean, which is the origin of all things" Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 571 Honeycakes are offered to the mother that she may spare one from death. In Rome money-offerings were thrown every year into the lacus Curtius, formerly a chasm that had been closed through the sacrificial death of Curtius. He was the hero who went down to the underworld in order to conquer the danger that threatened the Roman state after the opening of the chasm Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 571 In the Anphiaraion at Oropos those healed through incubation in the temple threw their money-offerings into the sacred well. Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 571 Near Eleusis, there was a gorge through which Aidoneus came up and into which he descended after kidnapping the Kore Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 572 There were crevasses in the rocks where the souls could ascend to the upper world Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 572 Behind the temple of Chthonia in Hermione lay a spot sacred to Pluto, with a chasm through which Heracles came up with Cerberus Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 572 There was also an "Acherusian" lake. This chasm, therefore, was the entrance to the place where death had been conquered Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 572 The chasm on the Areopagus in Athens was believed to be the seat of the dwellers in the underworld Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 572 Similar ideas are suggested by an old Greek custom: girls used to be sent for a virginity test to a cave where there lived a poisonous serpent. If they were bitten, it was a sign that they were no longer chaste Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 572 The Self, as a symbol of wholeness, is a coincidentia oppositorum, and therefore contains light and darkness simultaneously (cf. fig. 039), (fig. 258.09), and (fig. 258.60) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 576 In the Christ-figure the opposites which are united in the archetype are polarized into the "light" son of God on the one hand and the devil on the other. The original unity of opposites is still discernible in the original unity of Satan and Yahweh. Christ and the dragon of the Anti-Christ lie very close together so far as their historical development and cosmic significance are concerned Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 576 The dragon legend concealed under the myth of the Anti-Christ is an essential part of the hero's life and is therefore immortal Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 576 Nowhere in the latter-day myths are the paired opposites so palpably close together as in the figures of Christ and Anti-Christ. (Here I would refer the reader to Merezhkovsky's admirable account of this problem in his novel Leonardo da Vinci) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 576 It is a convenient rationalistic conceit to say that the dragon is only "artificial," thus banishing the mysterious gods with a word Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 576 Schizophrenic patients often make use of this mechanism for apotropaic purposes. "It's all a fake," they say, "all artificially made up." The following dream of a schizophrenic is typical: Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 576 Sun and moon, as divine equivalents of the parent archetype, possess a tremendous psychic power that has to be weakened apotropaically, because the patient is already far too much under the power of the unconscious Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 576 Nothing was left but the hole in which the snake was said to dwell. There the honey cakes were placed and the obolus thrown in. The sacred cave in the temple at Cos consisted of a rectangular pit covered by a stone slab with a square hole in it Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 577 This arrangement served the purpose of a treasure-house: the snake-pit had become a slot for money, a "poor-box," and the cave a "hoard." That this development is fully in accord with the archaeological evidence is proved by a discovery in the temple of Aesculapius and Hygeia at Ptolemaïs Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 577 Here the serpent lies on the treasury as protector of the hoard. Fear of the deadly maternal womb has become the guardian of the treasure of life. That the snake really is a death-symbol is evident from the fact that the souls of the dead, like the chthonic gods, appear as serpents, as dwellers in the kingdom of the deadly mother Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 578 The hero himself appears as a being of more than human stature. He is distinguished from the very beginning by his godlike characteristics Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 612 Since he is psychologically an archetype of the Self, his divinity only confirms that the Self is numinous, a sort of god, or having some share in the divine nature Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 612 The hero is the protagonist of God's transformation in man; he corresponds to what I call the "mana personality." The mana personality has such an immense fascination for the conscious mind that the ego all too easily succumbs to the temptation to identify with the hero, thus bringing on a psychic inflation with all its consequences. For this reason the repugnance felt by certain ecclesiastical circles for the "inner Christ" is understandable enough, at least as a preventive measure against the danger of psychic inflation which threatens the Christian European Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 612 Heroes are usually wanderers, and wandering is a symbol of longing, of the restless urge which never finds its object, of nostalgia for the lost mother. The sun comparison can easily be taken in this sense: the heroes are like the wandering sun, from which it is concluded that the myth of the hero is a solar myth Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 299 It seems to us, rather, that he is first and foremost a self-representation of the longing of the unconscious, of its unquenched and unquenchable desire for the light of consciousness. But consciousness, continually in danger of being led astray by its own light and of becoming a rootless will o' the wisp, longs for the healing power of nature, for the deep wells of being and for unconscious communion with life in all its countless forms Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 299 It is not man as such who has to be regenerated or born again as a renewed whole, but, according to the statements of mythology, it is the hero or god who rejuvenates himself. These figures are generally expressed or characterized by libido-symbols (light, fire, sun, etc.), so that it looks as if they represented psychic energy. They are, in fact, personifications of the libido Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 388 The hero is a hero just because he sees resistance to the forbidden goal in all life's difficulties and yet fights that resistance with the whole-hearted yearning that strives towards the treasure hard to attain, and perhaps unattainable a yearning that paralyses and kills the ordinary man Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 510 The hero is an extraordinary being who is inhabited by a daemon, and it is this that makes him a hero. That is why the mythological statements about heroes are so typical and so impersonal Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 536 The treasure which the hero fetches from the dark cavern is life: it is himself, new-born from the dark maternal cave of the unconscious where he was stranded by the introversion or regression of libido. Hence the Hindu fire-bringer is called Matarisvan, he who swells in the mother. The hero who clings to the mother is the dragon, and when the hero is reborn from the mother he becomes the conqueror of the dragon (fig. 258.59a) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 580 The hero who sets himself the task of renewing the world and conquering death personifies the world-creating power which, brooding on itself in introversion, coiled round its own egg like a snake, threatens life with its poisonous bite, so that the living may die and be born again from the darkness Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 592 The hero is himself the snake, himself the sacrificer and the sacrificed, which is why Christ rightly compares himself with the healing Moses-serpent (fig. 258.09b) and why the saviour of the Christian Ophites was a serpent, too. It is both Agathodaimon (fig. 037) and Cacodaimon. In German legend we are told that the heroes have snake's eyes Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 593 One of my patients dreamt that a snake shot out of a cave and bit him in the genital region. The dream occurred at the moment when the patient was convinced of the truth of the analysis and was beginning to free himself from the bonds of his mother-complex Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 585 He felt that he was making progress and that he had more control over himself. But the moment he felt the impulse to go forward he also felt the pull of the bond of the mother Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 585 Being bitten in the genital region by a snake (fig. 258.61b) reminds us of Attis whose self-castration was occasioned by his mother's jealousy Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 585 The term tapas is to be translated, according to Deussen, as "he heated himself with his own heat," in the sense that "he brooded his own brooding," brooder and brooded being conceived not as separate, but as one and the same thing Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 589 As Hiranyagarbha (the Golden Germ), Prajapati is the self-begotten egg, the cosmic egg from which he hatches himself (fig. 036). He creeps into himself, becomes his own womb, makes himself pregnant with himself in order to hatch forth the world of multiplicity Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 589 Self-incubation, self-castigation, and introversion are closely related ideas. Immersion in oneself (introversion) is a penetration into the unconscious and at the same time asceticism. The result, for the philosophy of the Brahmanas, is the creation of the world, and for the mystic the regeneration and spiritual rebirth of the individual, who is born into a new world of the spirit. Indian philosophy also assumes that creativity as such springs from introversion Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 590 Above his subterranean dwelling rose the Parthenon, the temple of the virgin goddess Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 594 The flaying of the god, which we have already touched on in connection with the flaying-ceremonies of the Aztecs, is intimately bound up with the snake-like nature of the hero Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 594 It is reported of Mani, the founder of Manichaeism, that he was killed, flayed, stuffed, and hung up. The hanging up of the god has an unmistakable symbolic value, since suspension is the symbol of unfulfilled longing or tense expectation ("suspense"). Christ, Odin, Attis, and others all hung upon trees Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 594 We can in fact discover the same multiplicity of meanings and the same apparently limitless inter changeability of figures in dreams. On the other hand we are now in a position to establish certain laws, or at any rate rules, which make dream interpretation rather more certain. Thus we know that dreams generally compensate the conscious situation or supply what is lacking to it. This very important principle of dream interpretation also applies to myths Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 611 Furthermore, investigation of the products of the unconscious yields notable traces of archetypal structures which coincide with the myth-motifs among them certain types which deserve the name of dominants Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 611 The reason for this lies in the fact that no part of the hero-myth is single in meaning, and that, at a pinch, all the figures are interchangeable Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 611 The only certain and reliable thing is that the myth exists and shows unmistakable analogies with other myths Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 611 Myth-interpretation is a tricky business and there is some justification for looking at it askance. Hitherto the myth-interpreter has found himself in a somewhat unenviable position, because he only had exceedingly doubtful points for orientation at his disposal, such as astronomical and meteorological data Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 611 Snake dreams always indicate a discrepancy between the attitude of the conscious mind and instinct, the snake being a personification of the threatening aspect of that conflict Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 615 The appearance of the green viper therefore means: "Look out! Danger ahead!" Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 615 It devoured all human beings (devouring-mother = death) until only one pregnant woman remained. She dug a ditch, covered it with a stone, and there gave birth to twins who afterwards became dragon-killers Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 620 The mating in the mother also occurs in the following West African legend: "In the beginning, Obatala the Sky and Odudua the Earth, his wife, lay pressed close together in a calabash" Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 620 Being "guarded in modest bud" is an image that is found in Plutarch, where it is said that the sun is born at dawn from a flower bud Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 620 Brahma, too, comes out of a bud, and in Assam a bud gave birth to the first human pair Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 620 Separation and differentiation from the mother, "individuation," produces that confrontation of subject and object which is the foundation of consciousness Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 624 Before this, man was one with the mother; that is to say, he was merged with the world as a whole. He did not yet know the sun was his brother; only after the separation did he begin to realize his affinity with the stars Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 624 This is a not uncommon occurrence in psychosis. For instance, in the case of a young labouring-man who developed schizophrenia, the first symptoms of his illness consisted in the feeling that he had a special relation to the sun and the stars Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 624 The stars became full of meaning for him, he thought they had something to do with him personally, and the sun gave him all sorts of strange ideas. One finds this apparently quite novel feeling for Nature very often in this disease Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 624 Another patient began to understand the language of the birds, who brought him messages from his sweetheart Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 624 The separation from youth has even taken away the golden glamour of Nature, and the future appears hopeless and empty. But what robs Nature of its glamour, and life of its joy, is the habit of looking back for something that used to be outside, instead of looking inside, into the depths of the depressive state Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 625 This looking back leads to regression and is the first step along that path. Regression is also an involuntary introversion in so far as the past is an object of memory and therefore a psychic content, an endopsychic factor. It is a relapse into the past caused by a depression in the present Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 625 Depression should therefore be regarded as an unconscious compensation whose content must be made conscious if it is to be fully effective Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 625 This can only be done by consciously regressing along with the depressive tendency and integrating the memories so activated into the conscious mind which was what the depression was aiming at in the first place Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 625 Depression is a condition resulting from a blocking of libido where life ceases to flow Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 250 A person sinks into his childhood memories and vanishes from the existing world. He finds himself apparently in deepest darkness [inside the whale], but then has unexpected visions of a world beyond Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 631 The "mystery" he beholds represents the stock of primordial images which everybody brings with him as his human birthright, the sum total of inborn forms peculiar to the instincts. I have called this "potential" psyche the collective unconscious. If this layer is activated by the regressive libido, there is a possibility of life being renewed, and also of its being destroyed Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 631 Regression carried to its logical conclusion means a linking back with the world of natural instincts, which in its formal or ideal aspect is a kind of prima materia. If the prima materia can be assimilated by the conscious mind it will bring about a reactivation and reorganization of its contents Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 631 If the conscious mind proves incapable of assimilating the new contents pouring in from the unconscious, then a dangerous situation arises in which they keep their original, chaotic, and archaic form and consequently disrupt the unity of consciousness Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 631 All the libido that was tied up in family bonds must be withdrawn from the narrower circle into the larger one, because the psychic health of the adult individual, who in childhood was a mere particle revolving in a rotary system, demands that he should himself become the center of a new system Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 644 That such a step includes the solution, or at least some consideration, of the sexual problem is obvious enough, for unless this is done the unemployed libido will inevitably remain fixed in the unconscious endogamous relationship to the parents and will seriously hamper the individual's freedom Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 644 We must remember that Christ's teaching means ruthlessly separating a man from his family, and we saw in the Nicodemus dialogue how he took especial pains to give regression a symbolic meaning. Both tendencies serve the same goal, namely that of freeing man from his family fixations, from his weakness and uncontrolled infantile feelings Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 644 For if he allows his libido to get stuck in a childish milieu, and does not free it for higher purposes, he falls under the spell of unconscious compulsion. Wherever he may be, the unconscious will then recreate the infantile milieu by projecting his complexes, thus reproducing all over again, and in defiance of his vital interests, the same dependence and lack of freedom which formerly characterized his relations with his parents Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 644 His destiny no longer lies in his own hands: his (fortunes and fates) fall from the stars. The Stoics called this condition Heimarmene, compulsion by the stars, to which every "unredeemed" soul is subject Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 644 When the libido thus remains fixed in its most primitive form it keeps men on a correspondingly low level where they have no control over themselves and are at the mercy of their affects Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 644 That was the psychological situation of late antiquity, and the saviour and physician of that time was he who sought to free humanity from bondage to Heimarmene Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 644 For him who looks backwards the whole world, even the starry sky, becomes the mother who bends over him and enfolds him on all sides, and from the renunciation of this image, and of the longing for it, arises the picture of the world as we know it today Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 646 This simple thought is what constitutes the meaning of the cosmic sacrifice, a good example being the slaying of Tiamat (fig. 041), the Babylonian mother-dragon, from whose body heaven and earth were made Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 646 But he only discovers it when he sacrifices his containment in the primal mother, the original state of unconsciousness. What drives him towards this discovery is conceived by Freud as the "incest barrier." The incest prohibition blocks the infantile longing for the mother and forces the libido along the path of life's biological aim Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 652 The libido, driven back from the mother by the incest prohibition, seeks a sexual object in place of the forbidden mother. The fact that the infant finds pleasure in sucking does not prove that it is a sexual pleasure, for pleasure can have many different sources Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 652 Presumably, the caterpillar finds quite as much pleasure in eating, even though caterpillars possess no sexual function whatever and the food instinct is something quite different from the sex instinct, quite unconcerned about what a later sexual stage may make of these activities Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 652 Kissing, for instance, derives far more from the act of nutrition than from sexuality. Moreover the so-called "incest barrier" is an exceedingly doubtful hypothesis (admirable as it is for describing certain neurotic conditions), because it is a product of culture which nobody invented and which grew up naturally on the basis of complex biological necessities connected with the development of "marriage classes" Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 652 The main purpose of marriage classes is not to prevent incest but to meet the social danger of endogamy by instituting the "cross-cousin marriage." The typical marriage with the daughter of the maternal uncle is actually implemented by the same libido which could equally well possess the mother or the sister Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 652 So it is not a question of avoiding incest, for which incidentally there are plenty of opportunities in the frequent fits of promiscuity to which primitives are prone, but of the social necessity of spreading the family organization throughout the whole tribe Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 652 Therefore it cannot have been the incest-taboo that forced mankind out of the original psychic state of non-differentiation. On the contrary, it was the evolutionary instinct peculiar to man, which distinguishes him so radically from all other animals and forced upon him countless taboos, among them the incest-taboo Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 653 Against this "other urge"

the animal in us fights with all his instinctive conservatism and misoneism hatred of novelty which are the two outstanding features of the primitive and feebly conscious individual. Our mania for progress represents the inevitable morbid compensation Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 653 Even as the world is created by sacrifice, by renouncing the personal tie to childhood, so, according to the teaching of the Upanishads, will be created the new state of man, which can be described as immortal Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 657 This new state beyond the human one is again attained through a sacrifice, the horse-sacrifice, which has cosmic significance Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 657 The horse-sacrifice signifies a renunciation of the world. When the horse is sacrificed the world is sacrificed and destroyed Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 658 Pentheus climbed up into a pine-tree, curious to see the orgies of the Maenads, but was spotted by his mother Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 662 The Maenads cut down the tree, and Pentheus, taken for a wild animal, was torn to pieces by them in their frenzy, his own mother being the first to hurl herself upon him Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 662 The felling of the tree has the phallic meaning of castration, along with its maternal significance of "bearing" Pentheusthemes all present in the Attis-Cybele myth Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 662 The myth of Gayomart repeats in modified form the primitive "closed circle" of a self-reproducing masculine and feminine divinity Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 662 Gayomart was created together with his ox, and the two lived in a state of bliss for six thousand years. But when the world entered the Aeon of Libra (the seventh zodiacal sign), the evil principle broke loose Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 662 In astrology, Libra is known as the "Positive House" of Venus, so the evil principle came under the dominion of the goddess of love, who personifies the erotic aspect of the mother. Since this aspect, as we have seen, is psychologically extremely dangerous, the classical catastrophe threatened to overtake the son Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 662 As a result of this constellation, Gayomart and his ox died only thirty years later. (The trials of Zarathustra also lasted for thirty years) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 662 Fifty-five species of grain and twelve kinds of healing plants came from the dead ox. His seed entered into the moon for purification, but the seed of Gayomart entered into the sun Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 662 The hearth spirit is called Chi. He is dressed in bright red, resembling fire, and in appearance is like a lovely, attractive maiden" Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 663 The Book of Rites says: "Wood is burnt in the flames for the Au spirit. This sacrifice to Au is a sacrifice to the old women who are dead" Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 663 These hearth and fire spirits are the souls of departed cooks and are therefore referred to as "old women" Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 663 The god of kitchens grew out of this pre-Buddhistic tradition and later, as a man, became the ruler of the family and the link between it and heaven. In this way the original female fire-spirit became a sort of Logos and mediator Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 66 The annual sacrifice of a maiden to the dragon is perhaps the ideal sacrifice on a mythological level. In order to mollify the wrath of the Terrible Mother the most beautiful girl was sacrificed as a symbol of man's concupiscence Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 671 Milder forms were the sacrifice of the first-born and of various domestic animals Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 671 The alternative ideal is self-castration, of which a milder form is circumcision. Here at least only a modicum is sacrificed, which amounts to replacing the sacrifice by a symbolical act Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 671 By sacrificing these valued objects of desire and possession, the instinctive desire, or libido is given up in order that it may be regained in new form. Through sacrifice, man ransoms himself from the fear of death and is reconciled to the demands of Hades Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 671 In the late cults in olden times the hero conquered evil and death through his labors, thus becoming the divine protagonist, the priestly self-sacrificer and renewer of life. Since he is now a divine figure and his sacrifice is a transcendental mystery whose meaning far exceeds the value of an ordinary sacrificial gift, this deepening of the sacrificial symbolism is a reversion to the old idea of human sacrifice, because a stronger and more total expression is needed to portray the idea of self-sacrifice Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 671 The relation of Mithras to his bull comes very close to this idea of self-sacrifice. In Christianity it is the hero himself who dies of his own free will Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 671 On the Mithraic monuments we often come across a strange symbol: a krater (mixing-bowl) with a snake coiled round it, and a lion facing the snake like an antagonist (fig. 258.63b). It looks as if they were fighting for the krater. The krater symbolizes the maternal vessel of rebirth, the snake fear and resistance, and the lion raging desire Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 671 The snake almost always assists at the bull-sacrifice by gliding towards the blood flowing from the wound. It seems to follow from this that the bull's lifeits blood is offered to the snake, that it is a sacrificial offering to the powers of the underworld, like the blood drunk by the shades in the nekyia of Odysseus Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 671 We have already seen pointed out the reciprocal relationship between bull and snake, and we saw that the bull symbolizes the living hero, whereas the snake symbolizes the dead, buried, chthonic hero. But as the dead hero is back in the mother, the snake also stands for the devouring mother. The combination of the bull's blood and the snake therefore looks like a union of opposites, and the lion and snake fighting for the krater may mean the same thing. This is probably the cause of the miraculous fertility that results from the sacrifice of the bull Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 671 Even on the primitive level, among the Australian blackfellows, we meet with the idea that the life-force wears out, turns "bad" or gets lost, and must therefore be renewed at regular intervals. Whenever such an abaissement occurs the rites of renewal must be performed Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 671 There is an infinite number of these rites, but even on a much higher level they retain their original meaning. Thus the Mithraic killing of the bull is a sacrifice to the Terrible Mother, to the unconscious, which spontaneously attracts energy from the conscious mind because it has strayed too far from its roots, forgetting the power of the gods, without whom all life withers or ends catastrophically in a welter of perversity Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 671 In the act of sacrifice the consciousness gives up its power and possessions in the interests of the unconscious. This makes possible a union of opposites resulting in a release of energy Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 671 At the same time the act of sacrifice is a fertilization of the mother: the chthonic serpent-demon drinks the blood, i.e., the soul, of the hero. In this way life becomes immortal, for, like the sun, the hero regenerates himself by his self-sacrifice and re-entry into the mother Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 671 After all this we should have no difficulty in recognizing the son's sacrifice to the mother in the Christian mystery. Just as Attis unmans himself for the sake of his mother and his effigy was hung on the pine-tree in memory of this deed, so Christ hangs on the tree of life, on the wood of martyrdom, the and mother (fig. 258.36), and ransoms creation from death Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 671 By entering again into the womb of the mother, he pays in death for the sin which the Protanthropos Adam committed in life, and by that deed he regenerates on a spiritual level the life which was corrupted by original sin Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 671 St. Augustine as we have already remarked, actually interprets Christ's death as a hierosgamos with the mother, similar to the feast of Adonis, where Venus and Adonis were laid upon the bridal couch Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 671 In another version his chains were drawn through a pillar. He suffered as a punishment the fate that Christ took upon himself willingly Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 671 The fate of Prometheus is therefore reminiscent of the misfortune that befell Theseus and Peirithous, who grew fast to the rocks, the chthonic mother Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 671 According to Athenaeus, Jupiter, on setting Prometheus free again, commanded him to wear a willow crown and an iron ring, thus symbolizing his captivity and bondage Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 671 Robertson (Christ and Krishna p. 397) compares the crown of Prometheus to Christ's crown of thorns. The devout wear crowns in honor of Prometheus, in order to represent his bondage. In this connection, therefore, the crown has the same meaning as the betrothal ring: the worshippers are captives of the god' Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 671 The snake symbolizes the numen of the transformative act as well as the transformative substance itself, as is particularly clear in alchemy Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 676 As the chthonic dweller in the cave she [the snake] lives in the womb of mother earth, like the Kundalini serpent who lies coiled in the abdominal cavity, at the base of the spine Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 676 Alchemy has the legend of Gabricus and Beya, the royal brother-sister pair. During the hierosgamos, Gabricus gets right inside the body of his sister and disappears completely; he is buried in her womb, where, dissolved into atoms, he changes into the soul-snake, the serpens mercurialis (fig. 006) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 676 Such fantasies are not uncommon among patients. Thus one patient of mine had the fantasy that she was a snake which wound itself round her mother and finally crawled right into her Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 676 The snake that killed the hero [Hiawatha] is green. So was the snake of another patient, who said: "Then a little green snake came up to my mouth, it had the finest, loveliest feeling as if it had human reason and wanted to tell me something just as if it wanted to kiss me." The significance of the snake as an instrument of regeneration is unmistakable (fig. 037) Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 677 He does not live in a house like other men, does not eat and drink like other men, but lives a life of his own, sunk in a subjective mania of his own devising, which he believes to be the newly discovered truth Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 0 This plaything of his reason never grips his vitals. It may occasionally lie heavy on his stomach, for that organ is apt to reject the products of reason as indigestible Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 0 The psyche is not of today; its ancestry goes back many millions of years. Individual consciousness is only the flower and the fruit of a season, sprung from the perennial rhizome beneath the earth; and it would find itself in better accord with the truth if it took the existence of the rhizome into its calculations. For the root matter is the mother of all things Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 0 So I suspected that myth had a meaning which I was sure to miss if I lived outside it in the haze of my own speculations. I was driven to ask myself in all seriousness: "What is the myth you are living?" Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 0 I found no answer to this question and had to admit that I was not living with a myth, or even in a myth, but rather in an uncertain cloud of theoretical possibilities which I was beginning to regard with increasing distrust. I did not know that I was living a myth, and even if I had known it, I would not have known what sort of myth was ordering my life without my knowledge Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 0 So, in the most natural way, I took it upon myself to get to know "my" myth, and I regarded this as the task of tasks, for so I told myself how could I, when treating my patients, make do allowance for the personal factor, for my personal equation, which is yet so necessary for a knowledge of the other person, if I was unconscious of it? I simply had to know what unconscious or preconscious myth was forming me, from what rhizome I sprang Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 0 Whether we believe in God or not, whether we marvel or curse, the word "God" is always on our lips Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 98 Anything psychically powerful is invariably called "God." At the same time "God" is set over against man and expressly set apart from him Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 98 This means, psychologically, that the libido, regarded as the force of desire and aspiration, as psychic energy in the widest sense, stands in part at the disposal of the ego, and in part confronts the ego autonomously, sometimes influencing it so powerfully that it is either put in a position of unwilling constraint, or else discovers in the libido itself a new and unexpected source of strength Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 98 Dreams seem to remain spontaneously in the memory for just so long as they correctly sum up the psychological situation of the individual Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 78 We know that Tom Thumbs, dactyls, and Cabiri… are personifications of creative forces… Thus the creative dwarfs toil away in secret; the phallus also working in darkness, begets a living being" Carl Jung, CW 5, para. 180 Nietzsche says [paraphrase]: Dreams carry us back to remote conditions of human culture and give us a ready means of understanding them better. They come to us now so easily because of having been drilled into man for immense periods of time and now serve as a recreation for the brain which by day has to satisfy the stern demands of thought imposed by a higher culture Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 27 Green, the life-colour, suits her [the anima] very well … Carl Jung, CW 5, Para 678 … the feminine belongs to man as his own unconscious femininity, which I have called the

Carl Jung: *CW 6 “Psychological Types”

The more "eternal" a truth, the more lifeless it is and worthless; it says nothing more to us because it is self-evident. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 87 So long as a symbol is a living thing, it is an expression for something that cannot be characterized in any other or better way. The symbol is alive only so long as it is pregnant with meaning. But once its meaning has been born out of it, once that expression is found which formulates the thing sought, expected, or divined even better than the hitherto accepted symbol, then the symbol is dead, i.e., it possesses only an historical significance. We may still go on speaking of it as a symbol, on the tacit assumption that we are speaking of it as it was before the better expression was born out of it. [...] For every esoteric interpretation the symbol is dead, because esotericism has already given it (at least ostensibly) a better expression, whereupon it becomes merely a conventional sign for associations that are more completely and better known elsewhere. Only from the exoteric standpoint is the symbol a living thing. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 806 That indeed is reality if it is not a reality in ourselves, an esse in anima? Living reality is the product neither of the actual, objective behaviour of things nor of the formulated idea exclusively, but rather of the combination of both …through esse in anima. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 77 His [Prometheus’s] soul is Minerva … The Prometheus of mythology has his soul-relation with Pandora or Athene. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 289 … Pandora has the value of a soul-image … Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 305 This latter analogy [between god and natural phenomenon] explains the well-attested connection between the renewal of the god and seasonal and vegetational phenomena. One is naturally inclined to assume that seasonal, vegetational, lunar, and solar myths underlie these analogies. But that is to forget that a myth, like everything psychic, cannot be solely conditioned by external events. Anything psychic brings its own internal conditions with it, so that one might assert with equal right that the myth is purely psychological and uses meteorological or astronomical events merely as a means of expression. The whimsicality and absurdity of many primitive myths often makes the latter explanation seem far more appropriate than any other. Carl Jung, CW 6, Page 325 Against this extreme concretization of a symbol Ratramnus, a monk of the same monastery where Radbertus was abbot, ventured to raise some opposition. Carl Jung, CW 6 Para 36 This being so, it seems safer to proceed from outside inwards, from the known to the unknown, from the body to the psyche. Thus all attempts at characterology have started from the outside world; astrology, in ancient times, even started from interstellar space in order to arrive at those lines of fate whose beginnings lie in the human heart. To the same class of interpretations from outward signs belong palmistry, Gall’s phrenology, Lavater’s physiognomy, and – more recently – graphology, Kretschmer’s physiological types, and Rorschach’s klexographic method. As we can see, there are any number of paths leading from outside inwards, from the physical to the psychic, and it is necessary that research should follow this direction until the elementary psychic facts are established with sufficient certainty. But once having established these facts, we can reverse the procedure. We can then put the question: What are the bodily correlatives of a given psychic condition? Unfortunately we are not yet far enough advanced to give even an approximate answer. The first requirement is to establish the primary facts of psychic life, and this is far from having been accomplished. Indeed, we have only just begun the work of compiling an inventory of the psyche, not always with great success. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 917 This historical retrospect may serve to assure us that our modern attempts to formulate a theory of types are by no means new and unprecedented, even though our scientific conscience does not permit us to revert to these old, intuitive ways of thinking. We must find our own answer to this problem, an answer which satisfies the need of science. And here we meet the chief difficulty of the problem of types – that is, the question of standards or criteria. The astrological criterion was simple and objective: it was given by the constellations at birth. As to the way characterological qualities could be correlated with the zodiacal signs and the planets, this is a question which reaches back into the grey mists of prehistory and remains unanswerable. The Greek classification according to the four physiological temperaments took as its criteria the appearance and behaviour of the individual, exactly as we do today in the case of physiological typology. But where shall we seek our criterion for a psychological theory of types? Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 934 However, Radbertus found a more resolute opponent in Scotus Erigena, one of the great philosophers and daring thinkers of the early Middle Ages for whom true philosophy was also true religion, was no blind follower of authority and the "once accepted" because, unlike the majority of his age, he himself could think. He set reason above authority, very unseasonably perhaps but in a way that assured him the acclaim of later centuries. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 36 Thus he also held that the Communion was nothing more than a commemoration of that last supper which Jesus celebrated with his disciples, a view in which all reasonable men in every age will concur. Carl Jung, CW 6 Para 36 In this controversy we can easily recognize the basic elements: the abstract standpoint that abhors any contamination with the concrete object, and the concretistic that is turned towards the object. Carl Jung, CW 6 Para 37 It must not be overlooked, for instance, that it is precisely the belief in the reality of this miracle [of transubstantiation] that demands a detachment of the psychic process from the purely sensual, and this cannot remain without influence on the psychic process itself. Carl Jung, CW 6 Para 38 Directed thinking becomes absolutely impossible when the sensual has too high a threshold value. Because the sensual value is too high it constantly intrudes into the psyche, where it disrupts and destroys the function of directed thinking which is based on the exclusion of everything incompatible with thought. Carl Jung, CW 6 Para 38 What we may learn from this example is that the thinking of the introvert is incommensurable with the thinking of the extravert, since the two forms of thinking, as regards their determinant, are wholly and fundamentally different. We might perhaps say that the thinking of the introvert is rational, while that of the extravert is programmatic Carl Jung, CW 6 Para 38 This childlike attitude necessarily brings with it another guiding principle in place of self-will and rational intentions, as overwhelmingly powerful in effect as it is divine. Since it is of an irrational nature, the new guiding principle appears in miraculous form: For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given; and the government shall be on his shoulder; and his shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The mighty God, The everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace (Isaiah 9:6) These honorific titles reproduce the essential qualities of the redeeming symbol. Its "divine" effect comes from the irresistible dynamis of the unconscious. The saviour is always a figure endowed with magical power who makes the impossible possible. The symbol is the middle way along which the opposites flow together in a new movement, like a watercourse bringing fertility after a long drought. The tension that precedes solution is likened in Isaiah to pregnancy Carl Jung, CW 6 Para 442-443 Dissimilation is a condition where the empathetic type is assimilated to the object, although it feels as if the object were assimilated to him. But whenever the value of the object is emphasized, it at once assumes an importance which in its turn influences the subject, forcing him to a "dissimilation" from himself. Carl Jung, CW 6 Para 531 Identification with the love-object plays no small role in analytical psychology, and the psychology of primitives swarms with examples of dissimilation in favour of the totem animal or ancestral spirit. The stigmatization of saints in medieval and even in recent times is a similar phenomenon. In the imitatio Christi [imitation of Christ] dissimilation is exalted into a principle. Carl Jung, CW 6 Para 531 A fantasm is an idee-force. Fantasy as imaginative activity is identical with the flow of psychic energy. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 722 But the complicated outer conditions under which we live, and the even more complicated conditions of our individual psychic make-up seldom permit a completely undisturbed flow of psychic energy. Carl Jung, CW 6, Paras 6-7 People may then discover thoughts in their mind they don't even agree with. Passive fantasy is always in need of self-reflective, critical evaluation from the conscious everyday standpoint. Active fantasy does not require criticism: rather, the symbolic material needs to be understood Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 714 Before [individuation] can be taken as a goal, the educational aim of adaptation to the necessary minimum of collective norms must first be attained. If a plant is to unfold its specific nature to the full, it must first be able to grow in the soil in which it is planted. Carl Jung; CW 6, par. 761. As a rule, whenever such a falsification of type takes place the individual becomes neurotic later and can be cured only by developing the attitude consonant with his nature. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 560. Poets create from the very depths of the collective unconscious, voicing aloud what others only dream. Carl Jung; CW 6, Page 323. The will is a psychological phenomenon that owes its existence to culture and moral education but is largely lacking in the primitive mentality. Carl Jung, CW 6, para 844. We find in Gnosticism what was lacking in the centuries that followed: a belief in the efficacy of individual revelation and individual knowledge. This belief was rooted in the proud feeling of man's affinity with the gods. Carl Jung, CW 6, Page 242. Like any archetype, the essential nature of the self is unknowable, but its manifestations are the content of myth and legend. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 790. The creation of something new is not accomplished by the intellect, creative mind plays with the object it loves. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 197. Everyone whose attitude is introverted thinks, feels, and acts in a way that clearly demonstrates that the subject is the prime motivating factor and that the object is of secondary importance. Carl Jung, CW 6, Par 769. By psyche I understand the totality of all psychic processes, conscious as well as unconscious. By soul, on the other hand, I understand a clearly demarcated functional complex that can best be described as a "personality." Carl Jung; CW 6, par. 797 Intuition is not mere perception, or vision, but an active, creative process that puts into the object just as much as it takes out. Carl Jung, CW 6, para 610. Passive fantasy [...] is always in need of conscious criticism [...] whereas active fantasy [„,] does not require criticism so much as understanding. Carl Jung, CW 6, Par. 714. If he is intent only on the outer reality, he must live his myth; if he is turned only towards the inner reality, he must dream his outer, so-called real life. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 280 The psychology of an individual can never be exhaustively explained from himself alone: a clear recognition is needed of the way it is also conditioned by historical and environmental circumstances. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 717 This function of mediation between the opposites I have termed the transcendent function, by which I mean nothing mysterious, but merely a combined function of conscious and unconscious elements, or, as in mathematics, a common function of real and imaginary qualities. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 184 Symbol-formation, therefore, must obviously be an extremely important biological function. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 402 Childlikeness or lack of prior assumptions is of the very essence of the symbol and its function. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 442 If the old were not ripe for death, nothing new would appear; and if the old were not injuriously blocking the way for the new; it could not and need not be rooted out. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 446. The creation of a symbol is not a rational process, for a rational process could never produce an image that represents a content which is at bottom incomprehensible. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 425 The Symbol always says; in some such form as this a new manifestation of life will become possible, a release from bondage and world-weariness. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 425. The redeeming symbol is a highway, a way upon which life can move forward without torment and compulsion. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 445. For as the son of his father, he must, as if often the case with children, re-enact under unconscious compulsion the unlived lives of his parents. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 307 It is not the purpose of a psychological typology to classify human beings into categories—this in itself would be pretty pointless. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 986 As the individual is not just a single, separate being, but by his very existence presupposes a collec- tive relationship, it follows that the process of individuation must lead to more intense and broader collective relationships and not to isolation. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 758 Christianity, like every closed system of religion, has an undoubted tendency to suppress the unconscious in the individual as much as possible, thus paralyzing his fantasy activity. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 80 Wherever we can observe a religion being born, we see how the doctrinal figures flow into the founder himself as revelations, in other words, as concretizations of his unconscious fantasy. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 80 The renewed God signifies a regenerated attitude, a renewed possibility of life, a recovery of vitality, because, psychologically speaking, God always denotes the highest value, the maximum sum of libido, the fullest intensity of life, the optimum of psychological vitality. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 301 We should not pretend to understand the world only by the intellect; we apprehend it just as much by feeling. Therefore the judgment of the intellect is, at best, only a half-truth, and must, if it be honest, also admit its inadequacy. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 856 Doubtless there are exceptional people who are able to sacrifice their entire life to a particular formula; but for most of us such exclusiveness is impossible in the long run. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 587 Everything old in our unconscious hints at something coming. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 630 A man's hatred is always concentrated on the thing that makes him conscious of his bad qualities. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 453 A fact never exists only as it is in itself, but also as we see it. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 510 Not the artist alone, but every creative individual whatsoever owes all that is greatest in his life to fantasy. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 93 Purposively interpreted, it seems like a symbol, seeking to characterize a definite goal with the help of the material at hand, or trace out a line of future psychological development. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 758 The idea wants changelessness and eternity. Whoever lives under the supremacy of the idea strives for permanence; hence everything that pushes towards change must be opposed to the idea. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 153 The demand that he should see only objectively is quite out of the question, for it is impossible. We must be satisfied if he does not see too subjectively. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 9 It should not be forgotten that science is not the summa of life, that it is actually only one of the psychological attitudes, only one of the forms of human thought. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 60 In any age the vast majority of men are called upon to preserve and praise the status quo, thus helping to bring about the disastrous consequences which the prescience of the creative spirit had sought to avert. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 434 To be adapted is certainly an ideal, but adaptation is not always possible. There are situations in which the only adaptation is patient endurance. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 427 It is, pre-eminently, the creative activity from which the answers to all answerable questions come; it is the mother of all possibilities, where, like all psychological opposites, the inner and outer worlds are joined together in living union. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 78 It should be someone already has a much-clouded vision or view of a very hazy distance, the human society, if he thinks that by uniform regulation of life an equal distribution of happiness could be achieved. Carl Jung; CW 6. The concept of the unconscious is for me an exclusively psychological concept, and not a philosophical concept of a metaphysical nature. In my view the unconscious is a psychological borderline concept, which covers all psychic contents or processes that are not conscious, i.e., not related to the ego in any perceptible way. My justification for speaking of the existence of unconscious processes at all is derived simply and solely from experience. Carl Jung, CW 6, para 837. It is just the beam in one's own eye that enables one to detect the mote in one's brother's eye. The beam in one's own eye does not prove that one's brother has no mote in his. But the impairment of one's own vision might easily give rise to a general theory that all motes are beams. The recognition and taking to heart of the subjective determination of knowledge in general, and of psychological knowledge in particular, are basic conditions for the scientific and impartial evaluation of a psyche different from that of the observing subject. These conditions are fulfilled only when the observer is sufficiently informed about the nature and scope of his own personality. He can, however, be sufficiently informed only when he has in large measure freed himself from the levelling influence of collective opinions and thereby arrived at a clear conception of his own individuality. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 10 Reason can give a man equilibrium only if his reason is already an equilibrating organ. But for how many individuals and at what periods in history has it been that? As a rule, a man needs the opposite of his actual situation to force him to find his place in the middle. For the sake of mere reason he can never forgo life's riches and the sensuous appeal of the immediate situation. Against the power and delight of the temporal he must set the joy of the eternal, and against the passion of the sensual the ecstasy of the spiritual. The undeniable reality of the one must be matched by the compelling power of the other. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 386 SOUL. [psyche, personality, persona, anima,] I have been compelled, in my investigations into the structure of the unconscious, to make a conceptual distinction between soul and psyche. By psyche I understand the totality of all psychic processes, conscious as well as unconscious. By soul, on the other hand, I understand a clearly demarcated functional complex that can best be described as a "personality." In order to make clear what I mean by this, I must introduce some further points of view. It is, in particular, the phenomena of somnambulism, double consciousness, split personality, etc., whose investigation we owe primarily to the French school, that have enabled us to accept the possibility of a plurality of personalities in one and the same individual. Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 797 The symbol is always a product of an extremely complex nature, since data from every psychic function have gone into its making. It is, therefore, neither rational nor irrational (qq.v.). It certainly has a side that accords with reason, but it has another side that does not; for it is composed not 'only of rational but also of irrational data supplied by pure inner and outer perception. The profundity and pregnant significance of the symbol appeal just as strongly to thinking as to feeling (qq.v.), while its peculiar plastic imagery, when shaped into sensuous form, stimulates sensation as much as intuition (qq.v.). The living symbol cannot come to birth in a dull or poorly developed mind, for such a mind will be content with the already existing symbols offered by established tradition. Only the passionate yearning of a highly developed mind, for which the traditional symbol is no longer the unified expression of the rational and the irrational, of the highest and the lowest, can create a new symbol. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 825 The birth of a saviour is equivalent to a great catastrophe, because a new and powerful life springs up just where there had seemed to be no life and no power and no possibility of further development. It comes streaming out of the unconscious, from that unknown part of the psyche which is treated as nothing by all rationalists. From this discredited and rejected region comes the new afflux of energy, the renewal of life. But what is this discredited and rejected source of vitality? It consists of all those psychic contents that were repressed because of their incompatibility with conscious values—everything hateful, immoral, wrong, unsuitable, useless, etc., which means everything that at one time or another appeared so to the individual concerned. The danger is that when these things reappear in a new and wonderful guise, they may make such an impact on him that he will forget or repudiate all his former values. What he once despised now becomes the supreme principle, and what was once truth now becomes error. This reversal of values amounts to the destruction of the old ones and is similar to the devastation of a country by floods. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 449 The ways and customs of childhood, once so sublimely good, can hardly be laid aside even when their harmful-ness has long since been proved. The same, only on a gigantic scale, is true of historical changes of attitude. A collective attitude is equivalent to a religion, and changes of religion constitute one of the most painful chapters in the world's history. In this respect our age is afflicted with a blindness that has no parallel. We think we have only to declare an accepted article of faith incorrect and invalid, and we shall be psychologically rid of all the traditional effects of Christianity or Judaism. We believe in enlightenment, as if an intellec- tual change somehow had a profounder influence on the emotional processes or even on the unconscious. We entirely forget that the religion of the last two thousand years is a psychological attitude, a definite form and manner of adaptation to the world without and within, that lays down a definite cultural pattern and creates an atmosphere which remains wholly uninfluenced by any intellectual denials. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 313 Between the religion of a people and its actual mode of life there is always a compensatory relation, otherwise religion would have no practical significance at all. Beginning with the highly moral religion of the Persians and the notorious dubiousness—even in antiquity—of Persian habits of life, right down to our "Christian" epoch, when the religion of love assisted at the greatest blood-bath in the world's history—wherever we turn this rule holds true. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 229 In the same measure as the conscious attitude may pride itself on a certain godlikeness by reason of its lofty and absolute standpoint, an unconscious attitude develops with a godlikeness oriented downwards to an archaic god whose nature is sensual and brutal. The enantiodromia of Heraclitus ensures that the time will come when this deus ahsconditus shall rise to the surface and press the God of our ideals to the wall. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 150 Reason must always seek the solution in some rational, consistent, logical way, which is certainly justifiable enough in all normal situations but is entirely inadequate when it comes to the really great and decisive questions. It is incapable of creating the symbol because the symbol is irrational. When the rational way proves to be a cul de sac—as it always does after a time—the solution comes from the side it was least expected. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 438 Faced with the bewildering profusion of animated objects, we create an abstraction, an abstract universal image which conjures the welter of impressions into a fixed form. This image has the magical significance of a defence against the chaotic flux of experience. The abstracting type becomes so lost and submerged in this image that finally its abstract truth is set above the reality of life; and because life might disturb the enjoyment of abstract beauty, it gets completely suppressed. He turns himself into an abstraction, he identifies with the eternal validity of the image and petrifies in it, because for him it has become a redeeming formula. He divests himself of his real self and puts his whole life into his abstraction, in which he is, so to speak, crystallized. The empathetic type suffers a similar fate. Since his activity, his life is empathized into the object, he himself gets into the object because the empathized content is an essential part of himself. He becomes the object; he identifies with it and in this way gets outside himself. By turning himself into an object he desubjectifies himself. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 499 The tasks of every age differ, and it is only in retrospect that we can discern with certainty what had to be and what should not have been. In the momentary present the conflict of opinions will always rage, for "war is the father of all." History alone decides the issue. Truth is not eternal —it is a programme to be fulfilled. The more "eternal" a truth, the more lifeless it is and worthless; it says nothing more to us because it is self-evident. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 87 The world exists not merely in itself but also as it appears to me. Indeed, at bottom, we have absolutely no criterion that could help us to form a judgment of a world which was unassimilable by the subject. If we were to ignore the subjective factor, it would be a complete denial of the great doubt as to the possibility of absolute cognition. And this would mean a relapse into the stale and hollow positivism that marred the turn of the century—an attitude of intellectual arrogance accompanied by crudeness of feeling; a violation of life as stupid as it is presumptuous. By overvaluing our capacity for objective cognition we repress the importance of the subjective factor, which simply means a denial of the subject. But what is the subject. The subject is man himself—we are the subject. Only a sick mind could forget that cognition must have a subject, and that there is no knowledge whatever and no world at all unless "I know" has been said, though with this statement one has already expressed the subjective limitation of all knowledge. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 621 Man is not a machine that can be remodeled for quite other purposes as occasion demands, in the hope that it will go on functioning as regularly as before but in a quite different way. He carries his whole history with him; in his very structure is written the history of mankind. The historical element in man represents a vital need to which a wise psychic economy must respond. Somehow the past must come alive and participate in the present. Total assimilation to the object will always arouse the protest of the suppressed minority of those elements that belong to the past and have existed from the very beginning. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 570 Certainly strife and misunderstanding will always be among the props of the tragi-comedy of human existence, but it is none the less undeniable that the advance of civilization has led from the law of the jungle to the establishment of courts of justice and standards of right and wrong which are above the contending parties. It is my conviction that a basis for the settlement of conflicting views would be found in the recognition of different types of attitude — a recognition not only of the existence of such types, but also of the fact that every man is so imprisoned in his type that he is simply incapable of fully understanding another standpoint. Failing a recognition of this exacting demand, a violation of the other standpoint is practically inevitable. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 847 Because we are still such barbarians, any trust in the laws of human nature seems to us a dangerous and unethical naturalism. Why is this? Because under the barbarian's thin veneer of culture the wild beast lurks in readiness, amply justifying his fear. But the beast is not tamed by locking it up in a cage. There is no morality without freedom. When the barbarian lets loose the beast within him, that is not freedom but bondage. Barbarism must first be vanquished before freedom can be won. This happens, in principle, when the basic root and driving force of morality are felt by the individual as constituents of his own nature and not as external restrictions. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 357 Science as an end in itself is assuredly a high ideal, yet its consistent fulfilment brings about as many "ends in themselves" as there are sciences and arts. Naturally this leads to a high differentiation and specialization of the particular functions concerned, but also to their detachment from the world and from life, as well as to a multiplication of specialized fields which gradually lose all connection with one another. The result is an impoverishment and desiccation not merely in the specialized fields but also in the psyche of every man who has differentiated himself up or sunk down to the specialist level. Science must prove her value for life; it is not enough that she be the mistress, she must also be the maid. By so serving she in no way dishonors herself. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 84 If psychology remains for us only a science, we do not penetrate into life—we merely serve the absolute aim of science. It leads us, certainly, to a knowledge of the objective situation, but it always opposes every other aim but its own. The intellect remains imprisoned in itself just so long as it does not willingly sacrifice its supremacy by acknowledging the value of other aims. It shrinks from the step which takes it out of itself and which denies its universal validity, since from the standpoint of the intellect everything else is nothing but fantasy. But what great thing ever came into existence that was not first fantasy? Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 86 A child certainly allows himself to be impressed by the grand talk of his parents, but do they really imagine he is educated by it? Actually it is the parents' lives that educate the child—what they add by word and gesture at best serves only to confuse him. The same holds good for the teacher. But we have such a belief in method that, if only the method be good, the practice of it seems to sanctify the teacher. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 665 An inferior man is never a good teacher. But he can conceal his pernicious inferiority, which secretly poisons the pupil, behind an excellent method or an equally brilliant gift of gab. Naturally the pupil of riper years desires nothing better than the knowledge of useful methods, because he is already defeated by the general attitude, which believes in the all-conquering method. He has learnt that the emptiest head, correctly echoing a method, is the best pupil. His whole environment is an optical demonstration that all success and all happiness are outside, and that only the right method is needed to attain the haven of one's desires. Or does, perchance, the life of his religious instructor demonstrate the happiness which radiates from the treasure of the inner vision? Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 665 Aestheticism is not fitted to solve the exceedingly serious and difficult task of educating man, for it always presupposes the very thing it should create—the capacity to love beauty. It actually hinders a deeper investigation of the problem, because it always averts its face from anything evil, ugly, and difficult, and aims at pleasure, even though it be of an edifying kind. Aestheticism therefore lacks all moral force, because au fond it is still only a refined hedonism. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 194 Both these necessities exist in ourselves nature and culture. We cannot only be ourselves; we must also be related to others. Hence a way must be found that is not a mere rational compromise; it must be a state or process that is wholly consonant with the living being, "a highway and a holy way," as the prophet says, "a straight way, so that fools shall not err therein" (Isaiah 35:8). Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 135 Conscious capacity for one-sidedness is a sign of the highest culture, but involuntary one-sidedness, i.e., inability to be anything but one-sided, is a sign of barbarism. Hence the most one-sided differentiations are found among semi-barbarians—for instance, certain aspects of Christian asceticism that are an affront to good taste, and parallel phenomena among the yogis and Tibetan Buddhists. For the barbarian, this tendency to fall a victim to one-sidedness in one way or another, thus losing sight of his total personality, is a great and constant danger. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 346 No culture is ever really complete, for it always swings more towards one side or the other. Sometimes the cultural idea is extraverted, and then the chief value lies with the object and man's relation to it; sometimes it is introverted, and then the chief value lies with the subject and his relation to the idea. In the former case, culture takes on a collective character, in the latter an individual one. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 110 We obviously need both civilization and culture. We cannot create one without the other, and we must admit, unfortunately, that modern humanity lacks both. Where there is too much of the one there is too little of the other, if we want to put it more cautiously. The continual harping on progress has by now become rather suspect. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 477 The ideal and aim of science do not consist in giving the most exact possible description of the facts—science cannot compete as a recording instrument with the camera and the gramophone—but in establishing certain laws, which are merely abbreviated expressions for many diverse processes that are yet conceived to be somehow correlated. This aim goes beyond the purely empirical realm by means of the concept, which, though it may have general and proved validity, will always be a product of the subjective psychological constellation of the investigator. In the making of scientific theories and concepts many personal and accidental factors are involved. There is also a personal equation that is psychological and not merely psychophysical. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 9 Since [in the Middle Ages] the psychic relation to woman was expressed in the collective worship of Mary, the image of woman lost a value to which human beings had a natural right. This value could find its natural expression only through individual choice, and it sank into the unconscious when the individual form of expression was replaced by a collective one. In the unconscious the image of woman received an energy charge that activated the archaic and infantile dominants. And since all unconscious contents, when activated by dissociated libido, are projected upon the external object, the devaluation of the real woman was compensated by daemonic features. She no longer appeared as an object of love, but as a persecutor or witch. The consequence of increasing Mariolatry was the witch hunt, that indelible blot on the later Middle Ages. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 399 Whereas logic and objectivity are usually the predominant features of a man's outer attitude, or are at least regarded as ideals, in the case of a woman it is feeling. But in the soul it is the other way round inwardly it is the man who feels, and the woman who reflects. Hence a man's greater liability to total despair, while a woman can always find comfort and hope; accordingly a man is more likely to put an end to himself than a woman. However much a victim of social circumstances a woman may be, as a prostitute for instance, a man is no less a victim of impulses from the unconscious, taking the form of alcoholism and other vices. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 805 Again, no psychological fact can ever be exhaustively explained in terms of causality alone; as a living phenomenon, it is always indissolubly bound up with the continuity of the vital process, so that it is not only something evolved but also continually evolving and creative. Anything psychic is Janus-faced it looks both backwards and forwards. Because it is evolving, it is also preparing the future. Were this not so, intentions, aims, plans, calculations, predictions, and premonitions would be psychological impossibilities. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 718 The psychological investigator is always finding himself obliged to make extensive use of an indirect method of description in order to present the reality he has observed. Only in so far as elementary facts are communicated which are amenable to quantitative measurement can there be any question of a direct presentation. But how much of the actual psychology of man can be experienced and observed as quantitatively measurable facts? Carl Jung, CW 6; Para 672 Reverence for the great mysteries of nature, which the language of religion seeks to express in symbols hallowed by their antiquity, profound significance, and beauty, will not suffer from the extension of psychology to this domain, to which science has hitherto found no access. We only shift the symbols back a little, shedding a little light on their darker reaches, but without succumbing to the erroneous notion that we have created more than merely a new symbol for the same enigma that perplexed all ages before us. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 428 A symbol loses its magical or, if you prefer, its redeeming power as soon as its liability to dissolve is recognized. To be effective, a symbol must be by its very nature unassailable. It must be the best possible expression of the prevailing worldview, an unsurpassed container of meaning; it must also be sufficiently remote from comprehension to resist all attempts of the critical intellect to break it down; and finally, its aesthetic form must appeal so convincingly to our feelings that no arguments can be raised against it on that score. Carl Jung CW 6, Para 401 Do we ever understand what we think? We only understand that kind of thinking, which is a mere equation, from which nothing comes out but what we have put in. That is the working of the intellect. But besides that there is a thinking in primordial images, in symbols which are older than the historical man, which are inborn in him from the earliest times, and, eternally living, outlasting all generations, still make up the groundwork of the human psyche. As we can see from the example of Faust, the vision of the symbol is a pointer to the onward course of life, beckoning the libido towards a still distant goal—but a goal that henceforth will burn unquenchably within him, so that his life, kindled as by a flame, moves steadily towards the far-off beacon. This is the specific life-promoting significance of the symbol, and such, too, is the meaning and value of religious symbols. I am speaking, of course, not of symbols that are dead and stiffened by dogma, but of living symbols that rise up from the creative unconscious of the living man. The immense significance of such symbols can be denied only by those for whom the history of the world begins with the present day. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 202 There is a deep gulf between what a man is and what he represents, between what he is as an individual and what he is as a collective being. His function is developed at the expense of the individuality. Should he excel, he is merely identical with his collective function; but should he not, then, though he may be highly esteemed as a function in society, his individuality is wholly on the level of his inferior, undeveloped functions, and he is simply a barbarian, while in the former case he has happily deceived himself as to his actual barbarism. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 111 No social legislation will ever be able to overcome the psychological differences between men, this most necessary factor for generating the vital energy of a human society. It may serve a useful purpose, therefore, to speak of the heterogeneity of men. These differences involve such different requirements for happiness that no legislation, however perfect, could afford them even approximate satisfaction. No outward form of life could be devised, however equitable and just it might appear, that would not involve injustice for one or the other human type. That, in spite of this, every kind of enthusiast—political, social, philosoph- ical, and religious—is busily endeavouring to find those uniform external conditions which would bring with them greater opportunities for the happiness of all seems to me connected with a general attitude to life too exclusively. Although it is certainly a fine thing that every man should stand equal before the law, that every man should have his political vote, and that no man, through hereditary social position and privilege, should have unjust advantage over his brother, it is distinctly less fine when the idea of equality is extended to other walks of life. A man must have a very clouded vision, or view human society from a very misty distance, to cherish the notion that the uniform regulation of life would automatically ensure a uniform distribution of happiness. He must be pretty far gone in delusion if he imagines that equality of income, or equal opportunities for all, would have approximately the same value for everyone. But, if he were a legislator, what would he do about all those people whose greatest opportunities lie not without, but within? If he were just, he would have to give at least twice as much money to the one as to the other, since to the one it means much to the other little. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 845 When a problem that is at bottom personal, and therefore apparently subjective, coincides with external events that contain the same psychological elements as the personal conflict, it is suddenly transformed into a general question embracing the whole of society. In this way the personal problem acquires a dignity it lacked hitherto, since a state of inner discord always has something humiliating and degrading about it, so that one sinks into an ignominious condition both without and within, like a state dishonoured by civil war. It is this that makes one shrink from displaying before the public a purely personal conflict, provided of course that one does not suffer from an overdose of self-esteem. But if the connection between the personal problem and the larger contemporary events is discerned and understood, it brings release from the loneliness of the purely personal, and the subjective problem is magnified into a general question of our society. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 119 To establish a really mature attitude, he has to see the subjective value of all these images which seem to create trouble for him. He has to assimilate them into his own psychology; he has to find out in what way they are part of himself; how he attributes for instance a positive value to an object, when as a matter of fact it is he who could and should develop this value. And in the same way, when he projects negative qualities and therefore hates and loathes the object, he has to discover that he is projecting his own inferior side, his shadow, as it were, because he prefers to have an optimistic and one-sided image of himself. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 813. Abstraction is an activity pertaining to the psychological functions in general. There is an abstract thinking, just as there is abstract feeling, sensation, and intuition. Abstract thinking singles out the rational, logical qualities of a given content from its intellectually irrelevant components. Abstract feeling does the same with a content characterized by its feeling-values. Abstract sensation would be aesthetic as opposed to sensuous sensation, and abstract intuition would be symbolic as opposed to fantastic intuition. Carl Jung; CW 6, par. 678. Opposites can be united only in the form of compromise, or irrationally, some new thing arising between them which, though different from both yet has the power to take up their energies in equal measure as an expression of both and of neither. Such an expression cannot be contrived by reason, it can only be created through living. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 169 Out of a playful movement of elements whose interrelations are not immediately apparent, patterns arise which an observant and critical intellect can only evaluate afterwards. The creation of something new is not accomplished by the intellect but by the play instinct acting from inner necessity. The creative mind plays with the objects it loves. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 197 The accumulated libido activates images lying dormant in the collective unconscious, among them the God-image, that engram or imprint which from the beginning of time has been the collective expression of the most overwhelmingly powerful influences exerted on the conscious mind by unconscious concentrations of libido. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 412 The dammed-up instinctual forces in civilized man are immensely destructive and far more dangerous than the instincts of the primitive, who in a modest degree is constantly living out his negative instincts. Consequently no war of the historical past can rival in grandiose horror the wars of civilized nations. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 230 Man is constantly inclined to forget that what was once good does not remain good eternally. He follows the old ways that once were good long after they have become bad and only with the greatest sacrifices and untold suffering can he rid himself of this delusion and see that what was once good is now perhaps grown old and is good no longer. This is so in great things as in small. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 313 Just as the unconscious world of mythological images speaks indirectly, through the experience of external things, to the man who surrenders himself wholly to the outer world, so the real world and its demands find their way indirectly to the man who has surrendered himself wholly to the soul; for no man can escape both realities. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 280 Apotropaic: Descriptive of "magical thinking," based on the desire to depotentiate the influence of an object or person. Apotropaic actions are characteristic of introversion as a mode of psychological orientation. I have seen an introverted child who made his first attempts to walk only after he had learned the names of all the objects in the room he might touch. Carl Jung, CW 6, par. 897. Sensation must be strictly differentiated from feeling, since the latter is an entirely different process, although it may associate itself with sensation as "feeling-tone." Sensation is related not only to external stimuli but to inner ones, i.e., to changes in the internal organic processes. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 792. Nothing is so apt to challenge our self-awareness and alertness as being at war with oneself. One can hardly think of any other or more effective means of waking humanity out of the irresponsible and innocent half-sleep of the primitive mentality and bringing it to a state of conscious responsibility. Carl Jung; CW 6; Page 964. He seizes on new objects or situations with great intensity, sometimes with extraordinary enthusiasm, only to abandon them cold -bloodedly, without any compunction and apparently without remembering them, as soon as their range is known, and no further developments can be divined. So long as a new possibility is in the offing, the intuitive is bound to it with the shackles of fate. (CW 6, par. 613) The intuitive is never to be found in the world of accepted reality values, but he has a keen nose for anything new and in the making. Because he is always seeking out new possibilities, stable conditions suffocate him. Carl Jung, CW 6, para 613 If only he could stay put, he would reap the fruits of his labours; but always he must be running after a new possibility, quitting his newly planted fields while others gather in the harvest. Carl Jung, CW 6, para 615. No matter how reasonable and suitable it may be, and although every conceivable argument speaks for its stability, a day will come when nothing will deter him from regarding as a prison the very situation that seemed to promise him freedom and deliverance, and from acting accordingly. Neither reason nor feeling can restrain him or frighten him away from a new possibility, even though it goes against all his previous convictions. Carl Jung, CW 6, para 613 Since his intuition is concerned with externals and with ferreting out their possibilities, he readily turns to professions in which he can exploit these capacities to the full. Many business tycoons, entrepreneurs, speculators, stockbrokers, politicians, etc., belong to this type. Carl Jung, CW 6, para 613. The extraverted intuitive is continually scenting out new possibilities, which he pursues with equal unconcern for his own welfare and for that of others, pressing on quite heedless of human considerations and tearing down what has just been built in his everlasting search for change. Carl Jung, CW 6, para 658. The intuitive's morality is governed neither by thinking nor by feeling; he has his own characteristic morality, which consists in a loyalty to his vision and in voluntary submission to its authority. 'Carl Jung, CW 6, para 613 His capacity to inspire courage or to kindle enthusiasm for anything new is unrivaled. He brings his vision to life, he presents it convincingly and with dramatic fire, he embodies it, so to speak. But this is not playacting; it is a kind of fate. Carl Jung, CW 6, para 614 He is the natural champion of all minorities with a future. Because he is able, when oriented more to people than things, to make an intuitive diagnosis of their abilities and potentialities, he can also "make" men. Carl Jung, CW 6, para 614 Naturally this attitude holds great dangers, for all too easily the intuitive may fritter away his life on things and people, spreading about him an abundance of life which others live and not he himself. Carl Jung, CW 6, para 615 Conformity is one side of a man, uniqueness is another. Carl Jung, CW 6, Par 895. God is a datum formulated as the "highest good" signifying the supreme psychic value, i.e., a concept endowed with the highest and most general significance in determining our thoughts and actions Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 67. The God-concept coincides with the particular ideational complex which concentrates in itself the maximum amount of libido, or psychic energy Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 67 An idea psychologically different in different people e.g., God is the belly, or money, science, power, sex, etc. a concept varying according to the localization of the highest good Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 67 The organism confronts light with a new structure, the eye, and the psyche confronts the natural process with a symbolic image, which apprehends it in the same way as the eye catches the light. And just as the eye bears witness to the peculiar and spontaneous creative activity of living matter, the primordial image expresses the intrinsic and unconditioned creative power of the psyche. The primordial image is thus a condensation of the living process. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 748 Or as Wang Yang-ming, the Chinese father of Japanese philosophy, says: "In every heart there dwells a sejin (sage). Only, we do not believe it firmly enough, and therefore the whole has remained buried." Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 214-218 Just as conscious as well as unconscious phenomena are to be met with in practice, the self as psychic totality also has a conscious as well as an unconscious aspect. Empirically, the self appears in dreams, myths, and fairy-tales in the figure of the "supraordinate personality" (v. ego), such as a king, hero, prophet, saviour, etc., or in the form of a totality symbol, such as the circle, square, quadratura circuli, cross, etc. When it represents a complexio oppositorum, a union of opposites, it can also appear as a united duality, in the form, for instance, of Tao as the interplay of yang and yin, or of the hostile brothers, or of the hero and his adversary (arch-enemy, dragon), Faust and Mephistopheles, etc. Empirically, therefore, the self appears as a play of light and shadow, although conceived as a totality and unity in which the opposites are united. Since such a concept is irrepresentable — tertium non datur—it is transcendental on this account also. It would, logically considered, be a vain speculation were it not for the fact that it designates symbols of unity that are found to occur empirically. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 790 The brahman concept also contains the concept of rta, right order, the orderly course of …., be a vain speculation were it not for the fact that it designates symbols of unity that are found to occur empirically in the world. In brahman, the creative universal essence and universal Ground, all things come upon the right way, for in it they are eternally dissolved and recreated; all development in an orderly way proceeds from brahman. The concept of rta is a stepping-stone to the concept of Tao in Lao-tzu. Tao is the right way, the reign of law, the middle road between the opposites, freed from them and yet uniting them in itself. The purpose of life is to travel this middle road and never to deviate towards the opposites. The ecstatic element is entirely absent in Lao-tzu; its place is taken by sublime philosophic lucidity, an intellectual and intuitive wisdom obscured by no mystical haze—a wisdom that represents what is probably the highest attainable degree of spiritual superiority, as far removed from chaos as the stars from the disorder of the actual world. It takes all that is wild, without denaturing it and turning it into something higher. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 192 Tao contains no ecstatic element, its place being taken by a sublime philosophic lucidity, an intellectual and intuitive wisdom obscured by no mystical haze. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 192 According to the central concepts of Taoism, Tao is divided into a fundamental pair of opposites, yang and yin. Yang signifies warmth, light, maleness; yin is cold, darkness, femaleness. Yang is also heaven, yin earth. From the yang force arises shen, the celestial portion of the human soul, and from the yin force comes kwei, the earthly part. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 366 Intuition, like sensation, is an irrational function of perception. As with sensation, its contents have the character of being "given," in contrast to the "derived" or "produced" character of thinking and feeling contents Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 770 Intuition is the function that mediates perceptions in an unconscious way. Everything, whether outer or inner objects or their relationships, can be the focus of this perception Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 770 The primary function of intuition is simply to transmit images, or perceptions of relations between things, which could not be transmitted by the other functions or only in a very roundabout way Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 611 Intuition may be seen as the perception of one's own unconscious processes, withdrawing one from the object. It mounts above it, ever seeking to rule its material, to shape it, even violently, in accordance with one's own subjective viewpoint, though without being aware of doing so Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 219 The peculiarity of intuition is that it is neither sense perception, nor feeling, nor intellectual inference, although it may also appear in these forms Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 770 In intuition a content presents itself whole and complete, without our being able to explain or discover how this content came into existence. Intuition is a kind of instinctive apprehension, no matter of what contents Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 770 Intuition tries to apprehend the widest range of possibilities, since only through envisioning possibilities is intuition fully satisfied Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 612 In Schiller we have to reckon with a predominance of intellect, not at the expense of his poetic intuition but at the cost of feeling. To Schiller himself it seemed as though there were a perpetual conflict in him between imagination and abstraction, that is, between intuition and thinking. "Even now it happens often enough that the power of imagination disturbs my abstraction, and cold reasoning my poetry" (Goethe, ed. Beutler, XX, p. 20) Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 117 Intuition is constantly seeking fresh outlets and new possibilities in external life. In a very short time every existing situation becomes a prison for the intuitive, a chain that has to be broken Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 612 The intuitive does have sensations, of course, but is not guided by them as such; he uses them merely as starting-points for his perceptions. He selects them by unconscious predilections Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 611 Brahman requires that external opposites, such as heat and cold, first be denied participation in the psyche, and then extreme fluctuations of emotion, such as Fluctuations of emotion are, of course, the constant concomitants of all psychic opposites, and hence of all conflicts of ideas, whether moral or otherwise. We know from experience that the emotions thus aroused increase in proportion as the exciting factor affects the individual as a whole Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 329 The Indian purpose is therefore clear: it wants to free the individual altogether from the opposites inherent in human nature, so that he can attain a new life in Brahman, which is the state of redemption and at the same time God. It is an irrational union of opposites, their final overcoming. Although Brahman, the world-ground and world-creator, created the opposites, they must nevertheless be cancelled out in it again, for otherwise it would not amount to a state of redemption Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 329 Brahman is the union and dissolution of all opposites, and at the same time stands outside them as an irrational factor. It is therefore wholly beyond cognition and comprehension. It is a divine entity, at once the Self (though to a lesser degree than the analogous Atman concept) and a definite psychological state characterized by isolation from the flux of affects Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 330 Since suffering is an affect, release from affects means deliverance. Deliverance from the flux of affects, from the tension of opposites, is synonymous with the way of redemption that gradually leads to Brahman Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 330 Brahman is not only the producer but the produced, the ever-becoming. The epithet "Gracious One" (vena), here bestowed on the sun, is elsewhere applied to the seer who is endowed with the divine light, for, like the Brahman sun, the mind of the seer traverses "earth and heaven contemplating Brahman." The intimate connection, indeed, identity, between the divine being and the Self (Atman) of the man is generally known Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 332 Brahman is also prana, the breath of life and the cosmic principle; it is vayu, wind, which is described in the Brihadaranyaka Upanishad (3.7) as "the thread by which this world and the other world and all things are tied together, the Self, the inner controller, the immortal" Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 334 Brahman is conceived in the Atharva Veda as the vitalistic-principle, the life force, which fashions all the organs and their respective instincts Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 335 Even man's strength comes from Brahman. The Brahman concept, by virtue of all its attributes and symbols, coincides with that of a dynamic or creative principle which I have termed libido Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 336 The word Brahman means prayer, incantation, sacred speech, sacred knowledge (Veda), holy life, the sacred caste (the Brahmans), the Absolute Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 336 If, therefore, we speak of the anima of a man, we must logically speak of the animus of a woman, if we are to give the soul of a woman its right name. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 805 A bushman had a little son whom he loved with the tender monkey-love characteristic of primitives. Psychologically, this love is completely autoerotic – that is to say, the subject loves himself in the object. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 403 I have called this process in its totality the transcendent function, "function" being here understood not as a basic function but as a complex function made up of other functions, and "transcendent" not as denoting a metaphysical quality but merely the fact that this function facilitates a transition from one attitude to another. The raw material shaped by thesis and antithesis, and in the shaping of which the opposites are united, is the living symbol. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 828 But precisely because the new symbol is born of man's highest spiritual aspirations and must at the same time spring from the deepest roots of his being, it cannot be a one-sided product of the most highly differentiated mental functions but must derive equally from the lowest and most primitive levels of the psyche. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 823 Since every scientific theory contains a hypothesis and is therefore an anticipatory description of something still essentially unknown, it is a symbol" Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 817 Considered biologically, the sacrifice serves the interests of domestication, but psychologically it opens a door for new possibilities of spiritual development through the dissolution of old ties Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 24 These images are archaic forms of expression which become symbols, and these appear in their turn as equivalents of the devalued objects. This process is as old as mankind, for symbols may be found among the most primitive human types living today Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 402 The fact that the introvert, because of his abstracting attitude, naturally has a reflective and contemplative air is misleading. One is inclined to assume that in him the primacy falls to thinking Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 248 The extravert, on the contrary, naturally displays many immediate reactions, which easily lead one to conjecture a predominance of feeling. These suppositions are deceptive, since the extravert may well be a thinking, and the introvert a feeling type. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 248 There is a constant influx of unconscious contents into the conscious psychological process, to such a degree that at times it is hard for the observer to decide which character traits belong to the conscious and which to the unconscious personality Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 576 Introversion and extraversion are not traits of character at all but mechanisms, which can, as it were, be switched on or off at will. Only from their habitual predominance do the corresponding characters develop. The predilection one way or the other no doubt depends on the inborn disposition, but this is not always the decisive factor Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 479 If we go right back to primitive psychology, we find absolutely no trace of the concept of an individual. Instead of individuality we find only collective relationship or what Lévy-Bruhl calls participation mystique Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 12 The collective attitude hinders the recognition and evaluation of a psychology different from the subject's, because the mind that is collectively oriented is quite incapable of thinking and feeling in any other way than by projection Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 12 What we understand by the concept "individual" is a relatively recent acquisition in the history of the human mind and human culture Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 12 The development of individu- ality, with the consequent psychological differentiation of man, goes hand in hand with the de-psychologizing work of objective science Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 12 Gnostic philosophy established three types, corresponding perhaps to three [out of four] of the basic psychological functions: thinking, feeling, and sensation [intuition missing]: The pneumatikoi could be correlated with thinking, The psychikoi with feeling, The hylikoi with sensation. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 14 The inferior rating of the psychikoi was in accord with the spirit of Gnosticism, which, unlike Christianity, insisted on the value of knowledge Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 14 The Christian principles of love and faith kept knowledge at a distance. In the Christian sphere the pneumatikoi would accordingly get the lower rating, since they were distinguished merely by the possession of Gnosis, i.e., knowledge Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 14 Tertullian was a fanatic, brilliantly one-sided in his defense of a recognized truth, possessed of a matchless fighting spirit, a merciless opponent who saw victory only in the total annihilation of his adversary, his language a flashing blade wielded with ferocious mastery Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 17 Tertullian was the creator of the Church Latin that lasted for more than a thousand years. It was also he who coined the terminology of the early Church Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 17 Tertullian's impassioned thinking was so inexorable that again and again he alienated himself from the very thing for which he had given his heart's blood. Accordingly his ethical code was bitterly severe Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 17 Tertullian commanded that martyrdom be sought and not shunned; he permitted no second marriage, and required the permanent veiling of persons of the female sex Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 17 Gnosis, which in reality is a passion for thinking and knowing, he [Tertullian] attacked with unrelenting fanaticism, together with philosophy and science which differed from it so little Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 17 Thanks to the acuteness of his mind, Tertullian saw through the poverty of philosophical and Gnostic knowledge, and contemptuously rejected it. He invoked against it the testimony of his own inner world, his own inner realities, which were one with his faith. In shaping and developing these realities he became the creator of those abstract conceptions which still underlie the Catholic system of today Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 18 Type differences should also be borne in mind when we consider the long and perilous struggle which the Church from its earliest beginnings waged against Gnosticism. Owing to the predominantly practical trend of early Christianity the intellectual hardly came into his own, except when he followed his fighting instincts by indulging in polemical apologetics. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 15 The irrational inner reality had for Tertullian an essentially dynamic nature; it was his principle, his foundation in the face of the world and of all collectively valid and rational science and philosophy Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 18 With the sacrificium intellectus [by Tertullian] philosophy and science, and hence also Gnosis, fell to the ground Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 19 Introverted thinking is of value for his contemporaries only so long as it is manifestly and intelligibly related to the known facts of the time. Once it has become mythological, it ceases to be relevant on in itself Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 637 In his own special field of work the introverted thinker provokes the most violent opposition, which he has no notion how to deal with, unless he happens to be seduced by his primitive affects into acrimonious and fruitless polemics Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 635 The introverted thinker may develop into a misanthropic bachelor with a childlike heart. Often he is gauche in his behavior, painfully anxious to escape notice, or remarkably unconcerned and childishly naïve Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 635 In Origen we may recognize the absolute opposite of Tertullian. He was born in Alexandria about A.D. 185. His father was a Christian martyr Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 21 Origen, by mutilating himself [self-castration], sacrificed his sensual tie to the world. For him, evidently, the specific danger was not the intellect but feeling and sensation, which bound him to the object Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 26 Through castration Origen freed himself from the sensuality that was coupled with Gnosticism; he could then surrender without fear to the treasures of Gnostic thought, whereas Tertullian through his sacrifice of the intellect turned away from Gnosis but also reached a depth of religious feeling that we miss in Origen Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 26 Extraversion is the opposite attitude of introversion, where a predilection one way or the other depends on the inborn disposition of the subject, but the inborn disposition is not always the decisive factor since environmental influences can be just as important Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 479 Both extraversion and introversion may appear in the personality so we cannot decide at first to which attitude the superior function belongs, i.e., to introversion or extraversion. This can only be determined by a thorough analysis of the qualities of each function Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 576 The extravert generally has a relaxed attitude. Exceptions, however, are frequent, even in one and the same individual e.g., put an extravert in a dark and silent room, where all his repressed complexes can gnaw at him, and he will get into such a state of tension that he will jump at the slightest stimulus Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 482 An extraverted consciousness is unable to believe in invisible forces.to the blind eyes of the extravert, the intensive sympathy of the introverted feeling type looks like coldness, because usually it does nothing visible Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 641 The extravert suffers most frequently from the neurosis of hysteria, evident in his exaggerated rapport with persons and adjustment to conditions amounting to imitation Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 566 The demands of the extravert's unconscious have an essentially primitive, infantile, egocentric character which compensates for his conscious emphasis on things outside himself Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 571 An example of the extraverted type can be seen in Origen, an early Church scholar, whose basic orientation was towards the object Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 24 Since every man, as a relatively stable being, possesses all the basic psychological functions, it would be a psychological necessity with a view to perfect adaptation that he should also employ them in equal measure Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 28 However, there must be a reason why there are different modes of psychological adaptation: evidently one alone is not enough, since the object seems to be only partially comprehended when, for example, it is something that is merely thought or merely felt Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 28 A one-sided ("typical") attitude leaves a deficiency in the adaptive performance which accumulates during the course of life, and sooner or later this will produce a disturbance of adaptation that drives the subject toward some kind of compensation Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 28 The sacrifice that Tertullian and Origen carried out was drastic too drastic for our taste but it was in keeping with the spirit of the age, which was thoroughly concretistic Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 29 Because of this spirit the Gnostics took their visions as absolutely real, or at least as relating directly to reality, and for Tertullian the reality of his feeling was objectively valid Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 29 The Gnostics projected their subjective inner perception of the change of attitude into a cosmogonic system and believed in the reality of its psychological figures Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 29 The doctrine of the transubstantiation asserts that the wine and holy wafer become transformed into the actual blood and body of Christ. As is well known, this view became dogma, according to which the transformation is accomplished vere, realiter, substantialiter (in truth, in reality, in substance) Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 36 In my experience this type [extraverted thinker] is found chiefly among men, since, in general, thinking tends more often to be a dominant function in men than in women. When thinking dominates in a woman it is usually associated with a predominantly intuitive cast of mind Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 591 Extraverted thinking may be characterized as programmatic in contrast to introverted thinking which is rational Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 38 We might take Darwin as an example of the normal extraverted thinking type; this type speaks with facts. Darwin ranges over the wide field of objective reality Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 632 Anatole France says: "What is thinking? And how does one think? We think with words; that in itself is sensual and brings us back to nature. "This is extreme nominalism, as it is when Nietzsche says that reason is "speech metaphysics" Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 40 The concept of reality necessarily coincides with the sensuous reality of things; their individuality represents the real as opposed to the abstract idea. Strict realism, on the contrary, transfers the accent on reality to the abstract, the idea, the universal, which posits ante rem (before the thing) Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 41 God is a datum formulated as the "highest good" signifying the supreme psychic value, i.e., a concept endowed with the highest and most general significance in determining our thoughts and actions Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 67 Fantasy is just as much feeling as thinking, as much intuition as sensation. There is no psychic function that, through fantasy, is not inextricably bound up with other psychic functions. Sometimes it appears in primordial form, sometimes it is the ultimate and boldest product of all our faculties combined Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 78 Fantasy always fashions the bridge between the irreconcilable claims of subject and object, introversion and extraversion. In fantasy alone both mechanisms are united Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 78 How fantasy is assessed by psychology, so long as this remains merely science, is illustrated by the well-known views of Freud and Adler Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 88 The Freudian interpretation reduces fantasy to causal, elementary, instinctive processes. Adler's conception reduces it to the elementary, final aims of the ego Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 88 Freud's is a psychology of instinct, Adler's an ego-psychology Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 88 Instinct is an impersonal biological phenomenon. A psychology founded on instinct must by its very nature neglect the ego, since the ego owes its existence to the principium individuationis, i.e., to individual differentiation, whose isolated character removes it from the realm of general biological phenomena Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 88 Every ego-psychology must necessarily exclude and ignore just the collective element that is bound to a psychology of instinct, since it describes that very process by which the ego becomes differentiated from collective drives Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 88 Freud's and Adler's theories reject the principle of imagination (fantasy) since they reduce fantasies to something else and treat them merely as a semiotic expression Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 93 For everyone whose guiding principle is adaptation to external reality, imagination is for these reasons something reprehensible and useless Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 93 The debt we owe to the play of imagination is incalculable. It is therefore short sighted to treat fantasy, on account of its risky or unacceptable nature, as a thing of little worth. It must not be forgotten that in the imagination a man's highest value may lie Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 93 Freudian psychology is characterized by one central idea, the repression of incompatible wish-tendencies. Man appears as a bundle of wishes which are only partially adaptable to the object Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 90 The basic formula with Freud is therefore sexuality, which expresses the strongest relation between subject and object; with Adler it is the power of the subject, which secures him most effectively against the object and guarantees him an impregnable isolation that abolishes all relationships Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 91 Freud wuld like to ensure the undisturbed flow of instinct towards its object; Adler would like to break the baleful spell of the object in order to save the ego from suffocating in its own defensive armor Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 91 Abstraction is a universal image conjuring the welter of impressions of animate objects into a fixed form, having the magical significance of a defense against the chaotic flux of experience Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 499 Abstraction may be equated to thinking, thus putting it in conflict with the poetic spirit Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 117 Intuition, like sensation, is an irrational function of perception. As with sensation, its contents have the character of being "given," in contrast to the "derived" or "produced" character of thinking and feeling contents Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 770 Intuition is the function that mediates perceptions in an unconscious way. The introvert discovers himself in the constant Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 138 The introvert holds the same repugnance, fear, or silent contempt for extraversion as the extravert holds for introversion Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 164 Both extraversion and introversion may appear in the personality so we cannot decide at first to which attitude the superior function belongs, i.e., to introversion or extraversion. This can only be determined by a thorough analysis of the qualities of each function Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 576 The extraverted feeling type finds himself through his feeling-relation to the object, whereas the introvert loses himself in the object Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 164 The concept of rta is a stepping-stone to the concept of Tao in Lao-tzu Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 192 Tao is the right way, the reign of law, the middle road between opposites, freed from them and yet uniting them in itself. In order to unearth the treasures they contain they must be developed a stage further Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 93 Adler's psychology, on the other hand, is characterized by the central concept of ego-superiority. Man appears primarily as an ego-point which must not under any circumstances be subordinated to the object Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 90 Freud's repression of instinct in respect of the object corresponds to the security of the subject in Adler. For Adler the remedy is the removal of the security that isolates the subject; for Freud it is the removal of the repression that makes the object inaccessible Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 90 The basic formula with Freud is therefore sexuality, which expresses the strongest relation between subject and object; with Adler it is the power of the subject, which secures him most effectively against the object and guarantees him an impregnable isolation that abolishes all relationships Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 91 Abstraction may be equated to thinking, thus putting it in conflict with the poetic spirit Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 117 The primary function of intuition is simply to transmit images, or perceptions of relations between things, which could not be transmitted by the other functions or only in a very roundabout way Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 611 Intuition may be seen as the perception of one's own unconscious processes, withdrawing one from the object. But without this playing with fantasy no creative work has ever yet come to birth Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 93 The standpoints of Freud and Adler are equally one-sided and characteristic only of one type Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 92 Consequently, any possibility of an individual differentiation of the soul was lost when it became repressed in the collective worship. Such losses generally have unfortunate consequences, and in this case they soon made themselves felt Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 399 In the end, Hermas' libido, i.e., his erotic desire is directed to his task of the Church. In this way, the transition of the worship of woman into the worship of the soul takes place Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 383 Hermas' mistress appears to him not as an erotic fantasy but in "divine" form, seeming to him like a goddess in heaven Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 383 The Christian principle which unites the opposites in the worship of God. In Buddhism, it is the worship of the Self (self-development), while in Spitteler and Goethe it is the worship of the soul symbolized by the worship of woman Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 375 Implicit in this categorization is the modern individualistic principle on the one hand, and on the other a primitive poly-daemonism which assigns to every race, every tribe, every family, every individual its specific religious principle Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 375 The dissolution of the symbol means a streaming off of libido along the direct path, or at any rate an almost irresistible urge for its direct application Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 401 The symbol acquires a conscious motive force once we grant it a value, i.e., if it is perceived, its unconscious libido-charge is thereby given an opportunity to make itself felt in the conscious conduct of life Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 204 In order to characterize more closely these two "impulses" [Apollonian and Dionysian], Nietzsche compares the peculiar psychological states they give rise to with those of dreaming and intoxication Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 226 The Apollonian impulse produces the state comparable to dreaming, the Dionysian the state comparable to intoxication Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 226 The Dionysian impulse, on the other hand, means the liberation of unbounded instinct, the breaking loose of the unbridled dynamism of animal and divine nature; hence in the Dionysian rout man appears as a satyr, god above and goat below Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 227 "All the artistry of Nature is revealed in the ecstasies of intoxication." Which means that the creative dynamism, libido in instinctive form, takes possession of the individual as though he were an object and uses him as a tool or as an expression of itself Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 227 Because of this, Nietzsche quite forgets that in the struggle between Apollo and Dionysus and in their ultimate reconciliation the problem for the Greeks was never an aesthetic one, but was essentially religious Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 231 Aestheticism is a modern bias that shows the psychological mysteries of the Dionysus cult in a light in which they were assuredly never seen or experienced by the ancients Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 231 Brahman requires that external opposites, such as heat and cold, first be denied participation in the psyche, and then that it is expressed in the Upanishads by means of symbols I have termed libido symbols Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 330 The concept of rta is a libido symbol like sun, wind, etc. Only rta is less concretistic and contains the abstract element of fixed direction and regularity, the idea of a predetermined, ordered path or process Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 355 Rta is, therefore, a kind of philosophical libido symbol that can be directly compared to the Stoic concept of Heimarmene. For the Stoics heimarmene had the significance of creative, primal heat, and at the same time it was a predetermined, regular process (hence its other meaning: "compulsion of the stars") Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 355 The natural flow of libido, the middle path, means complete obedience to the fundamental laws of human nature, and there can positively be no higher moral principle than harmony with natural laws that guide the libido in the direction of life's optimum Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 356 Tao contains no ecstatic element, its place being taken by a sublime philosophic lucidity, an intellectual and intuitive wisdom obscured by no mystical haze Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 192 Man as a microcosm uniting the world opposites is the equivalent of an irrational symbol that unites the psychological opposites Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 367 As a microcosm, man is a reconciler of the opposites. Heaven, man, and earth form the three chief elements of the world, the san-tsai Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 366 Amfortas' suffering is caused by the tension of opposites represented by the Grail and the power of Klingsor, who has taken possession of the holy spear Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 371 Klingsor holds a spell over Kundry who symbolizes the instinctive life-force or libido that Amfortas lacks Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 371 Parsifal rescues the libido from the state of restless, compulsive instinctuality, in the first place because he does not succumb to Kundry, and in the second place because he does not possess the Grail Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 371 The death of Kundry may be taken as the liberation of libido from its naturalistic, undomesticated form which falls away as a lifeless husk, while the energy bursts forth as a new stream of life in the glowing of the Grail Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 371 By Parsifal's renunciation of the opposites (unwilling though this was, at least in part), Parsifal caused a blockage of libido that created a new potential and thus made a new manifestation of energy possible Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 372 Mystical interpretation, however has always loved to conceive the bride as Israel and the bridegroom as Jehovah, impelled by a sound instinct to turn even erotic feelings into a relationship between God and the chosen people Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 392 Christianity appropriated the Song of Songs for the same reason, interpreting the bridegroom as Christ and the bride as the Church Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 392 To the psychology of the Middle Ages this analogy had an extraordinary appeal, and it inspired the quite unabashed Christ-eroticism of the Christian mystics, some of the best examples of which are supplied by Mechthild of Magdeburg Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 392 The Litany of Loreto was conceived in this spirit. It derived certain attributes of the Virgin directly from the Song of Songs, as in the case of the tower symbol Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 392 The rose, too, was used as one of her attributes even at the time of the Greek Fathers, together with the lily, which likewise appear in the Song of Songs (2: 1): "I am the rose of Sharon, and the lily of the valleys" Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 392 Images much used in the medieval hymns are the "enclosed garden" and the "sealed fountain," (Song of Songs 4: 12 "a garden enclosed is my sister, my spouse; a spring shut up, a fountain sealed") Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 392 The survival or unconscious revivification of the vessel symbol is indicative of a strengthening of the feminine principle in the masculine psychology of that time. Its symbolization in an enigmatic image must be interpreted as a spiritualization of the eroticism aroused by the worship of woman Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 401 One of the greatest schisms of the Church, having risen from the over-compensated doubt of the Inquisition which came surging up from the unconscious Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 400 The logical consequence of this subjectify process is a splitting up into sects, and its most extreme outcome is individualism, representing a new form of detachment from the world, the immediate danger of which is re-submersion in the unconscious dynamis Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 433 Gnosticism shows man's unconscious psychology in full flower, almost perverse in its luxuriance; it contained the very thing that most strongly resisted the regula fidei [rule of faith] Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 409 Meister Eckhart was the greatest thinker of early medieval times, confronting us with new ideas having the same psychic orientation that impelled Dante to follow Beatrice into the underworld of the unconscious and that inspired the singers who sang the lore of the Grail Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 410 Eckhart rose to a purely psychological and relativistic conception of God and his relation to man and the souled., a psychological understanding of religious phenomena Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 411 Eckhart had a sense of inner affinity with God which must have enhanced the value of his soul, i.e., of his own inner being sharp contrast to the Christian sense of sin Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 411 The soul must be a content in which spontaneity is inherent, and hence also partial unconsciousness, as with every autonomous complex Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 419 This absorption of the soul into consciousness is just as much a characteristic of Eastern as it is of Western culture. In Buddhism everything is dissolved into consciousness; even the samskaras, the unconscious formative forces, must be transformed through religious self-development Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 419 One of the greatest schisms of the Church, having risen from the over-compensated doubt of the Inquisition which came surging up from the unconscious Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 400 The logical consequence of this subjectifying process is a splitting up into sects, and its most extreme outcome is individualism, representing a new form of detachment from the world, the immediate danger of which is re-submersion in the unconscious dynamis Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 433 Prometheus, the artist, the servant of the soul disappears from the world of men; while society itself, in obedience to a soulless moral routine, is delivered over to Behemoth, symbolizing the inimical, the destructive effect of an obsolete ideal Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 434 Pandora, the soul, creates the saving jewel in the unconscious, but it does not benefit mankind because men fail to appreciate it Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 434 Prometheus intervenes and through his insight and understanding brings first a few, and then many, indi- viduals to their senses Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 434 The jewel represents the inferior function, those psychic contents not acknowledged, hence unacceptable Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 453 The soul is a personification of the unconscious, where lies the treasure, the libido which is immersed in introversion and is allegorized as God's kingdom. This amounts to a permanent union with God, a living in his kingdom, in that state where a preponderance of libido lies in the unconscious and determines conscious life Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 424 Human psychology is chameleon-like, as the practising psychologist knows from daily experience. So whenever the object predominates, an assimilation to the object takes place Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 531 On the other hand, we also have to bear in mind the great disadvantage which identification with the directed function entails, namely, the degeneration of the individual Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 502 No doubt man can be mechanized to a very considerable extent, but not to the point of giving himself up completely, or only at the cost of the gravest injury Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 502 Abstraction thus seems to be a function that is at war with the original state of participation mystique. Its purpose is to break the object's hold on the subject. It leads on the one hand to the creation of art-forms, and on the other to knowledge of the object Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 496 All abstraction has the effect of killing the independent activity of the object in so far as this is magically related to the psyche of the subject. The abstracting type does it quite consciously, as a defense against the magical influence of the object Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 497 Abstraction and empathy, introversion and extraversion, are mechanisms of adaptation and defense Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 502 As our daily psychological experience shows, there are very many people who are completely identified with their directed (or "valuable") function, among them the very types we are discussing Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 502 It seems to me that Lévy-Bruhl's participation mystique is more descriptive of this condition [Chinese art], since it aptly formulates the primordial relation of the primitive to the object Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 495 As Worringer says, it is precisely the Oriental art-forms and religions that display this abstracting attitude to the world. To the Oriental, therefore, the world must appear very different from what it does to the Occidental, who animates it with his empathy Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 494 It is easy to see that empathy corresponds to the mechanism of extraversion, and abstraction to that of introversion Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 493 "The great inner uneasiness inspired in man by the phenomena of the external world" is nothing other than the introvert's fear of all stimuli and change, occasioned by his deeper sensitivity and powers of realization Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 493 The introvert's abstractions serve the avowed purpose of confining the irregular and changeable within fixed limits. It goes without saying that this essentially magical procedure is found in full flower in the art of primitives, whose geometrical patterns have a magical rather than an aesthetic value Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 493 The unconscious depotentiation that precedes the act of empathy gives the object a permanently lower value, as in the case of abstraction Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 497 Since the unconscious contents of the empathetic type are identical with the object and make it appear inanimate, empathy is needed in order to cognize the nature of the object Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 497 Abstraction presupposes that the object is alive and active, and seeks to withdraw from the influence of the object Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 490 An extraverted consciousness is unable to believe in invisible forces.to the blind eyes of the extravert, the intensive sympathy of the introverted feeling type looks like coldness, because usually it does nothing visible Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 641 Extraversion must be understood as a mechanism, not a trait of character, capable of being switched on or off at will, its corresponding character developing only from its habitual predominance Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 479 The extravert reveals himself simply and solely in his relatedness, i.e., in his affectivity. He discovers himself in what is fluctuating and changeable. His ego is of less importance than his relatedness Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 138 Extraversion becomes less subject to misunderstanding than the introvert because the style of the times works for him.an extraverted overvaluation of the object Carl Jung, CW 6, Para

645 The extravert holds a differing attitude from the introvert. This causes an intrinsically irritating conflict between the two and the most heated and futile scientific discussions Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 521 The extraverted type can barely conceive of the necessity that forces the introverted type to adapt to the world by means of a system Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 420 The idea of ritual murder is a projection, in acute form, of the rejection of the Redeemer, for one always sees the mote in one's own eye as the beam in one's brother's Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 454 As against this historical evolution of the idea of the soul, analytical psychology opposes the view that the soul does not coincide with the totality of the psychic functions. We define the soul on the one hand as the relation to the unconscious, and on the other as a personification of unconscious contents Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 420 These honorific titles reproduce the essential qualities of the redeeming symbol. Its "divine" effect comes from the irresistible dynamis of the unconscious. The saviour is always a figure endowed with magical power who makes the impossible possible Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 443 The hallmark of classic hysteria is an exaggerated rapport with persons in the immediate environment and an adjustment to surrounding conditions that amounts to imitation Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 566 There is a constant tendency for the hysteric to make himself interesting and to produce an impression Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 566 Another unmistakable sign of the extraverted hysteric is his effusiveness, which occasionally carries him into the realm of fantasy, so that he is accused of the "hysterical lie" Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 566 The hysterical character begins as an exaggeration of the normal attitude; it is then complicated by compensatory reactions from the unconscious, which counteract the exaggerated expression by means of physical symptoms that force the libido to introvert Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 566 The reaction of the unconscious produces another class of symptoms having a more introverted character, one of the most typical being a morbid intensification of fantasy activity Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 566 A purely objective orientation does violence to a multitude of subjective impulses, intentions, needs, and desires and deprives them of the libido that is their natural right Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 570 Man is not a machine that can be remodelled for quite other purposes as occasion demands, in the hope that it will go on functioning as regularly as before but in a quite different way Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 570 Man carries his whole history with him; in his very structure is written the history of mankind. This historical element in man represents a vital need to which a wise psychic economy must respond Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 570 Somehow the past must come alive and participate in the present. Total assimilation to the object will always arouse the protest of the suppressed minority of those elements that belong to the past and have existed from the very beginning Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 570 Feeling restricts the products of sensation and intuition since the choice is made by a rational judgment. It is not the intensity of a sensation that decides action but judgment (feeling) Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 602 One can feel "correctly" only when feeling is not disturbed by anything else. Nothing disturbs feeling so much as thinking. It is therefore understandable that thinking will be kept in abeyance as much as possible Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 598 If feeling is falsified by an egocentric attitude, it at once becomes unsympathetic, because it is then concerned mainly with the ego. It inevitably creates the impression of sentimental self-love, of trying to make itself interesting, and even of morbid self-admiration Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 639 The extraverted feeling type finds himself through his feeling-relation to the object, whereas the introvert loses himself in the object Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 164 Sensation is chiefly conditioned by the object, those objects that excite the strongest sensations will be decisive for the individual's psychology. The result is a strong sensuous tie to the object. Sensation is therefore a vital function equipped with the strongest vital instinct Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 605 The extraverted sensation type need not be a common voluptuary; he is merely desirous of the strongest sensations, and these, by his very nature, he can receive only from the outside Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 607 The extraverted sensation type sees love as unquestionably rooted in the physical attractions of its object. If normal, he is conspicuously well adjusted to reality. That is his ideal, and it even makes him considerate of others Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 607 Over-extraverted feeling satisfies aesthetic expectations but does not speak to the heart. It appeals merely to the senses or worse still only to reason. It can provide the aesthetic padding for a situation, but there it stops, and beyond that its effect is nil. It has become sterile Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 596 The contrary attitudes [extraversion and introversion], are in themselves no more than correlative mechanisms: a diastolic going out and seizing of the object, and a systolic concentration and detachment of energy from the object seized. Every human being possesses both mechanisms as an expression of his natural life-rhythm, a rhythm which Goethe, surely not by chance, described physiologically in terms of the heart's activity. A rhythmical alternative of both forms of psychic activity would perhaps correspond to the normal course of life Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 6 One mechanism will naturally predominate, and if this condition becomes in any way chronic a type will be produced: that is, an habitual attitude in which one mechanism predominates permanently, although the other can never be completely suppressed since it is an integral part of the psychic economy. Hence there can never be a pure type in the sense that it possesses only one mechanism with the complete atrophy of the other. A typical attitude always means merely the relative predominance of one mechanism Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 6 Extraversion and introversion are to be distinguished as general basic attitudes from the function-types. These two attitudes may be recognized with the greatest ease, while it requires considerable experience to distinguish the function-type. At times it is uncommonly difficult to find out which function holds prior place Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 248 Generally speaking, a judging observer will tend to seize on the conscious character, while a perceptive observer will be more influenced by the unconscious character, since judgment is chiefly concerned with the conscious motivation of the psychic process, while perception registers the process itself Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 576 But in so far as we apply judgment and perception in equal measure, it may easily happen that a personality appears to us as both introverted and extraverted, so that we cannot decide at first to which attitude the superior function belongs. In such cases only a thorough analysis of the qualities of each function can help us to form a valid judgment Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 576 We must observe which function is completely under conscious control, and which functions have a haphazard and spontaneous character. The former is always more highly differentiated than the latter, which also possess infantile and primitive traits. Occasionally the superior function gives the impression of normality, while the others have something abnormal or pathological about them Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 576 The sort of demons that introversion and extraversion may become is a daily experience for us psychotherapists. We see in our patients and can feel in ourselves with what irresistible force the libido streams inwards or outwards, with what unshakable tenacity an introverted or extraverted attitude can take root Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 347 The two fundamental mechanisms of the psyche, extraversion and introversion, are also to a large extent the normal and appropriate ways of reacting to complexes extraversion as a means of escaping from the complex into reality, introversion as a means of detaching oneself from external reality through the complex Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 259 It is no wonder, therefore, that the earlier all-powerful collective attitude prevented almost completely an objective psychological evaluation of individual differences, or any scientific objectification of individual psychological processes. It was owing to this very lack of psychological thinking that knowledge became "psychologized," i.e., filled with projected psychology. We find striking examples of this in man's first attempts at a philosophical explanation of the cosmos Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 12 Tertullian was a pagan, and he abandoned himself to the lascivious life of his city until about his thirty-fifth year, when Tertullian became a Christian. He was the author of numerous writings wherein his character, which is our especial interest, is unmistakably displayed. Most clearly of all we see his unparalleled noble-hearted zeal, his fire, his passionate temperament, and the profundity of his religious understanding Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 17 The self-mutilation performed by Tertullian in the sacrificium intellectus [the sacrifice of the intellect] led him to an unqualified recognition of the irrational inner reality, the true rock of his faith. The necessity of the religious process which he sensed in himself he crystalized in the incomparable formula anima naturaliter christiana (the soul is by nature Christian) Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 19 Tertullian is a classic example of introverted thinking. His very considerable and keenly developed intellect was flanked by an unmistakable sensuality. The psychological process of development which we call specifically Christian led him to the sacrifice, the amputation, of the most valuable function, [i.e., thinking] a mythical idea that is also found in the great and exemplary symbol of the sacrifice of the Son of God Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 20 Tertullian's most valuable organ was the intellect and the clarity of knowledge it made possible. Through the sacrificium intellectus the way of purely intellectual development was closed to him; it forced him to recognize the irrational dynamism of his soul as the foundation of his being. The intellectuality of Gnosis, the specifically rational stamp it gave to the dynamic phenomena of the soul, must have been odious to him, for that was just the way he had to forsake in order to acknowledge the principle of feeling Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 20 The introverted thinker never shrinks from thinking a thought because it might prove to be dangerous, subversive, heretical or wounding to other people's feelings, he is none the less beset by the greatest anxiety if ever he has to make it an objective reality. That goes against the grain. And when he does put his ideas into the world, he never introduces them like a mother solicitous for her children, but simply dumps them there and gets extremely annoyed if they fail to thrive on their own account. His amazing unpracticalness and horror of publicity in any form have a hand in this Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 634 The introverted thinking type is strongly influenced by ideas, though his ideas have their origin not in objective data but in his subjective foundation. He will follow his ideas like the extravert, but in the reverse direction; inwards and not outwards. Intensity is his aim, not extensity. In these fundamental respects he differs quite unmistakable from his extraverted counterpart Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 633 Introverted thinking easily gets lost in the immense truth of the subjective factor. It creates theories for their own sake, apparently with an eye to real or at least possible facts, but always with a tendency to slip over from the world of ideas into mere imagery. Accordingly, visions of numerous possibilities appear on the scene, but none of them ever becomes a reality, until finally images are produced which no longer express anything externally real, being mere symbols of the ineffable and unknowable. It is now merely a mystical thinking and quite as unfruitful as thinking that remains bound to objective data. Whereas the latter sinks to the level of a mere representation of facts, the former evaporates into a representation of the irrepresentable, far beyond anything that could be expressed in an image Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 630 With regard to the establishment of new facts it [introverted thinking] is only indirectly of value, since new views rather than knowledge of new facts are its main concern. It formulates questions and creates theories, it opens up new prospects and insights, but with regard to facts its attitude is one of reserve. They are all very well as illustrative examples, but they must not be allowed to predominate Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 628 However clear the inner structure of this his [introverted thinker] thoughts may be, he is not in the least clear where or how they link up with the world of reality. Only with the greatest difficultly will he bring himself to admit that what is clear to him may not be equally clear to everyone Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 634 Introverted thinking differs from extraverted thinking most visibly when it attempts to bring objective data into connections not warranted by the objection other words, to subordinate them to a subjective idea. Each type of thinking senses the other as an encroachment on its own province, and hence a sort of shadow effect is produced, each revealing to the other its least favourable aspect. Introverted thinking then appears as something quite arbitrary, while extraverted thinking seems dull and banal. Thus the two orientations are incessantly at war Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 581 Extraverted thinking shows a dangerous tendency to force the facts into the shape of its image, or to ignore them altogether in order to give fantasy free play. In that event it will be impossible for the finished product the idea to repudiate its derivation from the dim archaic image. It will have a mythological streak which one is apt to interpret as "originality" or, in more pronounced cases, as mere whimsicality, since its archaic character is not immediately apparent to specialists unfamiliar with mythological motifs Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 629 In the introverted thinker's pursuit of his ideas he is generally stubborn, headstrong, and quite unamenable to influence. His suggestibility to personal influences is in strange contrast to this. This type tends to vanish behind a cloud of misunderstanding, which gets all the thicker the more he attempts to assume, by way of compensation and with the help of his inferior functions, an air of urbanity which contrasts glaringly with his real nature Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 634 The introverted thinker is well exemplified in the figures of Kant who relied on the subjective factor, restricting himself to a critique of knowledge Carl Jung, Tertullian, an early church father and creator of the Church Latinis a classic example of introverted thinking. His very considerable and keenly developed intellect was flanked by an unmistakable sensuality Gauss, a mathematician who had a strong distaste for teaching because he was obliged to communicate his findings to others without first having checked and polished every word of the text. To be obliged to communicate his findings to others without such verification must have felt to him as though he were exhibiting himself before strangers in his nightshirt Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 553 The detachment of libido from the object transfers it [the libido], into the subject, where it activates the images lying dormant in the unconscious. These images are archaic forms of expression which become symbols, and these appear in their turn as equivalents of the devalued objects Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 402 But this was not the only consequence. The splitting off and repression of a valuable progressive tendency resulted in a quite general activation of the unconscious. This activation could find no satisfying expression in collective Christian symbols, for an adequate expression always takes an individual form Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 400 Thus the way was paved for heresies and schisms, against which the only defense available to the Christian consciousness was fanaticism. The frenzied horror of the Inquisition was the product of over-compensated doubt, which came surging up from the unconscious and finally gave rise to one of the greatest schisms of the Church the Reformation Considered biologically, the sacrifice serves the interests of domestication, but psychologically it opens a door for new possibilities of spiritual development through the dissolution of old ties Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 24 The brahman concept contains the idea of rta, right order, the orderly course of the world. In brahman, the creative universal essence and universal Ground, all things come upon the right way, for in it they are eternally dissolved and recreated; all development in an orderly way proceeds from brahman Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 192 In his personal relations the introverted thinker appears taciturn or else throws himself on people who cannot understand him, and for him this is one more proof of the abysmal stupidity of man. If for once he is understood, he easily succumbs to a credulous overestimation of his prowess Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 635 Casual acquaintances think him [introverted thinker] inconsiderate and domineering. But the better one knows him, the more favorable one's judgment becomes, and his closest friends value his intimacy very highly. To outsiders he seems prickly, unapproachable, and arrogant, and sometimes soured as a result of his antisocial prejudices. As a personal teacher he has little influence, since the mentality of his students is strange to him. Besides, teaching has at bottom, no interest for him unless it happens to provide him with a theoretical problem. He is a poor teacher, because all the time he is teaching his thought is occupied with the material itself and not with its presentation Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 635 The introverted thinker usually has bad experiences with rivals in his own field because he never understands how to curry their favor; as a rule he only succeeds in showing them how entirely superfluous they are to him. He has only to be convinced of a person's seeming innocuousness to lay himself open to the most undesirable elements. They seize hold of him from the unconscious. He lets himself be brutalized and exploited in the most ignominious way if only he can be left in peace to pursue his ideas Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 634 In the introverted thinker's pursuit of his ideas he is generally stubborn, headstrong, and quite unamenable to influence. His suggestibility to personal influences is in strange contrast to this. This type tends to vanish behind a cloud of misunderstanding, which gets all the thicker the more he attempts to assume, by way of compensation and with the help of his inferior functions, an air of urbanity which contrasts glaringly with his real nature Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 634 With the intensification of his type [introverted thinker], his convictions become all the more rigid and unbending. Outside influences are shut off; as a person, too, he becomes more unsympathetic to his wider circle of acquaintances, and therefore more dependent on his intimates. His tone becomes personal and surly, and though his ideas may gain in profundity they can no longer be adequately expressed in the material at hand. To compensate for this, he falls back on emotionality and touchiness. The outside influences he has brusquely fended off attack him from within, from the unconscious, and in his efforts to defend himself he attacks things that to outsiders seem utterly unimportant. Because of the subjectivization of consciousness resulting from his lack of relationship to the object, what secretly concerns his own person now seems to him of extreme importance Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 636 The introverted thinker begins to confuse his subjective truth with his own personality. Although he will not try to press his convictions on anyone personally, he will burst out with vicious personal retorts against every criticism, however just. Thus his isolation gradually increases. His originally fertilizing ideas become destructive, poisoned by the sediment of bitterness. His struggle against the influences emanating from the unconscious increases with his external isolation, until finally they begin to cripple him. He thinks his withdrawal into ever-increasing solitude will protect him from the unconscious influences, but as a rule it only plunges him deeper into the conflict that is destroying him from within Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 636 Origen grew up in that quite unique mental atmosphere where the ideas of East and West mingled. With an intense yearning for knowledge he eagerly absorbed all that was worth knowing, and accepted everything whether Christian, Jewish, Hellenistic, or Egyptian, that the teeming intellectual world of Alexandria offered him Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 21 Origen's self-castration had taken place sometime before A.D. 211; his inner motives for this may be guessed, but historically they are not known to us. Personally he was of great influence and had a winning speech. He was constantly surrounded by pupils and a whole host of amanuenses who gathered up the precious words that fell from the revered master's lips Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 22 In complete contrast to Tertullian, Origen did not cut himself off from the influence of Gnosticism; on the contrary, he even channelled it, in attenuated form, into the bosom of the Church, or such at least was his aim. Indeed, judging by his thought and fundamental views, he was himself almost a Christian Gnostic Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 22 Origen is a classic example of the extraverted type. His basic orientation was towards the object; this showed itself in his scrupulous regard for objective facts and their conditions, as well as in the formation of that supreme principle: amor et visio Dei. The Christian process of development encountered in Origen a type whose ultimate foundation was the relation to the object a relation that has always symbolically expressed itself in sexuality and accounts for the fact that there are certain theories today which reduce all the essential psychic functions to sexuality too Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 24 Castration was therefore an adequate expression of the sacrifice of the most valuable function. It is entirely characteristic that Tertullian should perform the sacrificium intellectus (sacrifice of the intellect), whereas Origen was led to the sacrificium phalli (castration), because the Christian process demands a complete abolition of the sensual tie to the object; in other words, it demands the sacrifice of the hitherto most valued function, the dearest possession, the strongest instinct Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 24 The natural course of instinct, like everything in nature, follows the line of least resistance. One man is rather more gifted here, another there; or again, adaptation to the early environment of childhood may demand relatively more reserve and reflection or relatively more empathy and participation, according to the nature of the parents and the circumstances Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 28 The adaptive deficiency, which is the causa efficiens of the process of conversion, is subjectively felt as a vague sense of dissatisfaction. Such an atmosphere prevailed at the turning-point of our era. A quite astonishing need of redemption came over mankind, and brought about that unparalleled efflorescence of every sort of possible and impossible cult in ancient Rome Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 28 This type of man elevates objective reality, or an objectively oriented intellectual formula, into the ruling principle not only for himself but for his whole environment. By this formula good and evil are measured, and beauty and ugliness determined. Everything that agrees with this formula is right, everything that contradicts it is wrong, and anything that passes by it indifferently is merely incidental. Because this formula seems to embody the entire meaning of life, it is made into a universal law which must be put into effect everywhere all the time, both individually and collectively Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 585 Just as the extraverted thinking type subordinates himself to his formula, so, for their own good, everybody round him must obey it too, for whoever refuses to obey it is wrong he is resisting the universal law, and is therefore unreasonable, immoral, and without a conscience. His moral code forbids him to tolerate exceptions Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 585 All those activities that are dependent on feeling will become repressed in such a type for instance, aesthetic activities, taste, artistic sense, cultivation of friends, etc. Irrational phenomena such as religious experiences, passions, and suchlike are often repressed to the point of complete unconsciousness Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 587 The thinking of the extraverted type is positive, i.e., productive. It leads to the discovery of new facts or to general conceptions based on disparate empirical material. It is usually synthetic too. Even when it analyses it constructs, because it is always advancing beyond the analysis to a new combination, to a further conception which reunites the analysed material in a different way or adds something to it. One could call this kind of judgment predicative. A characteristic feature, at any rate, is that it is never absolutely depreciative or destructive, since it always substitutes a fresh value for the one destroyed. This is because the thinking of this type is the main channel into which his vital energy flows. The steady flow of life manifests itself in his thinking, so that his thought has a progressive, creative quality Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 592 The conscious altruism of the extraverted thinking type, which is often quite extraordinary, may be thwarted by a secret self-seeking which gives a selfish twist to actions that in themselves are disinterested. Purely ethical intentions may lead him into critical situations which sometimes have more than a semblance of being the outcome of motives far from ethical. There are guardians of public morals who suddenly find themselves in compromising situations, or rescue workers who are themselves in dire need of rescue. Their desire to save others leads them to employ means which are calculated to bring about the very thing they wished to avoid Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 588 There are extraverted idealists so consumed by their desire for the salvation of mankind that they will not shrink from any lie or trickery in pursuit of their ideal. In science there are not a few painful examples of highly respected investigators who are so convinced of the truth and general validity of their formula that they have not scrupled to falsify evidence in its favour. Their sanction is: the end justifies the means. Only an inferior feeling function, operating unconsciously and in secret, could seduce otherwise reputable men into such aberrations Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 588 The extraverted thinker may play a very useful role in social life as a reformer or public prosecutor or purifier of conscience, or as the propagator of important innovations. But the more rigid the formula, the more he develops into a martinet, a quibbler, and a prig, who would like to force himself and others into one mould Carl

Jung, CW 6, Para 585 The influence and activities of these personalities [extraverted thinking type] are the more favorable and beneficial the further from the center their radius extends. Their best aspect is to be found at the periphery of their sphere of influence. The deeper we penetrate into their own power province, the more we feel the unfavourable effects of their tyranny. A quite different life pulses at the periphery, where the truth of the formula can be felt as a valuable adjunct to the rest Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 586 But the closer we come to the center of power where the formula operates, the more life withers away from everything that does not conform to its dictates. Usually it is the nearest relatives who have to taste the unpleasant consequences of the extraverted formula, since they are the first to receive its relentless benefits. But in the end it is the subject himself who suffers most Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 586 Extraverted thinking differs from introverted thinking most visibly when it appropriates material that is the special province of introverted thinking. When, for instance, a subjective conviction is explained analytically in terms of objective data or as being derived from objective ideas. Each type of thinking senses the other as an encroachment on its own province, and hence a sort of shadow effect is produced, each revealing to the other its least favourable aspect. Introverted thinking then appears as something quite arbitrary, while extraverted thinking seems dull and banal. Thus the two orientations are incessantly at war Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 581 In keeping with the objective formula, the conscious attitude [of the extraverted thinker] becomes more or less impersonal, often to such a degree that personal interests suffer. If the attitude is extreme, all personal considerations are lost sight of, even those affecting the subject's own person. His health is neglected, his social position deteriorates, the most vital interests of his family health, finances, morals are violated for the sake of the ideal. Personal sympathy with others must in any case suffer unless they too happen to espouse the same ideal Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 589 Often the closest members of his family, his own children know such a father only as a cruel tyrant, while the outside world resounds with the fame of his humanity. Because of the highly impersonal character of the conscious attitude, the unconscious feelings are extremely personal and oversensitive, giving rise to secret prejudices a readiness, for instance, to misconstrue any opposition to his formula as personal ill-will, or a constant tendency to make negative assumptions about other people in order to invalidate their arguments in advance in defence, naturally, of his own touchiness Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 589 The extraverted thinker's unconscious sensitivity makes him sharp in tone, acrimonious, aggressive. Insinuations multiply. His feelings have a sultry and resentful character always a mark of the inferior function. Magnanimous as he may be in sacrificing himself to his intellectual goal, his feelings are petty, mistrustful, crotchety, and conservative. Anything new that is not already contained in his formula is seen through a veil of unconscious hatred and condemned accordingly Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 589 In spite of its ecclesiastical associations, nominalism is a sceptical tendency that denies the separate existence characteristic of abstractions. It is kind of scientific scepticism coupled with the most rigid dogmatism Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 41 Although biological instinctive processes also contribute to the formation of the personality, individuality is nevertheless essentially different from collective instincts; indeed, it stands in the most direct opposition to them, just as the individual as a personality is always distinct from the collective. His essence consists precisely in this distinction Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 88 Freud's view is essentially extraverted, Adler's introverted. The extraverted theory holds good for the extraverted type, the introverted theory for the introverted type. Since a pure type is a product of a wholly one-sided development it is also necessarily unbalanced. Over accentuation of the one function is synonymous with repression of the other Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 91 Psychoanalysis fails to remove this repression just in so far as the method it employs is oriented according to the theory of the patient's own type. Thus the extravert, in accordance with his [Freud's] theory, will reduce the fantasies rising out of his unconscious to their instinctual content, while the introvert [according to Adler], will reduce them to his power aims Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 92 For a time objects appear to have an exaggerated value, if they should serve to bring about a solution, a deliverance, or lead to the discovery of a new possibility. Yet not sooner have they served their purpose as stepping-stones or bridges than they lose their value altogether and are discarded as burdensome appendages. Facts are acknowledged only if they open new possibilities of advancing beyond them and delivering the individual from their power. Nascent possibilities are compelling motives from which intuition cannot escape and to which all else must be sacrificed Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 612 Affectivity designates and comprises "not only the affects proper, but also the slight feelings or feeling-tones of pain and pleasure." Bleuler distinguishes affectivity from the sense-perceptions and physical sensations as well as from "feelings" that may be regarded as inner perception processes (e.g., the "feeling" of certainty, of probability, etc.) or vague thoughts or discernments Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 682 The introvert is far more subject to misunderstanding than the extravert, not so much because the extravert is a more merciless or critical adversary than he himself might be, but because of the style of the times which he himself imitates works against him. He finds himself in the minority, not in numerical relation to the extravert, but in relation to the general Western view of the world as judged by his feeling Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 645 In so far as he [the introvert] is a convinced participator in the general style, he undermines his own foundations; for the general style, acknowledging as it does only the visible and tangible values, is opposed to his specific principle. Because of its invisibility, he is obliged to depreciate the subjective factor, and must force himself to join in the extraverted overvaluation of the object. He himself sets the subjective factor at too low a value, and his feelings of inferiority are his chastisement for this sin Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 645 If the object had an absolute value, it would be an absolute determining factor for the subject and would abolish his freedom of action absolutely, since even a relative freedom could not coexist with absolute determination by the object. Absolute relation to the object is equivalent to a complete exteriorization of the conscious processes; it amounts to an identity of subject and object which would render all cognition impossible Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 402 By "dreaming" Nietzsche means, as he himself says, essentially an "inward vision," the "lovely semblance of dream-worlds." Apollo "rules over the beautiful illusion of the inner world of fantasy," he is "the god of all shape-shifting powers." He signifies measure, number, limitation, and subjugation of everything wild and untamed. "One might even describe Apollo himself as the glorious divine image of the principium individuationis" [principle of individuality] Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 226 The Dionysian is the horror of the annihilation of the principium individuationis [principle of individuality] and at the same time "rapturous delight" in its destruction. It is therefore comparable to intoxication, which dissolves the individual into his collective instincts and components an explosion of the isolated ego through the world Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 227 Hence, in the Dionysian orgy, man finds man: "alienated Nature, hostile or enslaved, celebrates once more her feast of reconciliation with her prodigal son Man." Each feels himself "not only united, reconciled, merged with his neighbour, but one with him." His individuality is entirely obliterated. "Man is no longer the artist, he has become the work of art" Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 227 It will have been the same with the Greeks. It was just their living sense of horror that gradually brought about a reconciliation of the Apollinian with the Dionysian "through a metaphysical miracle," as Nietzsche says. This statement, as well as the other where he says that the antagonism between them is "only seemingly bridged by the common term 'Art,"' must constantly be borne in mind, because Nietzsche, like Schiller, had a pronounced tendency to credit art with a mediating and redeeming role Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 230 The problem then remains stuck in aesthetics the ugly is also "beautiful," even beastliness and evil shine forth enticingly in the false glamour of aesthetic beauty. The artistic nature in both Schiller and Nietzsche claims a redemptive significance for itself and its specific capacity for creation and expression Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 230 The Dionysian satyr festival, to judge by all the analogies, was a kind of totem feast involving a regressive identification with the mythical ancestors or directly with the totem animal. The cult of Dionysus had in many places a mystical and speculative streak, and in any case exercised a very strong religious influence Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 231 The fact that Greek tragedy arose out of an originally religious ceremony is at least as significant as the connection of our modern theatre with the medieval Passion play, which was exclusively religious in origin; we are not permitted, therefore, to judge the problem under its purely aesthetic aspect Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 231 With Nietzsche as with Schiller the religious viewpoint is entirely overlooked and is replaced by the aesthetic. These things obviously have their aesthetic side and it should not be neglected. Nevertheless, if medieval Christianity is understood only aesthetically its true character is falsified and trivialized, just as much as if it were viewed exclusively from the historical standpoint Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 231 This shifting of the problem must doubtless have its psychological cause and purpose. The advantages of such a procedure are not far to seek: the aesthetic approach immediately converts the problem into a picture which the spectator can contemplate at his ease, admiring both its beauty and its ugliness, merely re-experiencing its passions at a safe distance, with no danger of becoming involved in them. The aesthetic attitude guards against any real participation, prevents one from being personally implicated, which is what a religious understanding of the problem would mean Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 232 Fluctuations of emotion are, of course, the constant concomitants of all psychic opposites, and hence of all conflicts of ideas, whether moral or otherwise. We know from experience that the emotions thus aroused increase in proportion as the exciting factor affects the individual as a whole Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 329 Brahman is not only the producer but the produced, the ever-becoming. The epithet "Gracious One" (vena), here bestowed on the sun, is elsewhere applied to the seer who is endowed with the divine light, for, like the Brahman sun, the mind of the seer traverses "earth and heaven contemplating Brahman." The intimate connection, indeed identity, between the divine being and the Self (Atman) of the man is generally known Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 332 Hence the most one-sided differentiations are found among semi-barbarous people for instance, certain aspects of Christian asceticism that are an affront to good taste, and parallel phenomena among the yogis and Tibetan Buddhists. For the barbarian, this tendency to fall a victim to one-sidedness in one way or another, thus losing sight of his total personality, is a great and constant danger Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 346 The Gilgamesh epic, for example, begins with this conflict. The one-sidedness of the barbarian takes the form of daemonic compulsion; it has something of the character of going berserk or running amok. In all cases it presupposes an atrophy of instinct that is not found in the true primitive, for which reason he is in general still free from the one-sidedness of the cultural barbarian Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 346 The sort of demons that introversion and extraversion may become is a daily experience for us psychotherapists. We see in our patients and can feel in ourselves with what irresistible force the libido streams inwards or outwards, with what unshakable tenacity an introverted or extraverted attitude can take root. The description of manas and vac as "mighty monsters of Brahman" is in complete accord with the psychological fact that at the instant of its appearance the libido divides into two streams, which as a rule alternate periodically but at times may appear simultaneously in the form of a conflict, as an outward stream opposing an inward stream Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 347 The daemonic quality of the two movements lies in their ungovernable nature and overwhelming power. This quality, however, makes itself felt only when the instinct of the primitive is already so stunted as to prevent a natural and purposive counter-movement to one-sidedness, and culture not sufficiently advanced for man to tame his libido to the point where he can follow its introverting or extraverting movement of his own free will and intention Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 347 The vital optimum is not to be found in crude egoism, for fundamentally man is so constituted that the pleasure he gives to his neighbour is something essential to him. Nor can the optimum be reached by an unbridled craving for individualistic supremacy, because the collective element in man is so powerful that his longing for fellowship would destroy all pleasure in naked egoism Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 356 The optimum can be reached only through obedience to the tidal laws of the libido, by which systole alternates with diastole laws which bring pleasure and the necessary limitations of pleasure, and also set us those individual life tasks without whose accomplishment the vital optimum can never be attained Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 356 Amfortas has the Grail and suffers for it, because he lacks libido. Parsifal has nothing of either, he is nirdvandva, free from opposites, and is therefore the redeemer, the bestowed of healing and renewed vitality, who unites the bright, heavenly, feminine symbol of the Grail with the dark, earthy, masculine symbol of the spear Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 371 The undeniable sexual symbolism might easily lead to the one-sided interpretation that the union of spear and Grail merely signifies a release of sexuality. The fate of Amfortas shows, however, that sexuality is not the point. On the contrary, it was his relapse into a nature-bound, brutish attitude that was the cause of his suffering and brought about the loss of his power. His seduction by Kundry was a symbolic act, showing that it was not sexuality that dealt him his wound so much as an attitude of nature-bound compulsion, a supine submission to the biological urge Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 372 This attitude expresses the supremacy of the animal part of our psyche. The sacrificial wound that is destined for the beast strikes the man who is overcome by the beast all for the sake of man's further development. The fundamental problem, as I have pointed out in Symbols of Transformation, is not sexuality per se, but the domestication of libido, which concerns sexuality only so far as it is one of the most important and most dangerous forms of libidinal expression Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 372 The central religious idea in this legend, of which there are numerous variants, is the holy vessel, which, it must be obvious to everyone, is a thoroughly non-Christian image, whose origin is to be sought in extra-canonical sources. From the material I have cited, it seems to me a genuine relic of Gnosticism, which either survived the extermination of heresies because of a secret tradition, or owed its revival to an unconscious reaction against the domination of official Christianity Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 401 But spiritualization always means the retention of a certain amount of libido, which would otherwise be immediately squandered in sexuality. Experience shows that when the libido is retained, one part of it flows into the spiritualized expression, while the remainder sinks into the unconscious and activates images that correspond to it, in this case the vessel symbol Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 401 As the symbol can come alive only through the devaluation of the object, it is evident that the purpose it serves is to deprive the object of its value. If the object had an absolute value, it would be an absolute determining factor for the subject and would abolish his freedom of action absolutely, since even a relative freedom could not coexist with absolute determination by the object Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 402 An example of the devalued object can be seen in the vision of Hermas, in which he saw a tower being built. The old woman, who at first had declared herself to be the Church, now explains that the tower is a symbol of the Church. Her significance is thus transferred to the tower, and it is with this that the whole remaining part of the text is concerned. For Hermas it is only the tower that matters, and no longer the old woman, let alone Rhoda. The detachment of libido from the real object, its concentration on the symbol and canalization into a symbolic function, is complete. The idea of a universal and undivided Church, expressed in the symbol of a seamless and impregnable tower, has become an unshakable reality in the mind of Hermas Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 402 The medieval background of Faust has quite special significance because there actually was a medieval element that presided over the birth of modern individualism. It began, it seems to me, with the worship of woman, which strengthened the man's soul very considerably as a psychological factor, since the worship of woman meant worship of the soul.

This is nowhere more beautifully and perfectly expresses than in Dante's Divine Comedy Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 376 Dante is the spiritual knight of his lady; for her sake he embarks on the adventure of the lower and upper worlds. In this heroic endeavor her image is exalted into the heavenly, mystical figure of the Mother of Goad figure that has detached itself from the object and become the personification of a purely psychological factor, or rather, of those unconscious contents whose personification I have termed the anima. Canto XXXIII of the Paradiso expresses this culminating point of Dante's psychic development in the prayer of St. Bernard Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 377 The very fact that Dante speaks through the mouth of St. Bernard is an indication of the transformation and exaltation of his own being. The same transformation also happens to Faust, who ascends from Gretchen to Helen and from Helen to the Mother of God; his nature is altered by repeated figurative deaths (Boy Charioteer, homunculus, Euphorion), until finally he attains the highest goal as Doctor Marianus. In that form Faust utters his prayer to the Virgin Mother Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 378 We find this characteristic transition from the worship of woman to the worship of the soul in an early Christian document, The Shepherd of Hermas, which flourished about A.D. 140. This book, written in Greek, consists of a number of visions and revelations describing the consolidation of the new faith. The book, long regarded as canonical, was nevertheless rejected by the Muratori Canon Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 381 The repressed erotic impression has activated the latent primordial image of goddess, i.e., the archetypal soul-image. The erotic impression has evidently become united in the collective unconscious with archaic residues which have preserved from time immemorial the imprint of vivid impressions of the nature of woman as mother and woman as desirable maid Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 383 Official Christianity, therefore, absorbed certain Gnostic elements that manifested themselves in the worship of woman and found a place for them in an intensified worship of Mary. I have selected the Litany of Loreto as an example of this process of assimilation from a wealth of equally interesting material. The assimilation of these elements to the Christian symbol nipped in the bud the psychic culture of the man; for his soul, previously reflected in the image of the chosen mistress, lost its individual form of expression through this absorption Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 399 Since the psychic relation to woman was expressed in the collective worship of Mary, the image of woman lost a value to which human beings had a natural right. This value could find its natural expression only through individual choice, and it sank into the unconscious when the individual form of expression was replaced by a collective one. In the unconscious the image of woman received an energy charge that activated the archaic and infantile dominants Carl Jung, CW 6. Para 399 Vessel symbolism probably contains a pagan relic which proved adaptable to Christianity, and this is all the more likely as the worship of Mary was itself a vestige of paganism which secured for the Christian Church the heritage of the Magna Mater, Isis, and other mother goddesses. The image of the vas Sapientiae, vessel of wisdom, likewise recalls its Gnostic prototype, Sophia Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 398 It elucidates the psychological relations between the worship of woman and the legend of the Grail, which was so essentially characteristic of the early Middle Ages. The central religious idea in this legend, of which there are numerous variants, is the holy vessel, a thoroughly non-Christian image, a genuine relic of Gnosticism Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 401 The symbolism of the vessel has pagan roots in the "magic cauldron" of Celtic mythology. Dagda, one of the benevolent gods of ancient Ireland, possesses such a cauldron, which supplies everybody with food according to his needs or merits. The Celtic god Bran likewise possesses a cauldron of renewal Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 401 Looked at historically, the soul, that many-faceted and much-interpreted concept, refers to a psychological content that must possess a certain measure of autonomy within the limits of consciousness. If this were not so, man would never have hit on the idea of attributing an independent existence to the soul, as though it were some objectively perceptible thing Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 419 The primitive, as we know, usually has several souls several autonomous complexes with a high degree of spontaneity, so that they appear as having a separate existence (as in certain mental disorders). On a higher level the number of souls decreases, until at the highest level of culture the soul resolves itself into the subject's general awareness of his psychic activities and exists only as a term for the totality of psychic processes Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 419 The libido concentrated in the unconscious was formerly invested in objects, and this made the world seem all-powerful. God was then "outside," but now he works from within, as the hidden treasure conceived as God's kingdom. If then, Meister Eckhart reaches the conclusion that the soul is itself God's kingdom, it is conceived as a function of relation to God, and God would be the power working within the soul and perceived by it. Eckhart even calls the soul the image of God Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 424 It is evident from the ethnological and historical material that the soul is a content that belongs partly to the subject and partly to the world of spirits, i.e., the unconscious. Hence the soul always has an earthly as well as a rather ghostly quality. It is the same with magical power, the divine force of primitives, whereas on the higher levels of culture God is entirely separate from man and is exalted to the heights of pure ideality. But the soul never loses its intermediate position But symbols are shaped energies, determining ideas whose affective power is just as great as their spiritual value Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 425 The organ of perception, the soul, apprehends the contents of the unconscious, and, as the creative function, gives birth to its dynamis in the form of a symbol. The soul gives birth to images that from the rational standpoint of consciousness are assumed to be worthless. And so they are, in the sense that they cannot immediately be turned to account in the objective world Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 426 We hear the voice of the collective psyche in new bold ideas, which with imperturbable assurance and the finality of natural law brings about spiritual transformation and renewal. The unconscious currents reached the surface at the time of the Reformation. The Reformation largely did away with the Church as the dispenser of salvation and established once more the personal relation to God Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 433 The end of the jewel [Pandora's] is mysterious: it falls into the hands of a wandering Jew. "It was not a Jew of this world, and his clothes seemed to us exceedingly strange." (Prometheus and Epimetheus p. 164). This peculiar Jew can only be Ahasuerus, who did not accept the actual Redeemer, and now, as it were, steals his image. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 454 The story of Ahasuerus is a late Christian legend, which cannot be traced back earlier than the thirteenth century. Psychologically, it sprang from a component of the personality or a charge of libido that could find no outlet in the Christian attitude to life and the world and was therefore repressed. The Jews were always a symbol for this, hence the persecution mania against the Jews in the Middle Ages Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 454 The ritual murder idea also plays a part in Spitteler's story of Pandora in his Prometheus the Jew steals the wonder-child from heaven. It is a mythologized projection of a dim realization that the workings of the Redeemer are constantly being frustrated by the presence of an unredeemed element in the unconscious Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 454 This unredeemed, untamed, barbarian element, which can only be held on a chain and cannot be allowed to run free, is projected upon those who have never accepted Christianity. There is an unconscious awareness of this intractable element whose existence we don't like to admit hence the projection. In reality it is a part of ourselves that has contrived to escape the Christian process of domestication. The restlessness of the wandering Jew is a concretization of this unredeemed state Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 454 The paranoid idea can be the result, in pathological cases, of a particularly isolated and uninfluenceable complex which has become an "over-valued idea", a dominant that defies all criticism and enjoys complete autonomy, until it finally becomes an all-controlling factor manifesting itself as "spleen." In pathological cases it turns into an obsessive or paranoid idea, absolutely unshakable, that rules the individual's entire life Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 467 The extravert generally has a relaxed attitude. Exceptions, however, are frequent, even in one and the same individual., put an extravert in a dark and silent room, where all his repressed complexes can gnaw at him, and he will get into such a state of tension that he will jump at the slightest stimulus Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 482 Empathy is a kind of perceptive process, characterized by the fact that, through feeling, some essential psychic content is projected into the object, so that the object is assimilated to the subject and coalesces with him to such an extent that the subject feels himself, as it were, in the object Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 486 This happens when the projected content is associated to a higher degree with the subject than with the object. He does not, however, feel himself projected into the object; rather, the "empathized" object appears animated to him [the subject], as though it were speaking to him of its own accord Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 486 It should be noted that in itself projection is usually an unconscious process not under conscious control. On the other hand it is possible to imitate the projection consciously by means of a conditional sentence for instance, "if you were my father "thus bringing about the situation of empathy Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 486 'As a rule, the projection transfers unconscious contents into the object, for which reason empathy is also termed "transference" (Freud) in analytical psychology. Empathy, therefore, is a form of extraversion Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 486 Worringer defines the aesthetic experience of empathy as follows: "Aesthetic enjoyment is objectified self-enjoyment" (Abstraction and Empathy, p. 5). Consequently, only a form one can empathize with is beautiful. Lipps says: "Only so far as this empathy extends are forms beautiful. Their beauty is simply my ideal having free play in them" (Aesthetic, p. 247). According to this, any form one cannot empathize with would be ugly. But here the theory of empathy reaches its limitations, for, as Worringer points out, there are art forms to which the empathetic attitude cannot be applied Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 487 It is indeed true that empathy presupposes a subjective attitude of confidence, or trustfulness toward the object. It is a readiness to meet the object halfway, a subjective assimilation that brings about a good understanding between subject and object or at least simulates it Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 489 As the essence of empathy is the projection of subjective contents, it follows that the preceding unconscious act must be the opposite a neutralizing of the object that renders it inoperative. In this way the object is emptied, so to speak, robbed of its spontaneous activity, and thus made a suitable receptacle for subjective contents Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 491 The empathizing subject wants to feel his own life in the object; hence the independence of the object and the difference between it and the subject must not be too great. As a result of the unconscious act that preceded empathy, the sovereignty of the object is depotentiated, or rather it is overcompensated, because the subject immediately gains ascendency over the object Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 491 This can only happen unconsciously, through an unconscious fantasy that either devalues and depotentiates the object or enhances the value and importance of the subject. Only in this way can that difference of potential arise which empathy needs in order to convey subjective contents into the object Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 491 Just as abstraction is based on the magical significance and power of the object, the basis of empathy is the magical significance of the subject, who gains power over the object by means of mystical identification. The primitive is in a similar position: he is magically influenced by the power of the fetish, yet at the same time he is the magician and accumulator of magical power who charges the fetish with potency. An example of this is the churinga rite of the Australian aborigines Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 496 The abstracting attitude is centripetal, i.e., introverting. Worringer's conception of abstraction therefore corresponds to the introverted attitude. It is significant that Worringer describes the influence of the object as fear or dread. The abstracting attitude endows the object with a threatening or injurious quality against which it has to defend itself. This seemingly a priori quality is doubtless a projection, but a negative one. We must therefore suppose that abstraction is preceded by an unconscious act of projection which transfers negative contents to the object Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 490 The man with the abstracting attitude finds himself in a frighteningly animated world that seeks to overpower and smother him. He therefore withdraws into himself, in order to think up a saving formula calculated to enhance his subjective value at least to the point where he can hold his own against the influence of the object Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 492 The man with the empathetic attitude finds himself, on the contrary, in a world that needs his subjective feeling to give it life and soul. He animates it with himself, full of trust; but the man with the abstract attitude retreats mistrustfully before the daemonism of objects, and builds up a protective interlude composed of abstractions Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 492 Worringer rightly says of Oriental art: Tormented by the confusion and flux of the phenomenal world, these people were dominated by an immense need for repose. The enjoyment they sought in art consisted not so much in immersing themselves in the things of the outside world and finding pleasure there, as in raising the individual object out of its arbitrary and seemingly fortuitous existence, immortalizing it by approximation to abstract forms, and so finding a point of repose amid the ceaseless flux of appearances (Abstraction and Empathy, p. 16) Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 493 All is on fire. The eye and all the senses are on fire, with the fire of passion, the fire of hate, the fire of delusion; the fire is kindled by birth, old age, and death, by pain and lamentation, by sorrow, suffering, and despair...The whole world is in flames, the whole world is wrapped in smoke, the whole world is consumed by fire, the whole world trembles (Warren, Buddhism in Translations, p. 352) Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 494 It is this fearful and sorrowful vision of the world that forces the Buddhist into his abstracting attitude, just as, according to legend, a similar impression started the Buddha on his life's quest. The dynamic animation of the object as the impelling cause of abstraction is strikingly expressed in the Buddha's symbolic language. This animation does not come from empathy, but from an unconscious projection that actually exists a priori. The term "projection" hardly conveys the real meaning of this phenomenon. Projection is really an act that happens, and not a condition existing a priori, which is what we are obviously dealing with here Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 495 The primitive's objects have a dynamic animation. They are charged with soul-stuff or soul-force (and not always possessed of souls, as the animist theory supposes) so that they have a direct psychic effect upon him, producing what is practically a dynamic identification with the object Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 495 In certain primitive languages articles of personal use have a gender denoting "alive" (the suffix of animation). With the abstracting attitude it is much the same, for here too the object is alive and autonomous from the beginning and in no need of empathy; on the contrary, it has such a powerful effect that the subject is forced into introversion Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 495 Its strong libido investment comes from its participation mystique with the subject's own unconscious. This is clearly expressed in the words of the Buddha: the universal fire is identical with the fire of libido, with the subject's burning passion, which appears to him as an object because it is not differentiated into a disposable function Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 495 Identification with the directed function has an undeniable advantage in that a man can best adapt to collective demands and expectations; moreover, it also enables him to keep out of the way of his inferior, undifferentiated, undirected functions by self-alienation. In addition, "selflessness" is always considered a particular virtue from the standpoint of social morality Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 502 For the more he identifies with one function, the more he invests it with libido, and the more he withdraws libido from the other functions. They can tolerate being deprived of libido for even quite long periods, but in the end they will react. Being drained of libido, they gradually sink below the threshold of consciousness, lose their associative connection with it, and finally lapse into the unconscious Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 502 This is a regressive development, a reversion to the infantile and finally to the archaic level. Since man has spent only a few thousand years in a cultivated state, as opposed to several hundred thousand years in a state of savagery, the archaic modes of functioning are still extraordinarily vigorous and easily reactivated. Hence, when certain functions disintegrate by being deprived of libido, their archaic foundations in the unconscious become operative again Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 502 It is sufficient to note that the peculiar nature of the extravert constantly urges him to expend and propagate himself in every way, while the tendency of the introvert is to defend himself against all demands from outside, to conserve his energy by withdrawing it from objects, thereby consolidating his own position Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 559 Blake's intuition did not err when he described the two classes of men as "prolific" and "devouring." Just as, biologically, the two modes of adaptation work equally well and are successful in their own way, so too with the typical attitudes. The one achieves its end by a multiplicity of relationships, the other by monopoly Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 559 The very adjustment of the normal extraverted type is his limitation. He owes his normality on the one hand to his ability to fit into existing conditions with comparative ease. His requirements are limited to the objectively possible, for instance to the career that holds out good prospects at this particular moment Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 564 The normal extraverted type does what is needed of him, or what is expected of him, and refrains from all innovations that are not entirely self-evident or that in any way exceed the expectations of those around him. On the other hand, his normality must also depend essentially on whether he takes account of his subjective needs and requirements, and this is just his weak point Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 564 The tendency of his type is so outer-directed that even the most obvious of all subjective facts, the condition of his own body, receives scant attention. The body is not sufficiently objective or "outside," so that the satisfaction of elementary needs which are indispensable to physical well-being is no longer given its due. The body accordingly suffers, to say nothing of the psyche Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 564 One can feel "correctly" only when feeling is not disturbed by anything else. Nothing disturbs feeling so much as thinking. It is therefore understandable that in this type [extraverted feeling] thinking will be kept in abeyance as much as possible. This does not mean that the woman does not think at all; on the contrary, she may think a great deal and very cleverly, but her thinking is never sui generis [of its own kind]it is an Epimethean appendage to her feeling. What she cannot feel, she cannot consciously think. "But I can't think what I don't feel," such a type said to me once in indignant tones. So far as her feeling allows, she can think very well, but every conclusion, however logical, that might lead to a disturbance of feeling is rejected at the outset. It is simply not thought. Thus everything that fits in with the objective values is good, and is loved, and everything else seems to her to exist in a world apart Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 598 As feeling is undeniably a more obvious characteristic of feminine psychology than thinking, the most pronounced feeling types are to be found among women. When extraverted feeling predominates we speak of an extraverted feeling type. Examples of this type that I can call to mind are, almost without exception, women. The woman of this type follows her feeling as a guide throughout life. As a result of upbringing her feeling has developed into an adjusted function subject to conscious control. Except in extreme cases, her feeling has a personal quality, even though she may have repressed the subjective factor to a large extent Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 597 Her [extraverted feeling type] personality appears adjusted in relation to external conditions. Her feelings harmonize with objective situations and general values. This is seen nowhere more clearly than in her love choice: the "suitable" man is loved, and no one else; he is suitable not because he appeals to her hidden subjective nature about which she usually knows nothing but because he comes up to all reasonable expectations in the matter of age, position, income, size and respectability of his family, etc. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 597 Accordingly the unconscious of this type [extraverted feeling] contains first and foremost a peculiar kind of thinking, a thinking that is infantile, archaic, negative. So long as the conscious feeling preserves its personal quality, or, to put it another way, so long as the personality is not swallowed up in successive states of feeling, this unconscious thinking remains compensatory. But as soon as their personality is dissociated and dissolves into a succession of contradictory feeling states, the identity of the ego is lost and the subject lapses into the unconscious Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 600 When this happens, it [the ego] gets associated with the unconscious thinking processes and occasionally helps them to the surface. The stronger the conscious feeling is and the more ego-less it becomes, the stronger grows the unconscious opposition. The unconscious thoughts gravitate round just the most valued objects and mercilessly strip them of their value Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 600 The "nothing but" type of thinking comes into its own here, since it effectively depotentiates all feelings that are bound to the object. The unconscious thinking reaches the surface in the form of obsessive ideas which are invariably of a negative and depreciatory character Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 600 Women of this type have moments when the most hideous thoughts fasten on the very objects most valued by their feelings. This negative thinking utilizes every infantile prejudice or comparison for the deliberate purpose of casting aspersions on the feeling value and musters every primitive instinct in the attempt to come out with "nothing but" interpretations. Hysteria, with the characteristic infantile sexuality of its unconscious world of ideas, is the principal form of neurosis in this type Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 600 Objects are valued in so far as they excite sensations, and so far as lies within the power of sensation, they are fully accepted into consciousness whether they are compatible with rational judgments or not. The sole criterion of their value is the intensity of the sensation produced by their objective qualities. Accordingly, all objective processes which excite any sensations at all make their appearance in consciousness Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 605 Sensation is strongly developed in children and primitives, since in both cases it predominates over thinking and feeling, though not necessarily over intuition. I [Jung] regard sensation as conscious, and intuition as unconscious, perception. For me sensation and intuition represent a pair of opposites, or two mutually compensating functions, like thinking and feeling Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 795 The extraverted sensation type is the lover of tangible reality, with little inclination for reflection and no desire to dominate. To feel the object, to have sensations and if possible enjoy them that is his constant aim. He is by no means unlovable, on the contrary, his lively capacity for enjoyment makes him very good company. He is usually a jolly fellow, and sometimes a refined aesthete. In the former case the great problems of life hang on a good or indifferent dinner, and in the latter, it's all a question of good taste Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 607 As the extraverted sensation type has no ideals connected with ideas, he has no reason to act in any way contrary to the reality of things as they are. This manifests itself in all the externals of his life. He dresses well, as befits the occasion; he keeps a good table with plenty of drink for his friends, making them feel very grand, or at least giving them to understand that his refined taste entitles him to make a few demands of them. He may even convince them that certain sacrifices are decidedly worthwhile for the sake of style Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 607 The more sensation predominates, the subject disappears behind the sensation, and the less agreeable does this type [extraverted sensation] become. He develops into a crude pleasure-seeker, or else degenerates into an unscrupulous, effete aesthete. Although the object has become quite indispensable to him, yet, as something existing in its own right, it is none the less devalued. It is ruthlessly exploited and squeezed dry, since now its sole use is to stimulate sensation Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 608 What comes from inside seems to the extraverted sensation type as morbid and suspect. He always reduces his thoughts and feelings to objective causes, to influences emanating from objects, quite unperturbed by the most glaring violations of logic. Once he can get back to tangible reality in any form he can breathe again. In this respect he is surprisingly credulous Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 607 The bondage to the object is carried to the extreme limit. In consequence, the unconscious is forced out of its compensatory role into open opposition. Above all, the repressed intuitions begin to assert themselves in the form of projections. The wildest suspicions arise; if the object is a sexual one, jealous fantasies and anxiety states gain the upper hand Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 608 More acute cases develop every sort of phobia, and, in particular, compulsion symp- toms. The pathological contents have a markedly unreal character, with a frequent moral or religious streak. A pettifogging captiousness follows, or a grotesquely punctilious morality combined with primitive "magical" superstitions that fall back on abstruse rites Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 608 All these things have their source in the repressed inferior functions which have been driven into harsh opposition to the conscious attitude, and they appear in a guise that is all the more striking because they rest on the most absurd assumptions, in complete contrast to the conscious sense of reality Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 608 The whole structure of thought and feeling seems, in this second personality, to be twisted into a pathological parody: reason turns into hair-splitting pedantry, morality into dreary moralizing and blatant Pharisaism, religion into ridiculous superstition, and intuition, the noblest gift of man, into meddlesome officiousness, poking into every corner; instead of gazing into the far distance, it descends to the lowest level of human meanness Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 608 No other human type can equal the extraverted sensation type in realism. His sense for objective facts is extraordinarily developed. His life is an accumulation of actual experiences of concrete objects, and the more pronounced his type, the less use does he make of his experience. In certain cases the events in his life hardly deserve the name "experience" at all. What he experiences serves at most as a guide to fresh sensations; anything new that comes within his range of interest is acquired by way of sensation and has to serves its ends Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 606 The subjective factor has, from the earliest times and among all peoples, remained in large measure constant, elementary perceptions and cognitions being almost universally the same, it is a reality that is just as firmly established as the external object. By the subjective factor I understand that psychological action or reaction which merges with the effect produced by the object and so gives rise to a new psychic datum Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 622 How extraordinarily strong the subjective factor can be is shown most clearly in art. Its predominance sometimes amounts to a complete suppression of the object's influence Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 647 It is precisely in the present epoch, and particularly in those movements which are somewhat ahead of the time, that the subjective factor reveals itself in exaggerated, tasteless forms of expression bordering on caricature. Owing to the extraverted overvaluation of the object e.g., the art of the present day Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 645 The image is called primordial when it possesses an archaic character. I [Jung] speak of its archaic character when the image is in striking accord with familiar mythological motifs. It then expresses material primarily derived from the collective unconscious, and indicates at the same time that the factors influencing the conscious situation of the moment are collective rather than personal Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 746 The primordial image, elsewhere also termed archetype, is always collective, i.e., it is at least common to entire peoples or epochs. In all probability the most important mythological motifs are common to all times and races. I [Jung] have, in fact, been able to demonstrate a whole series of motifs from Greek mythology in the dreams and fantasies of pure-bred Negroes suffering from mental disorders Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 747 The primordial image is related just as much to certain palpable, self-perpetuating, and continually operative natural processes as it is to certain inner determinants of psychic life and of life in general. The primordial image expresses the unique and unconditioned creative power of the psyche Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 748 The primordial image frees psychic energy from its bondage to sheer uncomprehended perception. At the same time, it links the energies released by the perception of stimuli to a definite meaning, which then guides action along paths corresponding to this meaning Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 749 It releases unavailable, dammed-up energy by leading the mind back to nature and canalizing sheer instinct into mental forms Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 749 The primordial image has one great advantage over the clarity of the idea, and that is its vitality. It is a self-activating organism, "endowed with generative power" Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 754 The primordial image is an inherited organization of psychic energy, an ingrained system, which not only gives expression to the energic process but facilitates its operation. It shows how the energic process has run its unvarying course from time immemorial, while simultaneously allowing a perpetual repetition of it by means of an apprehension or psychic grasp of situations so that life can continue into the future Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 754 The primordial images, in their totality, constitute a psychic mirror-world. It is a mirror with the peculiar faculty of reflecting the existing contents of consciousness not in their known and customary form but, as it were, sub specie aeternitatis, somewhat as a million-year-old consciousness might see them. Such a consciousness would see the becoming and passing away of things simultaneously with their momentary existence in the present, and not only that, it would also see what was before their becoming and will be after their passing hence Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 649 The predominance of the subjective factor in consciousness naturally involves a devaluation of the object. The object is not given the importance that belongs to it by right. Just as it plays too great a role in the extraverted attitude, it has too little meaning for the introvert. To the extent that his consciousness is subjectivized and excessive importance attached to the ego, the object is put in a position which in the end becomes untenable. The object is a factor whose power cannot be denied, whereas the ego is a very limited and fragile thing Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 626 It would be a very different matter if the Self opposed the object. Self and world are commensurable factors; hence a normal introverted attitude is as justifiable and valid as a normal extraverted attitude. But if the ego has usurped the claims of the subject, this naturally produces, by way of compensation, an unconscious reinforcement of the influence of the object Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 626 In spite of positively convulsive efforts to ensure the superiority of the ego, the object comes to exert an overwhelming influence, which is all the more invincible because it seizes on the individual unawares and forcibly obtrudes itself on his consciousness Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 626 As a result of the ego's unadapted relation to the object for a desire to dominate it is not adaptation a compensatory relation arises in the unconscious which makes itself felt as an absolute and irrepressible tie to the object. The more the ego struggles to preserve its independence, freedom from obligation, and superiority, the more it becomes enslaved to the objective data Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 626 The individual's freedom of mind is fettered by the ignominy of his financial dependence, his freedom of action trembles in the face of public opinion, his moral superiority collapses in a morass of inferior relationships, and his desire to dominate ends in a pitiful craving to be loved Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 626 It is now the unconscious that takes care of the relation to the object, and it does so in a way that is calculated to bring the illusion of power and the fantasy of superiority to utter ruin. The object assumes terrifying proportions in spite of the conscious attempt to degrade it Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 626 In consequence, the ego's efforts to detach itself from the object and get it under control become all the more violent. In the end it surrounds itself with a regular system of defences (aptly described by Adler) for the purpose of preserving at least the illusion of superiority. The introvert's alienation from the object is now complete; he wears himself out with defence measures on the one hand, while on the other he makes fruitless attempts to impose his will on the object and assert himself. These efforts are constantly being frustrated by the overwhelming impressions received from the object Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 626 The object continually imposes itself on him against his will, it arouses in him the most disagreeable and intractable affects and persecutes him at every step. A tremendous inner struggle is needed all the time in order to "keep going." The typical form his neurosis takes is psychasthenia, a malady characterized on the one hand by extreme sensitivity and on the other by great proneness to exhaustion and chronic fatigue Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 626 The introvert's fear of objects develops into a peculiar kind of cowardliness; he shrinks from making himself or his opinions felt, fearing that this will only increase the object's power Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 627 He is terrified of strong affects in others, and is hardly ever free from the dread of falling under hostile influences Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 627 Objects possess puissant and terrifying qualities for him qualities he cannot consciously discern in them, but which he imagines he sees through his unconscious perception Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 627 As the introvert's relation to the object is very largely repressed, it takes place via the unconscious, where it becomes charged with the latter's qualities. These qualities are mostly infantile and archaic, so that the relation to the object becomes primitive too, and the object seems endowed with magical powers Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 627 Anything strange and new arouses fear and mistrust, as though concealing unknown perils; heirlooms and suchlike are attached to the introvert's soul as by invisible threads; any change is upsetting, if not positively dangerous, as it seems to denote a magical animation of the object Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 627 The introvert's ideal is a lonely island where nothing moves except what he permits to move Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 627 Since the introverted feeling type appears rather cold and reserved, it might seem on a superficial view that such women have no feelings at all. But this would be quite wrong. Such a misunderstanding is a common occurrence in the life of this type, and is used as a weighty argument against the possibility of any deeper feeling relation to the object Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 641 It is principally among women that I have found the predominance of introverted feeling. "Still waters run deep" is very true of such women. They are mostly silent, inaccessible, hard to understand; often they hide behind a childish or banal mask, and their temperament is inclined to melancholy Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 640 The introverted feeling type neither shine nor reveal themselves. As they are mainly guided by their subjective feelings, their true motives generally remain hidden. Their outward demeanour is harmonious, inconspicuous, giving an impression of pleasing repose, or of sympathetic response Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 640 Introverted feeling is conditioned subjectively and is only secondarily concerned with the object. It seldom appears on the surface and is generally misunderstood. It is a feeling which seems to devalue the object, and it therefore manifests itself for the most part negatively Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 638 Secret feelings give a woman of this type a mysterious power that may prove terribly fascinating to the extraverted man, for it touches his unconscious Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 642 The existence of positive feeling can be inferred only indirectly. The aim of introverted feeling is not to adjust itself to the object, but to subordinate it in an unconscious effort to realize the underlying images. It is continually seeking an image which has no existence in reality, but which it has seen in a vision. It glides unheedingly over all objects that do not fit in with its aim. It strives after inner intensity, for which the objects serve at most as a stimulus Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 638 The primordial images are, of course, just as much ideas as feelings. Fundamental ideas, ideas like God, freedom, and immortality, are just as much feeling-values as they are significant ideas. Everything, therefore, that we have said about introverted thinking is equally true of introverted feeling, only here everything is felt while there it was thought. But the very fact that thoughts can generally be expressed more intelligibly than feelings demands a more than ordinary descriptive or artistic ability before the real wealth of this feeling can be even approximately presented or communicated to the world. If subjective thinking can be understood only with difficulty because of it unrelatedness, this is true in even higher degree of subjective feeling Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 639 In order to communicate with others, it [feeling] has to find an external form not only acceptable to itself, but capable also of arousing a parallel feeling in them. Thanks to the relatively great inner (as well as outer) uniformity of human beings, it is actually possible to do this, though the form acceptable to feeling is extraordinarily difficult to find so long as it is still mainly oriented to the fathomless store of primordial images Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 639 If, however, feeling is falsified by an egocentric attitude, it at once becomes unsympathetic, because it is then concerned mainly with the ego. It inevitably creates the impression of sentimental self-love, of trying to make itself interesting, and even of morbid self-admiration. The intensification of egocentric feeling only leads to inane transports of feeling for their own sake. This is the mystical, ecstatic stage which opens the way for the extraverted functions that feeling has repressed Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 639 Just as introverted thinking is counterbalanced by a primitive feeling, to which objects attach themselves with a magical force, introverted feeling is counterbalanced by a primitive thinking, whose concretism and slavery to facts surpass all bounds. Feeling progressively emancipates itself from the object and creates for itself a freedom of action and conscience that is purely subjective and may even renounce all traditional values. But so much the more does unconscious thinking fall a victim to the power of objective reality Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 639 Introverted feeling makes little effort to respond to the real emotions of the other person. They are more often damped down and rebuffed, or cooled off by a negative value judgment Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 640 The introverted feeling type has no desire to affect others, to impress, influence, or change them in any way. If this outward aspect is more pronounced, it arouses a suspicion of indifference and coldness, which may actually turn into a disregard for the comfort and well-being of others. One is distinctly aware then of the movement of feeling away from the object Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 640 The mysterious power of this type comes from the deeply felt, unconscious images, but consciously the introverted feeling type is apt to relate it to the ego, where upon her influence becomes debased into a personal tyranny. Whenever the unconscious subject is identified with the ego, the mysterious power of intensive feeling turns into a banal and overweening desire to dominate, into vanity and despotic bossiness. This produces a type of woman notorious for her unscrupulous ambition and mischievous cruelty. It is a change, however that leads to neurosis Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 642 Although the tendency [of the introverted feeling type] to overpower or coerce the other person with her secret feelings rarely plays a disturbing role in the normal type, some trace of it nevertheless seeps through in the form of a domineering influence often difficult to define. It is sensed as a sort of stifling or oppressive feeling which holds everybody around her under a spell Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 642 Although, with the introverted feeling type, there is a constant readiness for peaceful and harmonious co-existence, strangers are shown no touch of amiability, no gleam of responsive warmth, but are met with apparent indifference or a repelling coldness. Often they are made to feel entirely superfluous. This type observes a benevolent though critical neutrality, coupled with a faint trace of superiority that soon takes the wind out of the sails of a sensitive person. Any stormy emotion, however, will be struck down with murderous coldness Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 640 The introverted feeling type's feelings are intensive rather than extensive. They develop in depth. While an extensive feeling of sympathy can express itself in appropriate words and deeds, and thus quickly gets back to normal again, an intensive sympathy, being shut off from every means of expression, acquires a passionate depth that comprises a whole world of misery and simple gets benumbed. To the outside world, or to the blind eyes of the extravert, this intensive sympathy looks like coldness, because usually it does nothing visible, and an extraverted consciousness is unable to believe in invisible forces Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 641 Introverted feeling remains normal so long as the ego feels subordinate to the unconscious subject, and feeling is aware of something higher and mightier than the ego, otherwise it leads to neurosis Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 643 With the introverted intuitive type, a compulsion neurosis expresses itself with hypochondriacal symptoms, hypersensitivity of the sense organs, and compulsive ties to particular persons or objects. A condition occurring through a forced exaggeration of the conscious attitude Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 663 In the introverted sensation type a compulsion neurosis results as soon as the unconscious becomes antagonistic. The archaic intuitions come to the surface and exert their pernicious influence, forcing themselves on the individual and producing compulsive ideas of the most perverse kind. Hysterical features are masked by symptoms of exhaustion Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 654 Since extraverted intuition is directed predominantly to objects, it actually comes very close to sensation; indeed, the expectant attitude to external objects is just as likely to make use of sensation. Hence, if intuition is to function properly, sensation must to a large extent be suppressed Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 611 This type seizes on new objects or situations with great intensity, sometimes with extraordinary enthusiasm, only to abandon them cold-bloodedly, without any compunction and apparently without remembering them, as soon as their range is known and no further developments can be divined. So long as a new possibility is in the offing, the intuitive is bound to it with the shackles of fate. It is as though his whole life vanished in the new situation Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 613 The extraverted intuitive claims a freedom and exemption from restraint, submitting his decisions to no rational judgment and relying entirely on his nose for the possibilities that chance throws in his way Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 615 The extraverted intuitive is continually scenting out new possibilities which he pursues with equal unconcern for his own welfare and for that of others, pressing on quite heedless of human considerations and tearing down what has been built in his everlasting search for change Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 658 The extraverted intuitive type is uncommonly important both economically and culturally. If his intentions are good, i.e., if his attitude is not too egocentric, he can render exceptional service as the initiator or promoter of new enterprises. He is the natural champion of all minorities with a future. Because he is able, when oriented more to people than things, to make an intuitive diagnosis of their abilities and potentialities, he can also "make" men. His capacity to inspire courage or to kindle enthusiasm for anything new is unrivalled, although he may already have dropped it by the morrow Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 614 The stronger his intuition, the more his ego becomes fused with all the possibilities he envisions. He brings his vision to life, he presents it convincingly and with dramatic fire, he embodies it, so to speak. But this is not play-acting, it is a kind of fate Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 614 Since the extraverted intuitive tends to rely most predominantly on his vision, his moral efforts become one-sided; he makes himself and his life symbolic adapted, it is true, to the inner and eternal meaning of events, but unadapted to present-day reality. He thus deprives himself of any influence upon it because he remains uncomprehended. His language is not the one currently spoken it has become too subjective. His arguments lack the convincing power of reason. He can only profess or proclaim. His is "the voice of one crying in the wilderness" Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 662 Because extraverted intuition is oriented by the object, there is a marked dependence on external situations, but it is altogether different than the dependence of the sensation type Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 613 The extraverted intuitive type would seem to be more common among women than among men. In women the intuitive capacity shows itself not so much in the professional as in the social sphere. Such women understand the art of exploiting every social occasion, they make the right social connections, they seek out men with prospects only to abandon everything again for the sake of a new possibility Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 613 The extraverted intuitive will experience through a forced exaggeration of the conscious attitude, a complete subordination to inner perceptions, the unconscious goes over to the opposition, giving rise to compulsive sensations whose excessive dependence on the object directly contradicts the conscious attitude Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 663 The exrraverted intuitive exempts himself from the restrictions of reason only to fall victim to neurotic compulsions in the form of over-subtle ratiocinations, hairsplitting dialectics, and a compulsive tie to the sensation aroused by the object. His conscious attitude towards both sensation and object is one of ruthless superiority. Not that he means to be ruthless or superior he simply does not see the object that everyone else sees and rides roughshod over it, just as the sensation type has no eyes for its soul. But sooner or later the object takes revenge in the form of compulsive hypochondriacal ideas, phobias, and every imaginable kind of absurd bodily sensation Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 615 Thinking and feeling, the indispensable components of conviction, are his [extraverted intuitive] inferior functions, carrying no weight and hence incapable of effectively withstanding the power of intuition. And yet these functions are the only ones that could compensate its supremacy by supplying the judgment which the intuitive type totally lacks. The intuitive's morality is governed neither by thinking nor by feeling; he has his own characteristic morality, which consists in a loyalty to his vision and in voluntary submission to its authority Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 613 The extraverted intuitive's consideration for the welfare of others is weak. Their psychic well-being counts as little with him as does his own. He has equally little regard for their convictions and way of life, and on this account he is often put down as an immoral and unscrupulous adventurer Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 613 The extraverted intuitive represses the sensation of the object, giving rise to a compensatory extraverted sensation function of an archaic character. The unconscious personality can best be described as an extraverted sensation type of a rather low and primitive order. Instinctuality and intemperance are the hallmarks of this sensation, combined with an extraordinary dependence on sense-impressions Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 663 The extraverted intuitive's consideration for the welfare of others is weak. Their psychic well-being counts as little with him as does his own. He has equally little regard for their convictions and way of life, and on this account he is often put down as an immoral and unscrupulous adventurer Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 613 The extraverted intuitive's remarkable indifference to external objects is shared by the introverted intuitive in relation to inner objects Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 658 Apperception is a psychic process by which a new content is articulated with similar, already existing contents in such a way that it becomes understood, apprehended, or "clear." We distinguish active from passive apperception Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 683 Active apperception is a process by which the subject, of his own accord and from his own motives, consciously apprehends a new content with attention and assimilates it to other contents already constellated Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 683 Passive apperception is a process by which a new content forces itself upon consciousness either from without (through the senses) or from within (from the unconscious) and, as it were, compels attention and enforces apprehension Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 683 Such contents are what Lévy-Bruhl calls the représentations collectives of primitives. Among primitives, the représentations collectives are at the same time collective feelings, as Lévy-Bruhl has shown. Because of this collective feeling-value he calls the représentations collectives "mystical," since they are not merely intellectual but emotional Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 692 Among civilized peoples, too, certain collective ideas God, justice, fatherland, etc. are bund up with collective feelings. This collective quality adheres not only to particular psychic elements or contents but to whole functions (q.v.). Thus the thinking function as a whole can have a collective quality, when it possesses general validity and accords with the laws of logic. Similarly, the feeling function as a whole can be collective, when it is identical with the general feeling and accords with general expectations, the general moral consciousness, etc. In the same way, sensation and intuition are collective when they are at the same time characteristic of a large group of men Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 692 Thinking is oriented by the object and fed from objective data transmitted largely by sense perception, therefore it need not be purely concretistic since it can just as well be purely ideal thinking Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 577 The thinking type restricts the products of sensation and intuition since choice is made by a rational judgment. It is not the intensity of a sensation that decides action but judgment Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 602 The thinking function as a whole can have a collective quality when it possesses general validity and accords with the laws of logic Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 692 Thinking is a directed function, and so is feeling. When these functions are concerned not with a rational choice of objects, or with the qualities and interrelations of objects, but with the perception of accidentals which the actual object never lacks, they at once lose the attribute of directedness and, with it, something of their rational character, because they then accept the rational. They begin to be irrational. Thinking and feeling find fulfillment only when they are in complete harmony with the laws of reason Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 776 Concretism is a concept which falls under the more general concept of participation mystique. Just as the latter represents a fusion of the individual with external objects, concretism represents a fusion of thinking and feeling with sensation, so that the object of one is at the same time the object of the other. This fusion prevents any differentiation of thinking and feeling and keeps them both within the sphere of sensation; they remain its servants and can never be developed into pure functions Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 698 Concretism, therefore, is an archaism. The magical influence of the fetish is not experienced as a subjective state of feeling but sensed as a magical effect. That is concretistic feeling. The primitive does not experience the idea of divinity as a subjective content; for him the sacred tree is the abode of the god, or even the god himself. That is concretistic thinking. In civilized man, concretistic thinking consists in the inability to conceive of anything except immediately obvious facts transmitted by the senses, or in the inability to discriminate between subjective feeling and the sensed object Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 697 Differentiation is a form of mental activity that frees a content from its association with the irrelevant elements by distinguishing it from them or, in other words, differentiating it Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 677 Differentiation means the development of differences, the separation of parts from a whole. It consists in the separation of the function from other functions, and in the separation of its individual parts from each other. Without differentiation direction is impossible, since the direction of a function towards a goal depends on the elimination of anything irrelevant. Fusion with the irrelevant precludes direction; only a differentiated function is capable of being directed Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 705 Feeling is primarily a process that takes place between the ego and a given content, a process, moreover, that imparts to the content a definite value in the sense of acceptance or rejection ("like" or "dislike"). The process can also appear isolated, as it were, in the form of a "mood," regardless of the momentary contents of consciousness or momentary sensations Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 724 Feeling, therefore, is an entirely subjective process, which may be in every respect independent of external stimuli, though it allies itself with every sensation. Even an "indifferent" sensation possesses a feeling-tone, namely that of indifference, which again expresses some sort of valuation. Hence feeling is a kind of judgment, differing from intellectual judgment in that its aim is not to establish conceptual relations but to set up a subjective criterion of acceptance or rejection. Valuation by feeling extends to every content of consciousness, of whatever kind it may be Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 725 Feeling may be distinguished from affect, in spite of the fact that the dividing line is fluid, since every feeling, after attaining a certain strength, releases physical innervations, thus becoming an affect Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 681 Feeling restricts the products of sensation and intuition since the choice is made by a rational judgment. It is not the intensity of a sensation that decides action but judgment (feeling) Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 602 One can feel "correctly" only when feeling is not disturbed by anything else. Nothing disturbs feeling so much as thinking. It is therefore understandable that thinking will be kept in abeyance as much as possible Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 598 If feeling is falsified by an egocentric attitude, it at once becomes unsympathetic, because it is then concerned mainly with the ego. It inevitably creates the impression of sentimental self-love, of trying to make itself interesting, and even of morbid self-admiration Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 639 Identification is a psychological process in which the personality is partially or totally dissimilated. Identification is an alienation of the subject from himself for the sake of the object, in which he is, so to speak, disguised Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 738 For example, identification with the father means, in practice, adopting all the father's ways of behaving, as though the son were the same as the father and not a separate individuality Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 738 Identification differs from imitation in that it is an unconscious imitation, whereas imitation is a conscious copying. Imitation is an indispensable aid in developing the youthful personality. It is beneficial so long as it does not serve as a mere convenience and hinder the development of ways and means suited to the individual Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 738 Similarly, identification can be beneficial so long as the individual cannot go his own way. But when a better possibility presents itself, identification shows its morbid character by becoming just as great a hindrance as it was an unconscious help and support before. It now has a dissociative effect, splitting the individual into two mutually estranged personalities Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 738 Identification does not always apply to persons but may also apply to things (e.g., a movement of some kind, a business, etc.) and to psychological functions. The latter kind is, in fact, particularly important Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 739 Identification then leads to the formation of a secondary character, the individual identifying with his best developed function to such an extent that he alienates himself very largely or even entirely from his original character, with the result that his true individuality falls into the unconscious. This is nearly always the rule with people who have one highly differentiated function. It is, in fact, a necessary transitional stage on the way to individuation Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 739 The primordial image, elsewhere also termed archetype, is always collective, i.e., it is at least common to entire peoples or epochs. In all probability the most important mythological motifs are common to all times and races. I [Jung] have, in fact, been able to demonstrate a whole series of motifs from Greek mythology in the dreams and fantasies of pure-bred Negroes suffering from mental disorders Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 747 The primordial image is the precursor of the idea, and its matrix. By detaching it from the concretism peculiar and necessary to the primordial image, reason develops it into a concept i.e., an idea which differs from all other concepts in that it is not a datum of experience but is actually the underlying principle of all experience. The idea derives this quality from the primordial image, which, as an expression of the specific structure of the brain, gives every experience a definite form Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 750 The term introjection was introduced by Avenarius to correspond with projection. The expulsion of a subjective content into an object, which is what Avenarius meant, Ferenczi has now defined introjection as the opposite of projection, namely as an indrawing of the object into the subjective sphere of interest, while projection is an expulsion of subjective contents into the object. Introjection is a sort of "diluting process," an "expansion of the circle of interest" Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 767 Reductive means 'leading back.' The term is used to denote a method of psychological interpretation which regards the unconscious product not as a symbol but semiotically, as a sign or symptom of an underlying process Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 788 The reductive method traces the unconscious product back to its elements, no matter whether these be reminiscences of events that actually took place, or elementary psychic processes. The reductive method is oriented backwards, in contrast to the constructive method, whether in the purely historical sense or in the figurative sense of tracing complex, differentiated factors back to something more general and more elementary Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 788 The interpretive methods of both Freud and Adler are reductive, since in both cases there is a reduction to the elementary processes of wishing or striving, which in the last resort are of an infantile or physiological nature Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 788 Reduction has a disintegrative effect on the real significance of the unconscious product, since this is either traced back to its historical antecedents and thereby annihilated, or integrated once again with the same elementary process whence it arose Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 788 Sensation is chiefly conditioned by the object, those objects that excite the strongest sensations will be decisive for the individual's psychology. The result is a strong sensuous tie to the object. Sensation is therefore a vital function equipped with the strongest vital instinct Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 605 Abstract sensation is a sensation that is abstracted or separated from the other psychic elements. Abstract sensation is a differentiated kind of perception, which might be termed "aesthetic" in so far as, obeying its own principle, it detaches itself from all contamination with the different elements in the perceived object and from all admixtures of thought and feeling, and thus attains a degree of purity beyond the reach of concrete sensation Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 794 Abstract sensation, like every abstraction, is always associated with the will, i.e., with a sense of direction. The will that is directed to abstract sensation is an expression and application of the aesthetic sensation attitude Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 794 Abstract sensation immediately picks out the most salient sensuous attributes, e.g., of a flower and its redness, and by makes this the sole or at least the principal content of consciousness, entirely detached from all other admixtures. Abstract sensation is found chiefly among artists. Like every abstraction, it is a product of functional differentiation Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 794 Concrete sensation is a reactive phenomenon, in contrast to abstract sensation which is always associated with the will, i.e., with a sense of direction Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 794 Concrete sensation conveys a full perception, e.g., in the case of a flower. The perception not only of the flower as such, but also of the stem, leaves, habitat, and so on. It is also instantly mingled with feelings of pleasure or dislike which the sight of the flower evokes, or with simultaneous olfactory perceptions, or with thoughts about its botanical classification, etc. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 794 Concrete sensation never appears in "pure" form, but is always mixed up with ideas, feelings, thoughts Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 794 With men the anima is usually personified by the unconscious as a woman; with women the animus is personified as a man. In every case where the individuality is unconscious, and therefore associated with the soul, the soul-image has the character of the same sex Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 808 In all cases where there is an identity with the persona, and the soul accordingly is unconscious, the soul-image is transferred to a real person. This person is the object of intense love or equally intense hate (or fear). The influence of such a person is immediate and absolutely compelling, because it always provokes an effective response Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 808 The affect is due to the fact that a real, conscious adaptation to the person representing the soul-image is impossible. Because an objective relationship is non-existent and out of the question, the libido gets dammed up and explodes in an outburst of affect. Affects always occur where there is a failure of adaptation Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 808 Conscious adaptation to the person representing the soul-image is impossible precisely because the subject is unconscious of the soul. Were he conscious of it, it could be distinguished from the object, whose immediate effects might then be mitigated, since the potency of the object depends on the projection of the soul-image. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 808 Precisely because the new symbol is born of man's highest spiritual aspirations and must at the same time spring from the deepest roots of his being, it cannot be a one-sided product of the most highly differentiated mental functions but must derive equally from the lowest and most primitive levels of the psyche. For this collaboration of opposing states to be possible at all, they must first face one another in the fullest conscious opposition. This necessarily entails a violent disunion with oneself, to the point where thesis and antithesis negate one another, while the ego is forced to acknowledge its absolute participation in both Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 824 The living symbol cannot come to birth in a dull or poorly developed mind, for such a mind will be content with the already existing symbols offered by established tradition. Only the passionate yearning of a highly developed mind, for which the traditional symbol is no longer the unified expression of the rational and the irrational, of the highest and the lowest, can create a new symbol Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 823 The raw material shaped by thesis and antithesis, and in the shaping of which the opposites are united, is the living symbol. Its profundity of meaning is inherent in the raw material itself, the very stuff of the psyche, transcending time and dissolution; and its configurations by the opposites ensures its sovereign power over all the psychic functions Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 828 Hysteria is characterized by a centrifugal movement of libido, while in schizophrenia the movement is more centripetal. The reverse obtains, however, when the illness has fully established its compensatory effects Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 859 In the hysteric the libido is then hampered in its movement of expansion and is forced to regress upon itself. The patients cease to partake in the common life, are wrapped up in their daydreams, keep to their beds, remain shut up in their sickrooms, etc.

Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 859 During the incubation of his illness the schizophrenic likewise turns away from the outer world in order to withdraw into himself, but when the period of morbid compensation arrives, he seems constrained to draw attention to himself, to force himself upon the notice of those around him, by his extravagant, insupportable, or directly aggressive behavior Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 859 Of these perhaps the most important was Claudius Galen, the Greek physician who lived in the second century A.D. He distinguished four basic temperaments: the sanguine, the phlegmatic, the choleric, and melancholic Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 883 The underlying idea goes back to the fifth century B.C., to the teachings of Hippocrates, that the human body was composed of the four elements, air, water, fire, and earth. Corresponding to these elements, four substances were to be found in the living body, blood, phlegm, yellow bile, and black bile. It was Galen's idea that, by the varying admixture of these four substances, men could be divided into four classes Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 883 Those in whom there was a preponderance of blood belonged to the sanguine type; a preponderance of phlegm produced the phlegmatic; yellow bile produced the choleric, and black bile the melancholic. As our language shows, these differences of temperament have passed into history, though they have, of course, long since been superseded as a physiological theory Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 883 The earliest sign of extraversion in a child is his quick adaptation to the environment, and the extraordinary attention he gives to objects and especially to the effect he has on them Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 896 Fear of objects is minimal; he lives and moves among them with confidence. His apprehension is quick but imprecise. He appears to develop more rapidly than the introverted child, since he is less reflective and usually without fear Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 896 The extraverted child feels no barrier between himself and objects and can therefore play with them freely and learn through them. He likes to carry his enterprises to the extreme and exposes himself to risks. Everything unknown is alluring Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 896 One of the earliest signs of introversion in a child is a reflective, thoughtful manner, marked shyness and even fear of unknown objects. Very early there appears a tendency to assert himself over familiar objects, and attempts are made to master them. Everything unknown is regarded with mistrust; outside influences are usually met with violent resistance Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 897 The child wants his own way, and under no circumstances will he submit to an alien rule he cannot understand. When he asks questions, it is not from curiosity or a desire to create a sensation, but because he wants names, meanings, explanation to give him subjective protection against the object Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 897 Thus very early in an introverted child the characteristic defensive attitude can be noted which the adult introvert displays toward the object; just as in an extraverted child one can very early observe a marked assurance and initiative, a happy trustfulness in his dealings with objects Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 897 This is indeed the basic feature of the extraverted attitude: psychic life is, as it were, enacted outside the individual in objects and objective relationships. In extreme cases there is even a sort of blindness for his own individuality Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 897 The introvert, on the contrary, always acts as though the object possessed a superior power over him against which he has to defend himself. His real world is the inner one Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 897 The distinction between mind and body is an artificial dichotomy, an act of discrimination based far more on the peculiarity of intellectual cognition than on the nature of things. In fact, so intimate is the intermingling of bodily and psychic traits that not only can we draw far-reaching inferences as to the constitution of the psyche from the constitution of the body, but we can also infer from psychic peculiarities the corresponding bodily characteristics Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 916 It is true that the latter process is far more difficult, not because the body is less influenced by the psyche than the psyche by the body, but for quite another reason. In taking the psyche as our starting point, we work from the relatively unknown to the known; while in the opposite case we have the advantage of starting from something known, that is, from the visible body

Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 916 Despite all the psychology we think we possess today; the psyche is still infinitely more obscure to us than the visible surface of the body. The psyche is still a foreign, barely explored country of which we have only indirect knowledge, mediated by conscious functions that are open to almost endless possibilities of deception Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 916 To the same class of interpretations from outward signs belong palmistry, Gall's phrenology, Lavater's physiognomy, and more recently graphology, Kretschmer's physiological types, and Rorschach's klexographic method. As we can see, there are any number of paths leading from outside inwards, from the physical to the psychic, and it is necessary that research should follow this direction until the elementary psychic facts are established with sufficient certainty 91 Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 7 These characteristics of the complex throw a significant light on its origin. It obviously arises from the clash between a demand of adaptation and the individual's constitutional inability to meet the challenge. Seen in this light, the complex is a valuable symptom which helps us to diagnose an individual disposition Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 926 Experience shows us that complexes are infinitely varied, yet careful comparison reveals a relatively small number of typical primary forms, which are all built upon the first experiences of childhood. This must necessarily be so, because the individual disposition is already a factor in infancy; it is innate, and not acquired in the course of life Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 927 A study of the complexes leads logically to the problem of their origin, experience shows that complexes always contain something like a conflict, or at least are either the cause or the effect of a conflict. At any rate the characteristics of conflict shock, upheaval, mental agony, inner strife are peculiar to the complexes Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 924 They are the "sore spots," the bétes noires, the "skeletons in the cupboard" which we do not like to remember and still less to be reminded of by others, but which frequently come back to mind unbidden and in the most unwelcome fashion. They always contain memories, wishes, fears, duties, needs, or insights which somehow we can never really grapple with, and for this reason they constantly interfere with our conscious life in a disturbing and usually a harmful way Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 924 Complexes obviously represent a kind of inferiority in the broadest senseit only means that something discordant, unassimilated, and antagonistic exists, perhaps as an obstacle, but also as an incentive to greater effort, and so, perhaps, to new possibilities of achievement Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 925 Complexes are focal or nodal points of psychic life which we would not wish to do without; indeed, they should not be missing, for otherwise psychic activity would come to a fatal standstill. They point to the unresolved problems in the individual, the places where he has suffered a defeat, at least for the time being, and where there is something he cannot evade or overcome his weak spots in every sense of the word Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 925 I need only mention the whole mythological complex of the dying and resurgent god and its primitive precursors all the way down to the recharging of fetishes and churingas with magical force. It expresses a transformation of attitude by means of which a new potential, a new manifestation of life, a new fruitfulness, is created. Carl Jung, CW 6, Page 325 The inner personality is the way one behaves in relation to one's inner psychic processes; it is the inner attitude, the characteristic face, that is turned towards the unconscious. I call the outer attitude, the outward face, the persona; the inner attitude, the inward face, I call the anima. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 803 … in a man the soul, i.e., anima, or inner attitude, is represented in the unconscious by definite persons with the corresponding qualities. Such an image is called a "soul-image." Sometimes these images are of quite unknown or mythological figures. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 808 The Christian principle which unites the opposites is the worship of God, in Buddhism it is the worship of the self (self-development), while in Spitteler and Goethe it is the worship of the soul symbolized by the worship of woman. Implicit in this categorization is the modern individualistic principle on the one hand, and on the other a primitive Polydaemonism which assigns to every race, every tribe, every family, every individual its specific religious principle. Carl Jung, CW 6,

Para 376 [The patient] … is quite right to treat the anima as an autonomous personality and to address personal questions to her. I mean this as an actual technique … The art of it consists only in allowing our invisible partner to make herself herd … [O]ne should cultivate the art of conversing with oneself in the setting provided by an affect … Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 322 [In the German text the word Anima is used only twice … Everywhere else the word used is Seele (soul). In this translation anima is substituted for "soul" when it refers specifically to the feminine component in a man … "Soul" is retained only when it refers to the psychic factor common to both sexes. The distinction is not always easy to make … Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 803, fn 80. As to the common human qualities, the character of the anima can be deduced from that of the persona … But as regards its individual qualities, nothing can be deduced … We can only be certain that when a man is identical with his persona, his individual qualities will be associated with the anima. This association frequently gives rise in dreams to the symbol of psychic pregnancy … The child that is to be born signifies the individuality, which, though present, is not yet conscious. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 806 His mistress appears before him … seeming to him like a goddess in heaven. The repressed erotic impression has activated the latent primordial image of the goddess, i.e., the archetypal sol-image. Through insight into the actual existence of his erotic desire, [the shepherd of] Hermas was able to acknowledge this metaphysical reality. The sensual libido … now passed to his soul-image and invested it with the reality which the object had claimed exclusively for itself. Consequently his soul could speak to good effect and successfully enforce her demands. Carl Jung, CW 6, Para 383 Prometheus surrenders himself … to his soul, that is, to the function of relation to the inner world … Prometheus concedes her an absolute significance, as mistress and guide … He sacrifices his individual ego to the soul, to the relation with the unconscious as the matrix of eternal images and meanings … Prometheus loses all connection with the surrounding world, and hence also the very necessary corrective offered by external reality. Carl CW 6, Para 278 I am first and foremost a doctor and practising psychotherapist, and all my psychological formulations are based on the experiences gained in the hard course of my daily professional work. Carl Jung, CW 6, Page 18 Carl Jung: *CW 7 "Two Essays on Analytical Psychology" Nature is often obscure or impenetrable, but she is not, like man, deceitful. We must therefore take it that the dream is just what it pretends to be, neither more nor less. If it shows something in a negative light, there is no reason for assuming that it is meant positively. Carl Jung, CW 7, Page 162. I expose myself to his critical judgment because I feel it is the duty of one who goes his own way to inform society of what he finds on his voyage of discovery, be it cooling water for the thirsty or the sandy wastes of unfruitful error. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 201 stands in sorry contrast to the dazzling persona … [ T] he "nothing but fantasy" attitude will never persuade me to regard my anima manifestations as anything more than fatuous weakness. If, however, I take the line that the world is outside and inside, … I must logically accept the upsets and annoyances that come to me from inside as symptoms of faulty adaptation to the conditions of that inner world. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 428 When the anima continually thwarts the good intentions of the conscious mind, by contriving a private life that stands in sorry contrast to the dazzling persona, it is exactly the same as when a naïve individual, who has not the ghost of a persona, encounters the most painful difficulties in his passage through the world. … But if we reverse the picture and confront the man who possesses a brilliant persona with the anima, … then we shall see that the latter is just as well informed about the anima and her affairs as the former is about the world. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 318 Just as the persona is the image of himself which the subject presents to the world, and which is seen by the world, so the anima is the image of the subject in his relation to the collective unconscious … One could also say: the anima is the face of the subject as seen by the collective unconscious … If the ego adopts the standpoint of the anima, adaptation to reality is severely compromised. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 521 … when anima forfeits the daemonic power of an autonomous complex … she is depotentiated … no longer is the soul to be called "Mistress," but a psychological function of an intuitive nature, akin to what the primitives mean when they say, "He has gone into the forest to talk with the spirits" or "My snake spoke with me …" Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 374 The archaic souls, the ha and ka of the Egyptians, are complexes of this kind. At a still higher level, … this complex is invariably of the feminine gender – anima … Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 295 The dissolution of the anima means that we have gained insight into the driving forces of the unconscious, but not that we have made these forces ineffective. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 391) To the degree that the patient takes an active part, the personified figure of anima or animus will disappear. It becomes the function of relationship between conscious and unconscious. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 370 … the immediate goal has been achieved, namely the conquest of the anima as an autonomous complex, and her transformation into a function of relationship between the conscious and the unconscious. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 374 The man who is pauper or parasite will never solve the social question. Carl Jung, CW 7, Page 226 A mask of the collective psyche, a mask that feigns individuality, making others and oneself believe that one is individual, whereas one is simply acting a role through which the collective psyche speaks . . . [it is] a compromise between individual and society as to what a man should appear to be. Carl Jung, CW 7, Page 157 For the purpose of individuation, or self-realization it is essential for a man to distinguish between what he is and how he appears to himself and to others, so it is also necessary for the same purpose that he should become conscious of his invisible system of relations to the unconscious. Carl Jung, CW 7, Page 195 . . . what Freud probably means is the essential fact that every process is a phenomenon of energy, and that all energy can only proceed from the tension of opposites . . . it is sufficiently obvious that life, like any process, has a beginning and an end, and that every beginning is also the beginning of the end. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 34 For if such a large percentage of the population has an insatiable need for this counterpole to the scientific spirit, we can be sure that the collective psyche in every individual – be he never so scientific – has this psychological requirement in equally high degree. A certain kind of "scientific" scepticism and criticism in our time is nothing but a misplaced compensation of the powerful and deep-rooted superstitious impulses of the collective psyche. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 495 Even today, however, astrology is still highly regarded in the East, particularly in Persia, India, and China." One must be smitten with blindness to write such a thing nowadays. The truth is that astrology flourishes as never before. There is a regular library of astrological books and magazines that sell for far better than the best scientific works. The Europeans and Americans who have horoscopes cast for them may be counted not by the hundred thousand but by the million. Astrology is a flourishing industry. Yet the encyclopaedia can say: "The poet Dryden (d. 1701) still had horoscopes cast for his children." Christian Science, too, has swamped Europe and America. Hundreds and thousands of people on both sides of the Atlantic swear by theosophy and anthroposophy, and anyone who believes that the Rosicrucians are a legend of the dim bygone has only to open his eyes to see them as much alive today as they ever were. Folk magic and secret lore have by no means died out. Nor should it be imagined that only the dregs of the populace fall for such superstitions. We have, as we know, to climb very high on the social scale to find the champions of this other principle. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 494 It is sufficient to know that the human psyche is both individual and collective, and that its well-being depends on the natural co-operation of these two apparently contradictory sides. Their union is essentially an irrational life process that can, at most, be described in individual cases, but can neither be brought about, nor understood, nor explained rationally. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 487 Every individual needs revolution, inner division, overthrow of the existing order, and renewal, but not by forcing them upon his neighbors under the hypocritical cloak of Christian love or the sense of social responsibility or any of the other beautiful euphemisms for unconscious urges to personal power. Individual self-reflection return of the individual to the ground of human nature, to his own deepest being with its individual and social destiny—here is the beginning of a cure for the blindness which reigns at the present hour. - C.G. Jung, CW 7, Page 5 Individuation . . .. means to become a single, discrete being, and inasmuch as the concept of individuality embraces that innermost, last, and incomparable uniqueness of our being, it also includes the idea of becoming one's own real self . . . 'coming to selfhood,' or 'self-realization.' Carl Jung, CW 7, Page 240 Something works behind the veil of fantastic images, whether we give this something either a good name or a bad. It is something real, and for this reason its vital manifestations must be taken seriously. Carl Jung, CW 7, Page 240 For Jung, the great benefit of active imagination is to 'distinguish ourselves from the unconscious contents. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 373 I write about things which actually happen, and am not propounding methods of treatment' Carl Jung, CW 7, Page 22 We should never identify ourselves with reason, for man is not and never will be a creature of reason alone, a fact to be noted by all pedantic culture-mongers. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para III We know that the wildest and most moving dramas are played not in the theatre but in the hearts of ordinary men and women who pass by without exciting attention, and who betray to the world nothing of the conflicts that rage within them except possibly by a nervous breakdown. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 425 The old religions with their sublime and ridiculous, their friendly and fiendish symbols did not drop from the blue but were born of this human soul that dwells within us at this moment. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 326 Failure to adapt to this inner world is a negligence entailing just as serious consequences as ignorance and ineptitude in the outer world. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 326 Too much of the animal distorts the civilized man, too much civilization makes sick animals. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 32 Neurosis is self-division. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 18 True education can only start from naked reality, not from a delusive ideal. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 93 Now, since the psychic process, like any other life-process, is not just a causal sequence, but is also a process with a teleological orientation, we might expect dreams to give us certain indicia about the objective causality as well as about the objective tendencies, because they are nothing less than self-portraits of the psychic life-process. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 210 The whole nature of man presupposes woman, both physically and spiritually. His system is tuned into woman from the start, just as it is prepared for a quite definite world where there is water, light, air, salt, carbohydrates etc. Carl Jung, CW 7, Page 188. Love is of fundamental importance in human life and of far greater significance than the individual suspects. Carl Jung, CW 7, Page 218. I call every interpretation which equates the dream images with real objects an interpretation on the objective level... Interpretation on the objective level is analytic, because it breaks down the dream content into memory-complexes that refer to external situations. Carl Jung; CW 7, para. 131. In contrast to this is the interpretation which refers every part of the dream and all the actors in it back to the dreamer himself. This I call interpretation on the subjective level. Interpretation on the subjective level is synthetic, because it detaches the underlying memory-complexes from their external causes, regards them as tendencies or components of the subject, and reunites them with that subject. Carl Jung; CW 7, para. 131. Only what is really oneself has the power to heal. Carl Jung; CW 7, Page 258 The Self is our life's goal, for it is the completest expression of that fateful combination we call individuality. Carl Jung, CW 7, par. 404. If there is anything that we wish to change in the child, we should first examine it and see whether it is not something that could better be changed in ourselves. Carl Jung, CW 7, Page 285. The great problems of life — sexuality, of course, among others — are always related to the primordial images of the collective unconscious. These images are really balancing or compensating factors which correspond with the life presents in actuality. This is not to be marveled at, since these images are deposits representing the accumulated experience of thousands of years of struggle for adaptation and existence. Carl Jung, CW 7, Page 271 Repression is a process that begins in early childhood under the moral influence of the environment and continues through life. Carl Jung, CW 7, para 202. The idea of angels, archangels, "principalities and powers" in St. Paul, the archons of the Gnostics, the heavenly hierarchy of Dionysius the Areopagite, all come from the perception of the relative autonomy of the archetypes. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 104. The idea of transformation and renewal by means of the serpent is a well-substantiated archetype. It is [a] healing [symbol] Carl Jung, CW 7, Par 184. The afternoon of life is just as full of meaning as the morning; only, its meaning and purpose are different…. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 114. Often, indeed, a false ambition survives, in that an old man wants to be a youth again, or at least feels he must behave like one, although in his heart he can no longer make believe. Carl Jung, CW 7, Pages 74-75. What youth found and must find outside; the man of life's afternoon must find within himself. Carl Jung, CW 7, Pages 74-75. Everything human is relative, because everything rests on an inner polarity; for everything is a phenomenon of energy. Energy necessarily depends on a pre-existing polarity, without which there could be no energy. Carl Jung, CW 7, Pages 74-75. The growth of culture consists, as we know, is a progressive subjugation of the animal in man. It is a process of domestication which cannot be accomplished without rebellion on the part of the animal nature that thirsts for freedom. Carl Jung, CW 7, Page 19. Just as in the early Middle Ages finance was held in contempt because there was as yet no differentiated financial morality to suit each case, but only a mass morality, so today there is only a mass sexual morality. Carl Jung, CW 7, Page 27. A girl who has an illegitimate baby is condemned and nobody asks whether she is a decent human being or not. Carl Jung, CW 7, Page 27. Any form of love not sanctioned by law is considered immoral, whether between worth-while people or bounders. Carl Jung, CW 7, Pages 27. We are still so hypnotized by what happens that we forget how and to whom it happens, just as for the Middle Ages finance was nothing but glittering gold, fiercely coveted and therefore the devil. Carl Jung, CW 7, Page 27. Where love reigns, there is no will to power; and where the will to power is paramount, love is lacking. Carl Jung, CW 7, Par. 78. The idea of transformation and renewal by means of the serpent is a well-substantiated archetype. It is [a] healing [symbol] Carl Jung, CW 7, Par 184 There are things that are not yet true today, perhaps we dare not find them true, but tomorrow they may be. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 201. Individualism means deliberately stressing and giving prominence to some supposed peculiarity. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 267f [The Self] …might equally be called the God within us. Carl Jung, CW 7, Par. 399 Could the longing for a god be a passion welling up from our darkest, instinctual nature, a passion unswayed by any outside influences, deeper and stronger perhaps than the love for a human person? Carl Jung, CW 7, para 214. No one who has undergone the process of assimilating the unconscious will deny that it gripped his very vitals and changed him. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 361 Disalliance with the unconscious is synonymous with loss of instinct and rootlessness. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 195 For the important thing is not to interpret and understand the fantasies, but primarily to experience them. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 342. Neurosis is nothing less than an individual attempt, however unsuccessful, to solve a universal problem; indeed it cannot be otherwise, for a general problem, a "question," is not an ens per se [thing in itself] but exists only in the hearts of individuals. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 438 Even the man whom we think we know best and who assures us himself that we understand him through and through is at bottom a stranger to us. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 363. Life is born only of the spark of opposites. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 78 It should never be forgotten—and of this the Freudian school must be reminded—that morality was not brought down on tables of stone from Sinai and imposed on the people, but is a function of the human soul, as old as humanity itself. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 30. The art of it consists only in allowing our invisible partner to make herself heard, in putting the mechanism of expression momentarily at her disposal, without being overcome by the distaste one naturally feels at playing such an apparently ludicrous game with one- self, or by doubts as to the genuineness of the voice of one's interlocutor. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 323. This remarkable capacity of the human psyche for change, expressed in the transcendent function, is the principal object of late medieval alchemistic philosophy, where it was expressed in terms of alchemical symbolism. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 360 It is only in modern times that te dream, this fleeting and insignificant-looking product of the psyche, has met with such profound contempt. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 21 A woman possessed by the animus is always in danger of losing her femininity, her adapted feminine persona, just as a man in like circumstances runs the risk of effeminacy. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 336 Just as a man brings forth his work as a complete creation out of his inner feminine nature, so the inner masculine side of a woman brings forth creative seeds which have the power to fertilize the feminine side of the man. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 336. It [Dreams] leads straight to the deepest personal secrets, and is, therefore, an invaluable instrument in the hand of the physician and educator of the soul. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 25 It is sufficiently obvious that life, like any other process, has a beginning and an end and that every beginning is also the beginning of the end. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 34. Individuation is an ineluctable psychological necessity. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 241. We could therefore translate individuation as "coming to selfhood" or "self-realization." Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 266 The aim of individuation is nothing less than to divest the self of the false wrappings of the persona on the one hand, and of the suggestive power of primordial images on the other. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 269 To find out what is truly individual in ourselves, profound reflection is needed; and suddenly we realize how uncommonly difficult the discovery of individuality is. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 242. In other words, in order to undergo a far-reaching psychological development, neither outstanding intelligence nor any other talent is necessary, since in this development moral qualities can make up for intellectual shortcomings. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 198 Morality is not imposed from outside; we have it in ourselves from the start—not the law, but our moral nature without which the collective life of human society would be impossible. Carl Jung, CW 7, Page 27. We shall probably get nearest to the truth if we think of the conscious and personal psyche as resting upon the broad basis of an inherited and universal psychic disposition which is as such unconscious, and that our personal psyche bears the same relation to the collective psyche as the individual to society. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 234 The persona is a complicated system of relations between individual consciousness and society, fittingly enough a kind of mask, designed on the one hand to make a definite impression upon others, and, on the other, to conceal the true nature of the individual. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 305 A wrong functioning of the psyche can do much to injure the body, just as conversely a bodily illness can affect the psyche; for psyche and body are not separate entities, but one and the same life. Carl Jung, CW 7, Page 115 Nature is often obscure or impenetrable, but she is not, like man, deceitful. We must therefore take it that the dream is just what it pretends to be, neither more nor less. If it shows something in a negative light, there is no reason for assuming that it is meant positively. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 162 Neurosis is intimately bound up with the problem of our time and really represents an unsuccessful attempt on the part of the individual to solve the general problem in his own person. Neurosis is self-division. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 18 Unfortunately far too many of us talk about a man only as it would be desirable for him to be, never about the man as he really is. But the doctor has always to do with the real man, who remains obstinately himself until all sides of his reality are recognized. True education can only start from naked reality, not from a delusive ideal. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 93 In spite of all indignant protestations to the contrary, the fact remains that love (using the word in the wider sense which belongs to it by right and embraces more than sexuality), its problems and its conflicts, is of fundamental importance in human life and, as careful inquiry consistently shows, is of far greater significance than the individual suspects. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 14 It is the way of moralists not to put the slightest trust in God, as if they thought that the good tree of humanity flourished only by dint of being pruned, tied back, and trained on a trellis; whereas in fact Father Sun and Mother Earth have allowed it to grow for their delight in accordance with deep, wise laws. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 427 A little less hypocrisy and a little more tolerance towards oneself can only have good results in respect for our neighbour; for we are all too prone to transfer to our fellows the injustice and violence we inflict upon our own natures. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 439 If ever there was a time when self-reflection was the absolutely necessary and only right thing, it is now, in our present catastrophic epoch. Yet whoever reflects upon himself is bound to strike upon the frontiers of the unconscious, which contains what above all else he needs to know. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 4 New ideas, if they are not just a flash in the pan, generally require at least a generation to take root. Psychological innovations probably take much longer, since in this field more than in any other practically everybody sets himself up as an authority. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 8 The effect of the unconscious images has something fateful about it. Perhaps—who knows—these eternal images are what men mean by fate. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 183 Now, it is by no means the special prerogative of the Christian Church to try to make it possible for the individual to detach himself from his original, animal-like condition; the Church is simply the latest, and specifically Western, form of an instinctive striving that is probably as old as mankind itself. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 172 Now, since the psychic process, like any other life-process, is not just a causal sequence, but is also a process with a teleological orientation, we might expect dreams to give us certain indicia about the objective causality as well as about the objective tendencies, because they are nothing less than self-portraits of the psychic life-process. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 210 The popular saying, "Old so-and-so chose the right time to die," comes from a sure sense of the secret psychological cause. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 194 All ages before ours believed in gods in some form or other. Only an unparalleled impoverishment in symbolism could enable us to rediscover the gods as psychic factors, which is to say, as archetypes of the unconscious. No doubt this discovery is hardly credible as yet. Carl Jung, CW 7, Page 72 The tragic counter play between inside and outside (depicted in Job and Faust as the wager with God) represents, at bottom, the energetics of the life process, the polar tension that is necessary for self-regulation. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 311 Love may be effectively used as a means for gaining the upper hand. Love and good behaviour are, from the standpoint of the power-instinct, known to be a choice means to this end. Virtuousness often serves to compel recognition from others Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 50 Love may summon forth unsuspected powers in the soul for which we had better be prepared Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 164 The term persona is really a very appropriate expression for this, for originally it meant the mask once worn by actors to indicate the role they played Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 245 If we endeavour to draw a precise distinction between what psychic material should be considered personal, and what impersonal, we soon find ourselves in the greatest dilemma, for by definition we have to say of the persona's contents what we have said of the impersonal unconscious, namely, that it is collective Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 245 It is only because the persona represents a more or less arbitrary and fortuitous segment of the collective psyche that we can make the mistake of regarding it in toto as something individual. It is, as its name implies, only a mask of the collective psyche, a mask that feigns individuality, making others and oneself believe that one is individual, whereas one is simply acting a role through which the collective psyche speaks Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 245 When we analyse the persona we strip off the mask, and discover that what seemed to be individual is at bottom collective; in other words, that the persona was only a mask for the collective psyche Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 246 Fundamentally the persona is nothing real: it is a compromise between individual and society as to what a man should appear to be. He takes a name, earns a title, exercises a function, he is this or that Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 246 In a certain sense all this is real, yet in relation to the essential individuality of the person concerned it is only a secondary reality, a compromise formation, in making which others often have a greater share than he. The persona is a semblance, a two-dimensional reality, to give it a nickname Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 246 There is, after all, something individual in the peculiar choice and delineation of the persona, and that despite the exclusive identity of the ego-consciousness with the persona the unconscious Self, one's real individuality, is always present and makes itself felt indirectly if not directly Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 247 Although the ego-consciousness is at first identical with the persona that compromise role in which we parade before the community, yet the unconscious Self can never be repressed to the point of extinction. Its influence is chiefly manifest in the special nature of the contrasting and compensating contents of the unconscious Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 247 Through the analysis of the personal unconscious, the conscious mind becomes suffused with collective material which brings with it the elements of individuality Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 247 In the case of a patient of Jung [a philosophy student] her analysis revealed a persona behind which her real and authentic being, her individual Self, lay hidden. Indeed, to the extent that she at first completely identified herself with her role, she was altogether unconscious of her real Self. She was still in her nebulous infantile world and had not yet discovered the real world at all. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 248 But as, through progressive analysis, she became conscious of the nature of her transference, the dreams began to materialize. They brought up bits of the collective unconscious, and that was the end of her infantile world and of all the heroics. She came to herself and to her own real potentialities Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 248 This is roughly the way things go in most cases, if the analysis is carried far enough. That the consciousness of her individuality should coincide exactly with the reactivation of an archaic god-image is not just as isolated coincidence, but a very frequent occurrence which, in my view, corresponds to an unconscious law. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 248 Once the personal repressions are lifted, the individuality and the collective psyche begin to emerge in a coalescent state, thus releasing the hitherto repressed personal fantasies. The fantasies and dreams which now appear assume a somewhat different aspect. An infallible sign of collective images seems to be the appearance of the "cosmic" element, i.e., the images in the dream or fantasy are connected with cosmic qualities, such as: Temporal and spatial infinity Enormous speed and extension of movement "Astrological" associations Telluric, lunar, and solar analogies Changes in the proportions of the body, etc. The obvious occurrence of mythological and religious motifs in a dream also points to the activity of the collective unconscious Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 250 The collective element is very often announced by peculiar symptoms, as for example by dreams where the dreamer is flying through space like a comet, or feels that he is the earth, or the sun, or a star; or else is of immense size, or dwarfishly small; or that he is dead, is in a strange place, is a stranger to himself, confused, mad, etc. Similarly, feelings of disorientation, of dizziness and the like, may appear along with symptoms of inflation. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 250 The forces that burst out of the collective psyche has a confusing and blinding effect. One result of the dissolution of the persona is a release of involuntary fantasy, which is apparently nothing else than the specific activity of the collective psyche. This activity throws up contents whose existence one had never suspected before. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 251 But as the influence of the collective unconscious increases, so the conscious mind loses its power of leadership. Imperceptibly it becomes the led, while an unconscious and impersonal process gradually takes control. Thus, without noticing it, the conscious personality is pushed about like a figure on a chess-board by an invisible player. It is this player who decides the game of fate, not the conscious mind and its plans. This is how the resolution of the transference, apparently so impossible to the conscious mind, was brought about [in my patient. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 251 The plunge into this process [disintegration of the persona] becomes unavoidable, whenever the necessity arises of overcoming an apparently insuperable difficulty. But when this inner adaptation becomes a problem, strange, irresistible attraction proceeds from the unconscious and exerts a powerful influence on the conscious direction of life. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 252 Every individual needs revolution, inner division, overthrow of the existing order, and renewal, but not by forcing them upon his neighbours under the hypocritical cloak of Christian love or the sense of social responsibility or any of the other beautiful euphemisms for unconscious urges to personal power. Individual self-reflection return of the individual to the ground of human nature, to his own deepest being with its individual and social destiny ± here is the beginning of a cure for that blindness which reigns at the present hour. Carl Jung, CW 7, Page 5 I have often been asked where the archetypes or primordial images come from. It seems to me that their origin can only be explained by assuming them to be deposits of the constantly repeated experiences of humanity. One of the commonest and at the same time most impressive experiences is the apparent movement of the sun every day. We certainly cannot discover anything of the kind in the unconscious, so far as the known physical process is concerned. Carl Jung, CW 7, Page 109 [T]he archetypes usually appear in projection; and, because projections are unconscious, they appear on persons in the immediate environment, mostly in the form of abnormal over- or under-evaluations which provoke misunderstandings, quarrels, fanaticisms, and follies of every description. Thus we say,

He makes a god of so-and-so', or so-and-so is Mr. X's bete noire'. In this way, too, there grow up modern myth formations, i.e., fantastic rumours, suspicions, prejudices. Carl Jung, CW 7, Page 152 [T]he idea of energy and its conservation must be a primordial image that was dormant in the collective unconscious. . .. [T]he most primitive religions in the most widely separated parts of the earth are founded upon this image. These are the so-called dynamistic religions whose sole and determining thought is that there exists a universal magical power [i.e. mana] about which everything revolves. Tylor, the well-known English investigator, and Frazer likewise, misunderstood this idea as animism. In reality primitive peoples do not mean, by their power concept, souls or spirits at all, but something which the American investigator Lovejoy has appropriately termed 'primitive energetics'. . .. So this idea has been stamped on the human brain for aeons. That is why it lies ready to hand in the unconscious of every man. Only, certain conditions are needed to cause it to appear. Carl Jung, CW 7, Page 108 The predominance of unconscious influences, together with the associated disintegration of the persona and the deposition of the conscious mind from power, constitute a state of psychic disequilibrium which, in analytical treatment, is artificially induced for the therapeutic purpose of resolving a difficulty that might block further development. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 252 There are of course innumerable obstacles that can be overcome with good advice and a little moral support, aided by goodwill and understanding on the part of the patient. Excellent curative results can be obtained in this way. Cases are not uncommon where there is no need to breathe a word about the unconscious Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 252 But again, there are difficulties to which one can foresee no satisfactory solution. If in these cases the psychic equilibrium is not already disturbed before treatment begins, it will certainly be upset during the analysis, and sometimes without any interference by the doctor. It often seems as though these patients had only been waiting to find a trustworthy person in order to give up and collapse. Such a loss of balance is similar in principle to a psychotic disturbance; that is, it differs from the initial stages of mental illness only by the fact that it leads in the end to greater health, while the latter leads to yet greater destruction. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 252 It is a condition of panic; a letting go in face of apparently hopeless complications. Mostly it was preceded by desperate efforts to master the difficulty by force of will; then came the collapse, and the once guiding will crumble completely. The energy thus freed disappears from consciousness and falls into the unconscious. As a matter of fact, it is at these mo- ments that the first signs of unconscious activity appear. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 252 Hence I regard the loss of balance as purposive, since it replaces a defective consciousness, which is aiming all the time at the creation of a new balance and will moreover achieve this aim, provided that the conscious mind is capable of assimilating the contents produced by the unconscious, i.e., of understanding and digesting them Car Jung, CW 7, Para 253 If I were to attempt to put in a nutshell the difference between man and woman in this respect, i.e., what it is that characterizes the animus as opposed to the anima, I could only say this: as the anima produces moods, so the animus produces opinions; and as the moods of a man issue from a shadowy background, so the opinions of a woman rest on equally unconscious prior assumptions. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 331 The animus does not appear as one person, but as a plurality of persons. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 332 This collection of condemnatory judges, a sort of College of Preceptors, corresponds to a personification of the animus. The animus is rather like an assembly of fathers or dignitaries of some kind who lay down incontestable, "rational," ex cathedra judgments. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 332 It goes without saying that the animus is just as often projected as the anima. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 333 t would be insufficient to characterize the animus merely as a conservative, collective conscience; he is also a neologist who, in flagrant contradiction to his correct opinions, has an extraordinary weakness for difficult and unfamiliar words which act as a pleasant substitute for the odious task of reflection. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 333 Like the anima, the animus is a jealous lover. He is an adept at putting, in place of the real man, an opinion about him, the exceedingly disputable grounds for which are never submitted to criticism. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 334 Men can be pretty venomous here, for it is an inescapable fact that the animus always plays up the anima—and vice versa, of course—so that all further discussion becomes pointless. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 334 Like the anima, the animus is a jealous lover. He is an adept at putting, in place of the real man, an opinion about him, the exceedingly disputable grounds for which are never submitted to criticism. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 334 Animus opinions are invariably collective, and they override individuals and individual judgments in exactly the same way as the anima thrusts her emotional anticipations and projections between man and wife. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 334 In intellectual women the animus encourages a critical disputatiousness and would-be highbrowism, which, however, consists essentially in harping on some irrelevant weak point and nonsensically making it the main one. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 335 Without knowing it, such women are solely intent upon exasperating the man and are, in consequence, the more completely at the mercy of the animus. "Unfortunately I am always right," one of these creatures once confessed to me. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 335 The animus does not belong to the function of conscious relationship; his function is rather to facilitate relations with the unconscious. Instead of the woman merely associating opinions with external situations—situations which she ought to think about consciously—the animus, as an associative function, should be directed inwards, where it could associate the contents of the unconscious. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 336 The technique of coming to terms with the animus is the same in principle as in the case of the anima; only here the woman must learn to criticize and hold her opinions at a distance; not in order to repress them, but, by investigating their origins, to penetrate more deeply into the background, where she will then discover the primordial images, just as the man does in his dealings with the anima. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 336 The animus is the deposit, as it were, of all woman's ancestral experiences of man—and not only that, he is also a creative and procreative being, not in the sense of masculine creativity, but in the sense that he brings forth something we might call the \6yos ffirepvarixos, the spermatic word. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 336 This would be the femme inspiratrice who, if falsely cultivated, can turn into the worst kind of dogmatist and high-handed pedagogue—a regular "animus hound," as one of my women patients aptly expressed it. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 336 A woman possessed by the animus is always in danger of losing her femininity, her adapted feminine persona, just as a man in like circumstances runs the risk of effeminacy. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 337 In woman the compensating figure is of a masculine character and can therefore appropriately be termed the animus. If it was no easy task to describe what is meant by the anima, the difficulties become almost insuperable when we set out to describe the psychology of the animus. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 328 A passionate exclusiveness therefore attaches to the man's anima, and an indefinite variety to the woman's animus. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 338 Whereas the man has, floating before him, in clear outlines, the alluring form of a Circe or a Calypso, the animus is better expressed as a bevy of Flying Dutchmen or unknown wanderers from over the sea, never quite clearly grasped, protean, given to persistent and violent motion. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 338 I do not expect every reader to grasp right away what is meant by animus and anima. But I hope he will at least have gained the impression that it is not a question of anything "metaphysical," but far rather of empirical facts which could equally well be expressed in rational and abstract language. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 340 If the unconscious simply rides roughshod over the conscious mind, a psychotic condition develops. If it can neither completely prevail nor yet be understood, the result is a conflict that cripples all further advance. But with this question, namely the understanding of the collective unconscious, we come to a formidable difficulty. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 253 On paper the interpretation of a dream may look arbitrary, muddled, and spurious; but the same thing in reality can be a little drama of unsurpassed realism. To experience a dream and its interpretation is very different from having a tepid rehash set before you on paper. Everything about this psychology is, in the deepest sense, experience; the entire theory, even where it puts on the most abstract airs, is the direct outcome of something experienced. Carl CW 7: Page 199. The vast majority of people are quite incapable of putting themselves individually into the mind of another. This is indeed a singularly rare art, and truth to tell, it does not take us very far. Even the man whom we think we know best and who assures us himself that we understand him through and through is at bottom a stranger to us. He is different. The most we can do, and the best, is to have at least some inkling of his otherness, to respect it, and to guard against the outrageous stupidity of wishing to interpret it. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 363 For the primitive anything strange is hostile and evil. This line of division serves a purpose, which is why the normal person feels under no obligation to make these projections conscious, although they are dangerously illusory. War psychology has made this abundantly clear: everything my country does is good, everything the others do is bad. The centre of all iniquity is invariably found to lie a few miles behind the enemy lines. Because the individual has this same primitive psychology, every attempt to bring these age-old projections to consciousness is felt as irritating. Naturally one would like to have better relations with one's fellows, but only on the condition that they live up to our expectations—in other words, that they become willing carriers of our projections. Yet if we make ourselves conscious of these projections, it may easily act as an impediment to our relations with others, for there is then no bridge of illusion across which love and hate can stream off so relievingly, and no way of disposing so simply and satisfactorily of all those alleged virtues that are intended to edify and improve others. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 517 What is true of humanity in general is also true of each individual, for humanity consists only of individuals. And as is the psychology of humanity so also is the psychology of the individual. The [first] World War brought a terrible reckoning with the rational intentions of civilization. What is called "will" in the individual is called "imperialism" in nations; for all will is a demonstration of power over fate, i.e., the exclusion of chance. Civilization is the rational, "purposeful" sublimation of free energies, brought about by will and intention. It is the same with the individual; and just as the idea of a world civilization received a fearful correction at the hands of war, so the individual must often learn in his life that so-called "disposable" energies are not his to dispose. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 74 This war has pitilessly revealed to civilized man that he is still a barbarian and has at the same time shown what an iron scourge lies in store for him if ever again he should be tempted to make his neighbour responsible for his own evil qualities. The psychology of the individual is reflected in the psychology of the nation. What the nation does is done also by each individual, and so long as the individual continues to do it, the nation will do likewise. Only a change in the attitude of the individual can initiate a change in the psychology of the nation. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 4 Human beings have one faculty which, though it is of the greatest utility for collective purposes, is most pernicious for individuation, and that is the faculty of imitation. Collective psychology cannot dispense with imitation, for without it all mass organizations, the State and the social order, are impossible. Society is organized, indeed, less by law than by the propensity to imitation, implying equally suggestibility, suggestion, and mental contagion. But we see every day how people use, or rather abuse, the mechanism of imitation for the purpose of personal differentiation: they are content to ape some eminent personality, some striking characteristic or mode of behaviour, thereby achieving an outward distinction from the circle in which they move. We could almost say that as a punishment for this the uniformity of their minds with those of their neighbours, already real enough, is intensified into an unconscious, compulsive bondage to the environment. As a rule these specious attempts at individual differentiation stiffen into a pose, and the imitator remains at the same level as he always was, only several degrees more sterile than before. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 242 The element of differentiation is the individual. All the highest achievements of virtue, as well as the blackest villainies, are individual. The larger a community is, and the more the sum total of collective factors peculiar to every large community rests on conservative prejudices detrimental to individuality, the more will the individual be morally and spiritually crushed, and, as a result, the one source of moral and spiritual progress for society is choked up. Naturally the only thing that can thrive in such an atmosphere is sociality and whatever is collective in the individual. Everything individual in him goes under, i.e., is doomed to repression. The individual elements lapse into the unconscious, where, by the law of necessity, they are transformed into something essentially baleful, destructive, and anarchical. Socially, this evil principle shows itself in the spectacular crimes—regicide and the like—perpetrated by certain prophetically-inclined individuals; but in the great mass of the community it remains in the background, and only manifests itself indirectly in the inexorable moral degeneration of society. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 240 It is a notorious fact that the morality of society as a whole is in inverse ratio to its size; for the greater the aggregation of individuals, the more the individual factors are blotted out, and with them morality, which rests entirely on the moral sense of the individual and the freedom necessary for this. Hence every man is, in a certain sense, unconsciously a worse man when he is in society than when acting alone; for he is carried by society and to that extent relieved of his individual responsibility. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 240 Any large company composed of wholly admirable persons has the morality and intelligence of an unwieldy, stupid, and violent animal. The bigger the organization, the more unavoidable is its immorality and blind stupidity {Senatus bestia, senatores boni viri). Society, by automatically stressing all the collective qualities in its individual representatives, puts a premium on mediocrity, on everything that settles down to vegetate in an easy, irresponsible way. Individuality will inevitably be driven to the wall. This process begins in school, continues at the university, and rules all departments in which the State has a hand. In a small social body, the individuality of its members is better safeguarded; and the greater is their relative freedom and the possibility of conscious responsibility. Without freedom there can be no morality. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 240 Our admiration for great organizations dwindles when once we become aware of the other side of the wonder: the tremendous piling up and accentuation of all that is primitive in man, and the unavoidable destruction of his individuality in the interests of the monstrosity that every great organization in fact is. The man of today, who resembles more or less the collective ideal, has made his heart into a den of murderers. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 240 The importance of personal prestige can hardly be overestimated, because the possibility of regressive dissolution in the collective psyche is a very real danger, not only for the outstanding individual but also for his followers. This possibility is most likely to occur when the goal of prestige —universal recognition—has been reached. The person then becomes a collective truth, and that is always the beginning of the end. To gain prestige is a positive achievement not only for the outstanding individual but also for the clan. The individual distinguishes himself by his deeds, the many by their renunciation of power. So long as this attitude needs to be fought for and defended against hostile influences, the achievement remains positive; but as soon as there are no more obstacles and universal recognition has been attained, prestige loses its positive value and usually becomes a dead letter. A schismatic movement then sets in, and the whole process begins again from the beginning. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 238 The office I hold is certainly my special activity; but it is also a collective factor that has come into existence historically through the cooperation of many people and whose dignity rests solely on collective approval. When, therefore, I identify myself with my office or title, I behave as though I myself were the whole complex of social factors of which that office consists, or as though I were not only the bearer of the office, but also and at the same time the approval of society. I have made an extraordinary extension of myself and have usurped qualities which are not in me but outside e. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 227 On closer examination one is always astonished to see how much of our so-called individual psychology is really collective. So much, indeed, that the individual traits are completely overshadowed by it. Since, however, individuation is an ineluctable psychological necessity, we can see from the ascendancy of the collective what very special attention must be paid to this delicate plant "individuality" if it is not to be completely smothered. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 241 We do not sufficiently distinguish between individualism and individuation. Individualism means deliberately stressing and giving prominence to some supposed peculiarity, rather than to collective considerations and obligations. But individuation means precisely the better and more complete fulfilment of the collective qualities of the human being, since adequate consideration of the peculiarity of the individual is more conducive to better social achievement than when the peculiarity is neglected or suppressed. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 268 Human imperfection is always a discord in the harmony of our ideals. Unfortunately, no one lives in the world as we desire it, but in the world of actuality where good and evil clash and destroy one another, where no creating or building can be done without dirtying one's hands. Whenever things get really bad, there is always someone to assure us amid great applause that nothing has happened, and everything is in order. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 263 Society expects, and indeed must expect every individual to play the part assigned to him as perfectly as possible. so that a man who is a parson must not only carry out his official functions objectively but must at all times and in all circumstances play the role of parson in a flawless manner. Society demands this as a kind of surety; each must stand at his post, here a cobbler, there a poet. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 305 Every calling or profession has its own characteristic persona. It is easy to study these things nowadays, when the photographs of public personalities so frequently appear in the press. A certain kind of behaviour is forced on them by the world, and professional people endeavour to come up to these expectations. Only, the danger is that they become identical with their personas—the professor with his text-book, the tenor with his voice. Then the damage is done; henceforth he lives exclusively against the background of his own biography. The garment of Deianeira has grown fast to his skin, and a desperate decision like that of Heracles is needed if he is to tear this Nessus shirt from his body and step into the consuming fire of the flame of immortality, in order to transform himself into what he really is. One could say, with a little exaggeration, that the persona is that which in reality one is not, but which oneself. A man cannot get rid of himself in favour of an artificial personality without punishment. Even the attempt to do so brings on, in all ordinary cases, unconscious reactions in the form of bad moods, affects, phobias, compulsive ideas, backslidings, vices, etc. The social "strong man" is in his private life often a mere child where his own states of feeling are concerned; his discipline in public (which he demands quite particularly of others) goes miserably to pieces in private. His "happiness in his work" assumes a woeful countenance at home; his "spotless" public morality looks strange indeed behind the mask—we will not mention deeds, but only fantasies, and the wives of such men would have a pretty tale to tell. As to his selfless altruism, his children have decided views about that. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 307 I once made the acquaintance of a very venerable personage—in fact, one might easily call him a saint. I stalked round him for three whole days, but never a mortal failing did I find in him. My feeling of inferiority grew ominous, and I was beginning to think seriously of how I might better myself. Then, on the fourth day, his wife came to consult me. Well, nothing of the sort has ever happened to me since. But this I did learn that any man who becomes one with his persona can cheerfully let all disturbances manifest themselves through his wife without her noticing it, though she pays for her self-sacrifice with a bad neurosis. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 306 It is a frightening thought that man also has a shadow side to him, consisting not just of little weaknesses, and foibles, but of a positively demonic dynamism. The individual seldom knows anything of this; to him, as an individual, it is incredible that he should ever in any circumstances go beyond himself. But let these harmless creatures form a mass, and there emerges a raging monster; and each individual is only one tiny cell in the monster's body, so that for better or worse he must accompany it on its bloody rampages and even assist it to the utmost. Having a dark suspicion of these grim possibilities, man turns a blind eye to the shadow-side of human nature. Blindly he strives against the salutary dogma of original sin, which is yet so prodigiously true. Yes, he even hesitates to admit the conflict of which he is so painfully aware. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 35 We know that the wildest and most moving dramas are played not in the theatre but in the hearts of ordinary men and women who pass by without exciting attention, and who betray to the world nothing of the conflicts that rage within them except possibly by a nervous breakdown. What is so difficult for the layman to grasp is the fact that in most cases the patients themselves have no suspicion whatever of the internecine war raging in their unconscious. If we remember that there are many people who understand nothing at all about themselves, we shall be less surprised at the realization that there are also people who are utterly unaware of their actual conflicts. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 425 It is of course a fundamental mistake to imagine that when we see the non-value in a value or the untruth in a truth, the value or the truth ceases to exist. It has only become relative. Everything human is relative, because everything rests on an inner polarity; for everything is a phenomenon of energy. Energy necessarily depends on a preexisting polarity, without which there could be no energy. There must always be high and low, hot and cold, etc., so that the equilibrating process—which is energy—can take place. Therefore the tendency to deny all previous values in favour of their opposites is just as much of an exaggeration as the earlier one-sidedness. And in so far as it is a question of rejecting universally accepted and indubitable values, the result is a fatal loss. One who acts in this wav empties himself out with his values, as Nietzsche has already said. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 115 The dream is often occupied with apparently very silly details, thus producing an impression of absurdity, or else it is on the surface so unintelligible as to leave us thoroughly bewildered. Hence we always have to overcome a certain resistance before we can seriously set about disentangling the intricate web through patient work. But when at last we penetrate to its real meaning, we find ourselves deep in the dreamer's secrets and discover with astonishment that an apparently quite senseless dream is in the highest degree significant, and that in reality it speaks only of important and serious matters. This discovery compels rather more respect for the so-called superstition that dreams have a meaning, to which the rationalistic temper of our age has hitherto given short shrift. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 24 Dreams contain images and thought associations which we do not create with conscious intent. They arise spontaneously without our assistance and are representatives of a psychic activity withdrawn from our arbitrary will. Therefore the dream is, properly speaking, a highly objective, natural product of the psyche, from which we might expect indications, or at least hints, about certain basic trends in the psychic process. Now, since the psychic process, like any other life-process, is not just a causal sequence, but is also a process with a teleological orientation, we might expect dreams to give us certain indicia about the objective causality as well as about the objective tendencies, because they are nothing less than self-portraits of the psychic life-process. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 210 On paper the interpretation of a dream may look arbitrary, muddled, and spurious; but the same thing in reality can be a little drama of unsurpassed realism. To experience a dream and its interpretation is very different from having a tepid rehash set before you on paper. Everything about this psychology is, in the deepest sense, experience; the entire theory, even where it puts on the most abstract airs, is the direct outcome of something experienced. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 199 I call every interpretation which equates the dream images with real objects an interpretation on the objective level. In contrast to this is the interpretation which refers every part of the dream and all the actors in it back to the dreamer himself. This I call interpretation on the subjective level. Interpretation on the objective level is analytic, because it breaks down the dream content into memory complexes that refer to external situations. Interpretation on the subjective level is synthetic, because it detaches the underlying memory-complexes from their external causes, regards them as tendencies or components of the subject, and reunites them with that subject. In this case, therefore, all the contents of the dream are treated as symbols for subjective contents. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 130 He would be better advised to put away his scholar's gown, bid farewell to his study, and wander with human heart through the world. There, in the horrors of prisons, lunatic asylums and hospitals, in drab suburban pubs, in brothels and gambling-hells, in the salons of the elegant, the Stock Exchanges, Socialist meetings, churches, revivalist gatherings and ecstatic sects, through love and hate, through the experience of passion in every form in his own body, he would reap richer stores of knowledge than text-books a foot thick could give him, and he will know how to doctor the sick with real knowledge of the human soul. Carl Jung, CW 7 Para 409 It is difficult to gauge the spirit of one's own time; but, if we observe the trend of art, of style, and of public taste, and see what people read and write, what sort of societies they found, what "questions" are the order of the day, what the Philistines fight against, we shall find that in the long catalogue of our present social questions by no means the last is the so-called "sexual question." This is discussed by men and women who challenge the existing sexual morality and who seek to throw off the burden of moral guilt which past centuries have heaped upon Eros. One cannot simply deny the existence of these endeavours nor condemn then as indefensible; they exist, and probably have adequate grounds for their existence. It is more interesting and more useful to examine carefully the underlying causes of these contemporary movements than to join in the lamentations of the professional mourners of morality who prophesy the moral downfall of humanity. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 427 Eros is a superhuman power which, like nature herself, allows itself to be conquered and exploited as though it were impotent. But triumph over nature is dearly paid for. Nature requires no explanations of principle but asks only for tolerance and wise measure. "Eros is a mighty daemon," as the wise Diotima said to Socrates. We shall never get the better of him, or only to our own hurt. He is not the whole of our inward nature, though he is at least one of its essential aspects. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para note Eros is a questionable fellow and will always remain so, whatever the legislation of the future may have to say about it. He belongs on one side to man's primordial animal nature which will endure as long as man has an animal body. On the other side he is related to the highest forms of the spirit. But he only thrives when spirit and instinct are in right harmony. If one or the other aspect is lacking to him, the result is injury or at least a lopsidedness that may easily veer towards the pathological. Too much of the animal distorts the civilized man, too much civilization makes sick animals. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 32 No man is so entirely masculine that he has nothing feminine in him. The fact is, rather, that very masculine men have—carefully guarded and hidden—a very soft emotional life, often incorrectly described as "feminine." A man counts it a virtue to repress his feminine traits as much as possible, just as a woman, at least until recently, considered it unbecoming to be "mannish." The repression of feminine traits and inclinations naturally causes these contrasexual demands to accumulate in the unconscious. No less naturally, the imago of woman (the soul-image) becomes a receptacle for these demands, which is why a man, in his love-choice, is strongly tempted to win the woman who best corresponds to his own unconscious femininity—a woman, in short, who can unhesitatingly receive the projection of his soul. Although such a choice is often regarded and felt as altogether ideal, it may turn out that the man has manifestly married his own worst weakness. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 297 The persona, the ideal picture of a man as he should be, is inwardly compensated by feminine weakness, and as the individual outwardly plays the strong man, so he becomes inwardly a woman, i.e., the anima, for it is the anima that reacts to the persona. But because the inner world is dark and invisible to the extraverted consciousness, and because a man is all the less capable of conceiving his weaknesses the more he is identified with the persona, the persona's counterpart, the anima, remains completely in the dark and is at once projected, so that our hero comes under the heel of his wife's slipper. If this results in a considerable increase of her power, she will acquit herself none too well. She becomes inferior, thus providing her husband with the welcome proof that it is not he, the hero, who is inferior in private, but his wife. In return the wife can cherish the illusion, so attractive to many, that at least she has married a hero, unperturbed by her own uselessness. This little game of illusion is often taken to be the whole meaning of life. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 309 Our life is like the course of the sun. In the morning it gains continually in strength until it reaches the zenith heat of high noon. Then comes the enantiodromia the steady forward movement no longer denotes an increase, but a decrease, in strength. Thus our task in handling a young person is different from the task of handling an older person. In the former case, it is enough to clear away all the obstacles that hinder expansion and ascent; in the latter, we must nurture everything that assists the descent, Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 114 An inexperienced youth thinks one can let the old people go, because not much more can happen to them anyway they have their lives behind them and are no better than petrified pillars of the past. But it is a great mistake to suppose that the meaning of life is exhausted with the period of youth and expansion; that, for example, a woman who has passed the menopause is "finished." The afternoon of life is just as full of meaning as the morning; only, its meaning and purpose are different. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 114 Man has two aims the first is the natural aim, the begetting of children and the business of protecting the brood; to this belongs the acquisition of money and social position. When this aim has been reached a new phase begins the cultural aim. For the attainment of the former we have the help of nature and, on top of that, education; for the attainment of the latter, little or nothing helps. Often, indeed, a false ambition survives, in that an old man wants to be a youth again, or at least feels he must behave like one, although in his heart he can no longer make believe. This is what makes the transition from the natural to the cultural phase so terribly difficult and bitter for many people; they cling to the illusion of youth or to their children, hoping to salvage in this way a last little scrap of youth. One sees it especially in mothers, who find their sole meaning in their children and imagine they will sink into a bottomless void when they have to give them up. No wonder that so many bad neuroses appear at the onset of life's afternoon. It is a sort of sec- ond puberty, another "storm and stress" period, not infrequently accompanied by tempests of passion—the "dangerous age." But the problems that crop up at this age are no longer to be solved by the old recipes the hand of this clock cannot be put back. What youth found and must find outside; the man of life's afternoon must find within himself. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 114 The rapid development of the towns, with the specialization of work brought about by the extraordinary division of labour, the increasing industrialization of the countryside, and the growing sense of insecurity, deprive men of many opportunities for giving vent to their affective energies. The peasant's alternating rhythm of work secures him unconscious satisfactions through its symbolical content—satisfactions which the factory workers and office employees do not know and can never enjoy. What do these know of his life with nature, of those grand moments when, as lord and fructifier of the earth, he drives his plough through the soil, and with a kingly gesture scatters the seed for the future harvest; of his rightful fear of the destructive power of the elements, of his joy in the fruitfulness of his wife, who bears him the daughters and sons who mean increased working-power and prosperity? From all this we city-dwellers, we modern machine-minders, are far removed. Is not the fairest and most natural of all satisfactions beginning to fail us, when we can no longer regard with unmixed joy the harvest of our own sowing, the "blessing" of children? Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 428 A man is a philosopher of genius only when he succeeds in transforming the primitive and wholly natural vision into an abstract idea belonging to the common stock of consciousness. This achievement, and this alone, constitutes his personal value, for which he may take credit without necessarily succumbing to inflation. The personal value lies entirely in the philosophical achievement, not in the primary vision. To the philosopher this vision comes as so much increment and is simply a part of the common property of mankind, in which, in principle, everyone has a share. The golden apples drop from the same tree, whether they be gathered by an imbecile locksmith's apprentice or by a Schopenhauer. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 229 Morality was not brought down on tables of stone from Sinai and imposed on the people, but is a function of the human soul, as old as humanity itself. Morality is not imposed from outside; we have it in ourselves from the start —not the law, but our moral nature without which the collective life of human society would be impossible. That is why morality is found at all levels of society. It is the instinctive regulator of action which also governs the collective life of the herd. But moral laws are only valid within a compact human group. Beyond that, they cease. There the old truth runs: Homo homini lupus. With the growth of civilization we have succeeded in subjecting ever larger human groups to the rule of the same morality, without, however, having yet brought the moral code to prevail beyond the social frontiers, that is, in the free space between mutually independent societies. There, as of old, reign lawlessness and license and mad immorality—though of course it is only the enemy who dares to say it out loud. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 30 The sense of moral inferiority always indicates that the missing element is something which, to judge by his feeling about it, really ought not be missing, or which could be made conscious if only one took sufficient trouble. The moral inferiority does not come from a collision with the generally accepted and, in a sense, arbitrary moral law, but from the conflict with one's own self which, for reasons of psychic equilibrium, demands that the deficit be redressed. Whenever a sense of moral inferiority appears, it indicates not only a need to assimilate an unconscious component, but also the possibility of such assimilation. In the last resort it is a man's moral qualities which force him, either through direct recognition of the need or indirectly through a painful neurosis, to assimilate his unconscious self and to keep himself fully conscious. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 218 We always start with the naive assumption that we are masters in our own house. Hence we must first accustom ourselves to the thought that, in our most intimate psychic life as well, we live in a kind of house which has doors and windows to the world, but that, although the objects or contents of this world act upon us, they do not belong to us. For many people this hypothesis is by no means easy to conceive, just as they do not find it at all easy to understand and to accept the fact that their neighbour's psychology is not necessarily identical with their own. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 329 Every individual needs revolution, inner division, overthrow of the existing order, and renewal, but not by forcing these things upon his neighbours under the hypocritical cloak of Christian love or the sense of social responsibility or any of the other beautiful euphemisms for unconscious urges to personal power. Individual self-reflection return of the individual to the ground of human nature, to his own deepest being with its individual and social destiny here is the beginning of a cure for that blindness which reigns at the present hour. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 5 Old Heraclitus, who was indeed a very great sage, discovered the most marvellous of all psychological laws: the regulative function of opposites. He called it enantiodromia, a running contrariwise, by which he meant that sooner or later everything runs into its opposite. Thus the rational attitude of culture necessarily runs into its opposite, namely the irrational devastation of culture. We should never identify ourselves with reason, for man is not and never will be a creature of reason alone, a fact to be noted by all pedantic culture-mongers. The irrational cannot be and must not be extirpated. The gods cannot and must not die. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para III A man is only half understood when we know how everything in him came into being. If that were all, he could just as well have been dead years ago. As a living being he is not understood, for life does not have only a yesterday, nor is it explained by reducing today to yesterday. Life has also a tomorrow, and today is understood only when we can add to our knowledge of what was yesterday the beginnings of tomorrow. This is true of all life's psychological expressions, even of pathological symptoms. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 67 It is the duty of one who goes his own way to inform society of what he finds on his voyage of discovery, be it cooling water for the thirsty or the sandy wastes of unfruitful error. The one helps, the other warns. Not the criticism of individual contemporaries will decide the truth or falsity of his discoveries, but future generations. There are things that are not yet true today, perhaps we dare not find them true, but tomorrow they may be. So every man whose fate it is to go his individual way must proceed with hopefulness and watchfulness, ever conscious of his loneliness and its dangers. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 201 Too many still look outwards, some believing in the illusion of victory and of victorious power, others in treaties and laws, and others again in the overthrow of the existing order. But still too few look inwards, to their own selves, and still too few ask themselves whether the ends of human society might not best be served if each man tried to abolish the old order in himself, and to practise in his own person and in his own inward state those precepts and victories which he preaches at every street-corner, instead of always expecting these things of his fellow men. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 5 From a consideration of the claims of the inner and outer worlds, or rather, from the conflict between them, the possible and the necessary follows. Unfortunately our Western mind, lacking all culture in this respect, has never yet devised a concept, nor even a name, for the union of opposites through the middle path, that most fundamental item of inward experience, which could respectably be set against the Chinese concept of Tao. It is at once the most individual fact and the most universal, the most legitimate fulfilment of the meaning of the individual's life. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 327 The tragic counter play between inside and outside (depicted in Job and Faust as the wager with God) represents, at bottom, the energetics of the life process, the polar tension that is necessary for self-regulation. However different, to all intents and purposes, these opposing forces may be, their fundamental meaning and desire is the life of the individual they always fluctuate round this centre of balance. Just because they are inseparably related through opposition, they also unite in a mediatory meaning, which, willingly or unwillingly, is born out of the individual and is therefore divined by him. He has a strong feeling of what should be and what could be. To depart from this divination means error, aberration, illness. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 311 We know that there is no human fore- sight or wisdom that can prescribe direction to our life, except for small stretches of the way. This is of course true only of the "ordinary" type of life, not of the "heroic" type. The latter kind also exists, though it is much rarer. Here we are certainly not entitled to say that no marked direction can be given to life, or only for short distances. The heroic conduct of life is absolute—that is, it is oriented by fateful decisions, and the decision to go in a certain direction holds, sometimes, to the bitter end. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 72 Nature is aristocratic, but not in the sense of having reserved the possibility of differentiation exclusively for species high in the scale. So too with the possibility of psychic development: it is not reserved for specially gifted individuals. In other words, in order to undergo a far-reaching psychological development, neither outstanding intelligence nor any other talent is necessary, since in this development moral qualities can make up for intellectual shortcomings. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 198 Much indeed can be attained by the will, but, in view of the fate of certain markedly strong-willed personalities, it is a fundamental error to try to subject our own fate at all costs to our will. Our will is a function regulated by reflection; hence it is dependent on the quality of that reflection. This, if it really is reflection, is supposed to be rational, i.e., in accord with reason. But has it ever been shown, or will it ever be, that life and fate are in accord with reason, that they too are rational? We have on the contrary good grounds for supposing that they are irrational, or rather that in the last resort they are grounded beyond human reason. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 72 We know of course that when for one reason or another we feel out of sorts, we are liable to commit not only the minor follies, but something really dangerous which, given the right psychological moment, may well put an end to our lives. The popular saying, "Old so-and-so chose the right time to die," comes from a sure sense of the secret psychological cause. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 194 Our life is indeed the same as it ever was. At all events, in our sense of the word it is not transitory; for the same physiological and psychological processes that have been man's for hundreds of thousands of years still endure, instilling into our inmost hearts this profound intuition of the "eternal" continuity of the living. But the self, as an inclusive term that embraces our whole living organism, not only contains the deposit and totality of all past life, but is also a point of departure, the fertile soil from which all future life will spring. This premonition of futurity is as clearly impressed upon our innermost feelings as is the historical aspect. The idea of immortality follows legitimately from these psychological premises. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 303 The idea of God is an absolutely necessary psychological function of an irrational nature, which has nothing whatever to do with the question of God's existence. The human intellect can never answer this question, still less give any proof of God. Moreover such proof is superfluous, for the idea of an all-powerful divine Being is present everywhere, unconsciously if not consciously, because it is an archetype. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 110 "The transition from morning to afternoon means a revaluation of the earlier values. There comes the urgent need to appreciate the value of the opposite of our former ideals, to perceive the error in our former convictions, to recognize the untruth in our former truth, and to feel how much antagonism and even hatred lay in what, until now, had passed for love. Not a few of those who are drawn into the conflict of opposites jettison everything that had previously seemed to them good and worth striving for; they try to live in complete opposition to their former ego. Changes of profession, divorces, religious convulsions, apostasies of every description, are the symptoms of this swing over to the opposite. The snag about a radical conversion into one's opposite is that one's former life suffers repression and thus produces just as unbalanced a state as existed before, when the counterparts of the conscious virtues and values were still repressed and unconscious. Just as before, perhaps, neurotic disorders arose because the opposing fantasies were unconscious, so now other disorders arise through the repression of former idols. It is of course a fundamental mistake to imagine that when we see the non-value in a value or the untruth in a truth, the value or the truth ceases to exist. It has only become relative. Everything human is relative, because everything rests on an inner polarity; for everything is a phenomenon of energy. Energy necessarily depends on a pre-existing polarity, without which there could be no energy. There must always be high and low, hot and cold, etc., so that the equilibrating process-which is energy can take place. Therefore the tendency to deny all previous values in favour of their opposites is just as much of an exaggeration as the earlier one-sidedness. And in so far as it is a question of rejecting universally accepted and indubitable values, the result is a fatal loss. One who acts in this way empties himself out with his values, as Nietzsche has already said. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 115 It seems to me their origin can only be explained by assuming them to be deposits of the constantly repeated experiences of humanity Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 109 …for the contents of the collective unconscious are not only residues of archaic, specifically human modes of functioning, but also the residues of functions from [our] animal ancestry, whose duration in time was infinitely greater than the relatively brief epoch of specifically human existence Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 159. I [Jung] regard dreams not only as a valuable source of information but as an extraordinarily effective instrument of education Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 174 It is a process of domestication which cannot be accomplished without rebellion on the part of the animal nature [in man] that thirsts for freedom. From time to time there passes as it were a wave of frenzy through the ranks of men too long constrained within the limitations of their culture Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 17 Antiquity experienced it [the frenzy] in the Dionysian orgies that surged over from the East and became an essential and characteristic ingredient of classical culture Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 17 Morality is not imposed from outside; we have it in ourselves from the start not the law, but our moral nature without which the collective life of human society would be impossible. That is why morality is found at all levels of society Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 30 It is a notorious fact that the morality of a society as a whole is in inverse ratio to its size; for the greater the aggregation of individuals, the more the individual factors are blotted out, and with them morality, which rests entirely on the moral sense of the individual and the freedom necessary for this Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 240 The spirit of these orgies contributed not a little towards the development of the stoic ideal of asceticism in the innumerable sects and philosophical schools of the last century before Christ, which produced from the polytheistic chaos of that epoch the twin ascetic religions of Mithraism and Christianity Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 17 But the most important method of getting at the pathogenic conflicts is, as Freud was the first to show, through the analysis of dreams Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 20 Hence every man is, in a certain sense, unconsciously a worse man when he is in society than when acting alone; for he is carried by society and to that extent relieved of his individual responsibility Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 240 Any large company composed of wholly admirable persons has the morality and intelligence of an unwieldy, stupid, and violent animal. The bigger the organization, the more unavoidable is its immorality and blind stupidity Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 240 Society, by automatically stressing all the collective qualities in its individual representatives, puts a premium on mediocrity, on everything that settles down to vegetate in an easy, irresponsible way Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 240 Individuality will inevitably be driven to the wall. This process begins in school, continues at the university, and rules all departments in which the State has a hand Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 240 The man of today, who resembles more or less the collective ideal, has made his heart into a den of murderers, as can easily be proved by the analysis of his unconscious, even though he himself is not in the least disturbed by it Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 240 In so far as he is normally "adapted" to his environment, it is true that the greatest infamy on the part of his group will not disturb him, so long as the majority of his fellows steadfastly believe in the exalted morality of their social organization Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 240 Morality is not imposed from outside; we have it in ourselves from the start not the law, but our moral nature without which the collective life of human society would be impossible. That is why morality is found at all levels of society Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 30

It is the instinctive regulator of action which also governs the collective life of the herd. But moral laws are only valid within a compact human group. Beyond that, they cease Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 30 In a small social body, the individuality of its members is better safeguarded; and the greater is their relative freedom and the possibility of conscious responsibility Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 240 "Eros is a mighty daemon," as the wise Diotima said to Socrates. We shall never get the better of him, or only to our own hurt. He is not the whole of our inward nature, though he is at least one of its essential aspects Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 33 Man can suffer only a certain amount of culture without injury. The endless dilemma of culture and nature is always a question of too much or too little, never of either-or. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 41 Faust shows in Part I what it means to accept instinct, and in Part II what it means to accept the ego and its weird unconscious world Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 43 Love may be effectively used as a means for gaining the upper hand. Love and good behaviour are, from the standpoint of the power-instinct, known to be a choice means to this end. Virtuousness often serves to compel recognition from others Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 50 Chance falls into the category of the irrational not as denoting something contrary to reason, but something beyond reason Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 774 It results from the irrationality of the events of life and fate, reigning everywhere, hence reason and the will that is grounded in reason are valid only up to a point Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 72 It has become abundantly clear to me that life can flow forward only along the path of the gradient. But there is no energy unless there is a tension of opposites; hence it is necessary to discover the opposite to the attitude of the conscious mind Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 78 The conscious mind is on top, the shadow underneath, and just as high always longs for low and hot for cold, so all consciousness, perhaps without being aware of it, seeks its unconscious opposite, lacking which it is doomed to stagnation, congestion, and ossification. Life is born only of the spark of opposites Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 78 The reflective nature of the introvert causes him always to think and consider before acting. This naturally makes him slow to act. His shyness and distrust of things induce hesitation, and so he always has difficulty in adapting to the external world Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 80 The two types therefore seem created for a symbiosis. The ones takes care of reflection [introvert], and the other sees to the initiative and practical action [extravert] Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 80 The essence of the inferior function is autonomy; it is independent, it attacks, it fascinates and so spins us about that we are no longer masters of ourselves and can no longer rightly distinguish between ourselves and others Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 85 The original method was hypnotism: either interrogation in a state of hypnotic concentration or else the spontaneous production of fantasies by the patient while in this state. This method is still occasionally employed, but compared with the present technique it is primitive and often unsatisfactory Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 20 This [identification with the collective psyche] amounts to an acceptance of "godlikeness," but now exalted into a system. That is to say, one is the fortunate possessor of the great truth, which was only waiting to be discovered, of the eschatological knowledge which spells the healing of the nation's Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 476 Access to the collective psyche means a renewal of life for the individual, no matter whether this renewal is felt as pleasant or unpleasant. Everybody would like to hold fast to this renewal: one man because it enhances his life-feeling, another because it promises a rich harvest of knowledge Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 476 But he thrives only when spirit and instinct are in right harmony. If one or the other aspect is lacking to him, the result is injury or at least a lopsidedness that may easily veer towards the pathological. Too much of the animal distorts the civilized man, too much civilization makes sick animals Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 32 This dilemma reveals the vast uncertainty that Eros holds for man. For, at the bottom, Eros is a superhuman power which, like nature herself, allows itself to be conquered and exploited as though it were impotent. But triumph over nature is dearly paid for. Nature requires no explanations of principle, but asks only for tolerance and wise mea- sure Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 32 The universal similarity of human brains leads to the universal possibility of a uniform mental functioning. This functioning is the collective psyche. This can be subdivided into the collective mind and the collective soul Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 456 Inasmuch as there are differentiations corresponding to race, tribe, and even family, there is also a collective psyche limited to race, tribe, and family over and above the "universal" collective psyche Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 456 To borrow an expression from Pierre Janet, the collective psyche comprises the parties inférieures of the mental functions, that is to say those deep-rooted, well-nigh automatic portions of the individual psyche which are inherited and are to be found everywhere, and are thus impersonal or suprapersonal Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 456 Consciousness plus the personal unconscious constitutes the parties supérieures of the mental functions, those portions, therefore, that are developed ontogenetically and acquired as a result of personal differentiation Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 456 And that is what matters in practical treatment: that human beings should get a hold on their own lives, not that the principles by which they live should be proved rationally to be "right" Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 493 Sometimes it is enough to leave the unconscious to discover the new line, but this attitude is not to be recommended to the neurotic under all circumstances, although there are indeed cases where this is just what the patient needs to learn how to put his trust in so-called chance Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 501 However, it is not advisable to let oneself drift for any length of time; a watchful eye should at least be kept on the reactions of the unconscious, that is, on dreams, which indicate like a barometer the one-sidedness of our attitude Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 501 Unlike other psychologists, I therefore consider it necessary for the patient to remain in contact with his unconscious, even after analysis, if he wishes to avoid a relapse Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 501 Often enough I have observed an increase in the liability to physical illness, but only when the patients relish their condition and dwell on it too long Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 467 It is a process of domestication which cannot be accomplished without rebellion on the part of the animal nature that thirsts for freedom Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 427 This step beyond science is an unconditional requirement of the psychological development I have sought to depict, because without this postulate I could give no adequate formulation of the psychic processes that occur empirically Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 405 The Self could be characterized as a kind of compensation for the conflict between inside and outside. This formulation would not be unfitting, since the Self has somewhat the character of a result, of a goal attained, something that has come to pass very gradually and is experienced with much travail Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 404 So too the Self is our life's goal, for it is the completest expression of that fateful combination we call individuality, the full flowering not only of the single individual, but of the group, in which each adds his portion to the whole Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 404 The fact is that the whole symbolism of initiation rises up, clear and unmistakable, in the unconscious contents. The objection that this is antiquated superstition and altogether unscientific is about as intelligent as remarking, in the presence of a cholera epidemic, that it is merely an infectious disease and exceedingly unhygienic Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 385 Hence the "magician" could only take possession of the ego only because the ego dreamed of victory over the anima. That dream was an encroachment, and every encroachment of the ego is followed by an encroachment from the unconscious Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 382 Consequently, if the ego drops its claim to victory, possession by the magician ceases automatically. But what happens to the mana? Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 382 Now when the anima loses her mana, what becomes of it? Clearly the man who has mastered the anima acquires her mana, in accordance with the primitive belief that when a man kills the mana-person he assimilates the other's mana into his own body Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 376 In the case of a real settlement with the unconscious it is not a question of interpretation: it is a question of releasing unconscious processes and letting them come into the conscious mind in the form of fantasies Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 342 Without knowing it, such women are solely intent upon exasperating the man and are, in consequence, the more completely at the mercy of the animus. “Unfortunately I am always right,” one of these creatures once confessed to me Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 335 It would be insufficient to characterize the animus merely as a conservative, collective conscience; he is also a neologist who, in flagrant contradiction to his correct opinions, has an extraordinary weakness for difficult and unfamiliar words which act as a pleasant substitute for the odious task of reflection Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 333 The aim of individuation is nothing less than to divest the Self of the false wrappings of the persona on the one hand, and the suggestive power of primordial images on the other Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 269 The moment of irruption can, however, be very sudden, so that consciousness is instantaneously flooded with extremely strange and apparently quite unsuspected contents. That is how it looks to the layman and even to the person concerned, but the experienced observer knows that psychological events are never sudden Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 270 In reality the irruption has been preparing for many years, often for half a lifetime, and already in childhood all sorts of remarkable signs could have been detected which, in more or less symbolic fashion, hinted at abnormal future developments Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 270 We should not, however, labor under the illusion that we have now discovered the real nature of the unconscious processes. We never succeed in getting further than the hypothetical “as if” Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 272 People who go illegitimately mooning after the infinite often have absurdly banal dreams which endeavor to damp down their ebullience. Thus, from the nature of the compensation, we can at once draw conclusions as to the seriousness and rightness of the conscious strivings Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 288 Even with us the collective dream has a feeling of importance about it that impels communication. It springs from a conflict of relationship and must therefore be built into our conscious relations, because it compensates these and not just some inner personal quirk Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 277 It is in fact one of the earliest and most universal acquisitions of humanity: it is nothing less than the conviction as to the concrete existence of a spirit-world Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 293 The spirit-world was certainly never an invention in the sense that fire-boring was an invention; it was far rather the experience, the conscious acceptance of a reality in no way inferior to that of the material world Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 293 The image is unconsciously projected, and when the parents die, the projected image goes on working as though it were a spirit existing on its own. The primitive then speaks of parental spirits who return by night (revenants), while the modern man calls it a father or mother complex Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 294 The more limited a man’s field of consciousness is, the more numerous the psychic contents (imagos) which meet him as quasi-external apparitions, either in the form of spirits, or as magical potencies projected upon living people (magicians, witches, etc.) Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 295 At a rather higher stage of development, where the idea of the soul already exists, not all the imagos continue to be projected (where this happens, even trees and stones talk), but one or the other complex has come near enough to consciousness to be felt as no longer strange, but as somehow “belonging” Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 295 A man counts it a virtue to repress his feminine traits as much as possible, just as a woman, at least until recently, considered it unbecoming to be “mannish.” The repression of feminine traits and inclinations naturally causes these contrasexual demands to accumulate in the unconscious Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 297 The “spotless” man of honor and public benefactor, whose tantrums and explosive moodiness terrify his wife and children. What is the anima doing here? Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 319 Whence does the anima obtain the power to wield such enchantment. On the analogy with the persona there must be values or some other important and influential factors lying in the background like seductive promises. In such matters we must guard against rationalizations Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 320 Thus the whole nature of man presupposes woman, both physically and spiritually. His system is tuned in to woman from the start, just as it is prepared for a quite definite world where there is water, light, air, salt, carbohydrates, etc. Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 300 “High rests on low," says Lao-tzu. An opposite forces its way up from inside; it is exactly as though the unconscious suppressed the ego with the very same power which drew the ego into the persona Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 308 The absence of resistance outwardly against the lure of the persona means a similar weakness inwardly against the influence of the unconscious Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 308 Outwardly an effective and powerful role is played, while inwardly an effeminate weakness develops in face of every influence coming from the unconscious. Moods, vagaries, timidity, even a limp sexuality (culminating in impotence), gradually gain the upper hand Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 308 In place of the parents, woman takes up her position as the most immediate environmental influence in the life of the adult man. She becomes his companion, she belongs to him in so far as she shares his life and is more or less the same age Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 296 Now, everything that is true of the persona and of all autonomous complexes in general also holds true of the anima. She likewise is a personality, and this is why she is so easily projected upon a woman. So long as the anima is unconscious she is always projected, for everything unconscious is projected Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 314 The first bearer of the soul-image is always the mother; later it is borne by those women who arouse the man's feelings, whether in a positive or a negative sense. Because the mother is the first bearer of the soul-image, separation from her is a delicate and important matter of the greatest educational significance Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 314 The anima comes between them like a jealous mistress who tries to alienate the man from his family. An official post or any other advantageous social position can do the same thing, but there we can understand the force of the attraction Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 320 It could therefore be said just as truly that one should cultivate the art of conversing with oneself in the setting provided by an affect, as though the affect itself were speaking without regard to our rational criticism. So long as the affect is speaking, criticism must be withheld Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 323 These two examples of fantasy represent the positive activity of anima and animus. To the degree that the patient takes an active part, the personified figure of anima or animus will disappear. It becomes the function of relationship between conscious and unconscious Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 370 Victory over the collective psyche alone yields the true value the capture of the hoard, the invincible weapon, the magic talisman, or whatever it be that the myth deems most desirable Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 477 Anyone who identifies with the collective psyche or, in mythological terms, lets himself be devoured by the monster and vanishes in it, attains the treasure that the dragon guards, but he does so in spite of himself and to his own greatest harm Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 477 If we reduce this by analysis to something that is generally known, we destroy the true value of the symbol; but to attribute hermeneutic significance to it is consistent with its value and its meaning Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 492 Thus Freud's sexual theory of neurosis is grounded on a true and factual principle. But it makes the mistake of being one-sided and exclusive; also it commits the imprudence of trying to lay hold of unconfinable Eros with the crude terminology of sex. In this respect Freud is a typical representative of the materialistic epoch, whose hope it was to solve the world riddle in a test-tube. Freud himself, with advancing years, admitted this lack of balance in his theory, and he opposed to Eros, whom he called libido, the destructive or death instinct Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 33 But the ecstatic by-passes the law of his own life and behaves, from the point of view of nature, improperly. This impropriety is the exclusive prerogative of man, whose consciousness and free will can occasionally loose themselves contra naturam from their roots in animal nature. It is the indispensable foundation of all culture, but also of spiritual sickness if exaggerated Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 41 I myself have known more than one person who owed his entire usefulness and reason for existence to a neurosis, which prevented all the critical follies in his life and forced him to a mode of living that developed his valuable potentialities. These might have been stifled had not the neurosis, with iron grip, held him to the place where he belonged Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 68 There are actually people who have the whole meaning of their life, their true significance, in the unconscious, while in the conscious mind is nothing but inveiglement and error. With others the case is reversed, and here neurosis has a different meaning. In these cases, but not in the former, a thorough going reduction is indicated Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 68 The question of the gradient is an eminently practical problem which crops up in most analyses. For instance, when in a favourable case the disposable energy, the so-called libido, does seize hold of a rational object, we think we have brought about the transformation through conscious exertion of the will. But in that we are deluded, because even the most strenuous exertions would not have sufficed had there not been present at the same time a gradient in that direction Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 77 When the man has made enough money, or if a fine legacy should drop from the skies and external necessity no longer presses, then they have time to occupy themselves with one another. Hitherto they stood back-to-back and defended themselves against necessity. But now they turn face to face and look for understanding only to discover that they have never understood one another. Each speaks a different language. Then the conflict between the two types begins Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 80 Let us suppose two youths are rambling in the country. They come to a fine castle; both want to see inside it. The introvert says, "I'd like to know what it's like inside." The extravert answers, "Right, let's go in," and makes for the gateway. The introvert draws back "Perhaps we aren't allowed in," says he, with visions of policemen, fines, and fierce dogs in the background. Whereupon the extravert answers, "Well, we can ask. They'll let us in all right "with visions of kindly old watchmen, hospitable seigneurs, and the possibility of romantic adventures. On the strength of extraverted optimism they at length find themselves in the castle. But now comes the dénouement Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 81 The castle has been rebuilt inside and contains nothing but a couple of rooms with a collection of old manuscripts. As it happens, old manuscripts are the chief joy of the introverted youth. Hardly has he caught sight of them than he becomes as one transformed. He loses himself in contemplation of the treasures, uttering cries of enthusiasm. He engages the caretaker in conversation so as to extract from him as much information as possible, and when the result is disappointing he asks to see the curator in order to propound his questions to him. His shyness has vanished, objects have taken on a seductive glamour, and the world wears a new face Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 81 But meanwhile the spirits of the extraverted youth are ebbing lower and lower. His face grows longer and he begins to yawn. No kindly watchmen are forthcoming here, no knightly hospitality, not a trace of romantic adventure only a castle made over into a museum. There are manuscripts enough to be seen at home. While the enthusiasm of the one rises, the spirits of the other fall, the castle bores him, the manuscripts remind him of a library, library is associated with university, university with studies and menacing examinations Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 81 Gradually a veil of gloom descends over the once so interesting and enticing castle. The object becomes negative. "Isn't it marvellous," cries the introvert, "to have stumbled on this wonderful collection?" "The place bores me to extinction," replies the other with undisguised ill humour. This annoys the introvert, who secretly vows never again to go rambling with an extravert. The latter is annoyed with the other's annoyance, and he thinks to himself that he always knew the fellow was an inconsiderate egotist who would, in his own selfish interest, waste all the lovely spring day that could be enjoyed so much better out of doors Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 81 A feeling which the person who has a secret need to be understood and recognized speaks of but does not really believe Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 226 Positive as well as negative occurrences can constellate the inferior counter-function. When this happens, sensitiveness appears. Sensitiveness is a sure sign of the presence of inferiority. This provides the psychological basis for discord and misunderstanding, not only as between two people, but also in ourselves Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 85 We have to distinguish between a personal unconscious and an impersonal or transpersonal unconscious. We speak of the latter also as the collective unconscious, because it is detached from anything personal and is common to all men, since its contents can be found everywhere, which is naturally not the case with the personal contents Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 103 The personal unconscious contains lost memories, painful ideas that are repressed (i.e., forgotten on purpose), subliminal perceptions, by which are meant sense-perceptions that were not strong enough to reach consciousness, and finally, contents that are not yet ripe for consciousness. It corresponds to the figure of the shadow so frequently met with in dreams Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 103 The personal layer ends at the earliest memories of infancy, but the collective layer comprises the pre-infantile period, that is, the residues of ancestral life. Whereas the memory-images of the personal unconscious are, as it were, filled out, because they are images personally experienced by the individual, the archetypes of the collective unconscious are not filled out because they are forms not personally experienced Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 118 When on the other hand, psychic energy regresses, going beyond even the period of early infancy, and breaks into the legacy of ancestral life, the mythological images are awakened: these are the archetypes. An interior spiritual world whose existence we never suspected opens out and displays contents which seem to stand in sharpest contrast to all our former ideas Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 118 These images are so intense that it is quite understandable why millions of cultivated persons should be taken in by theosophy and anthroposophy. This happens simply because such modern gnostic systems meet the need for expressing and formulating the wordless occurrences going on within ourselves better than any of the existing forms of Christianity, not excepting Catholicism Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 118 The primordial images [archetypes] are as much feelings as thoughts; indeed, they lead their own independent life rather in the manner of part-souls, as can easily be seen in those philosophical or Gnostic systems which rely on perception of the unconscious as the source of knowledge Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 104 In the Old Testament the magic power glows in the burning bush and in the countenance of Moses; in the Gospels it descends with the Holy Ghost in the form of fiery tongues from heaven. In Heraclitus it appears as world energy, as "ever-living fire"; among the Persians it is the fiery glow of haoma, divine grace; among the Stoics it is the original heat, the power of fate Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 108 So this idea has been stamped on the human brain for aeons. That is why it lies ready to hand in the unconscious of every man. Only, certain conditions are needed to cause it to appear. These conditions were evidently fulfilled in the case of Robert Mayer. The greatest and best thoughts of man shape themselves upon these primordial images as upon a blueprint Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 109 His energy, until now laid up in unserviceable and pathological forms, has come into its proper sphere. It is essential, in differentiating the ego from the non-ego, that a man should be firmly rooted in his ego-function; that is, he must fulfil his duty to life, so as to be in every respect a viable member of the community Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 113 As soon as we speak of the collective unconscious we find ourselves in a sphere, and concerned with a problem, which is altogether precluded in the practical analysis of young people or of those who have remained infantile too long Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 113 Wherever the father and mother imagos have still to be overcome, wherever there is a little bit of life still to be conquered, which is the natural possession of the average man, then we had better make no mention of the collective unconscious and the problem of opposites Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 113 But once the parental transferences and the youthful illusions have been mastered, or are at least ripe for mastery, then we must speak of these things. We are here outside the range of Freudian and Adlerian reductions; we are no longer concerned with how to remove the obstacles to a man's profession, or to his marriage, or to anything that means a widening of his life, but are confronted with the task of finding a meaning that will enable him to continue living at allay meaning more than blank resignation and mournful retrospect Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 113 The interpretation of a change of place as a change of attitude is corroborated by forms of speech in certain primitive languages, where, for example, "I am thinking of going" is ex- pressed as “I am at the place of (on the point of) going” Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 132 In so far as through our unconscious we have a share in the historical collective psyche, we live naturally and unconsciously in a world of werewolves, demons, magicians, etc., for these are things which all previous ages have invested with tremendous affectivity. Equally we have a share in gods and devils, saviours and criminals; but it would be absurd to attribute these potentialities of the unconscious to ourselves personally Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 150 It is therefore absolutely essential to make the sharpest possible demarcation between the personal and the impersonal attributes of the psyche. This is not to deny the sometimes very formidable existence of the contents of the collective unconscious, but only to stress that, as contents of the collective psyche, they are opposed to and different from the individual psyche Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 150 Thus the gods were disposed of. But the corresponding psychological function was by no means disposed of; it lapsed into the unconscious, and men were thereupon poisoned by the surplus of libido that had once been laid up in the cult of divine images. The devaluation and repression of so powerful a function as the religious function naturally has serious consequences for the psychology of the individual. The unconscious is prodigiously strengthened by this reflux of libido, and, through its archaic collective contents, begins to exercise a powerful influence on the conscious mind. The period of the Enlightenment closed, as we know, with the horrors of the French Revolution Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 150 On account of their affinity with physical phenomena, the archetypes usually appear in projection; and, because projections are unconscious, they appear on persons in the immediate environment, mostly in the form of abnormal over- or under-valuations which provoke misunderstandings, quarrels, fanaticisms, and follies of every description Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 152 Thus we say, “He makes a god of so-and-so,” or, “So-and-so is Mr. X’s bête noire.” In this way, too, there grow up modern myth-formations, i.e., fantastic rumours, suspicions, prejudices. The archetypes are therefore exceedingly important things with a powerful effect, meriting our closest attention. They must not be suppressed out of have, but must be very carefully weighed and considered, if only because of the danger of psychic infection they carry with them Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 152 Thus, when somebody projects the devil upon his neighbour, he does so because this person has something about him which makes the attachment of such an image possible. But this is not to say that the man is on that account a devil; on the contrary, he may be a particularly good fellow, but antipathetic to the maker of the projection, so that a “devilish” (i.e., dividing) effect arises between them Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 152 Nor need the projector necessarily be a devil, although he has to recognize that he has something just as devilish in himself and has only stumbled upon it by projecting it. But that does not make him a devil; indeed he may be just as decent as the other man. The appearance of the devil in such a case simply means that the two people are at present incompatible: for which reason the unconscious forces them apart and keeps them away from each other. The devil is a variant of the “shadow” archetype, i.e., of the dangerous aspect of the unrecognized dark half of the personality Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 152 A good example of this is Gustav Meyrink’s Golem, also the Tibetan wizard in the same author’s Fledermäuse, who unleashes world war by magic. Naturally Meyrink learned nothing of this from me; he brought it independently out of his unconscious by clothing in words and imagery a feeling not unlike the one which my patient had projected upon me Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 153 This figure often appears as dark-skinned and of mongoloid type, and then it represents a negative and possibly dangerous aspect. Sometimes it can hardly be distinguished, if at all, from the shadow; but the more the magical note predominates, the easier it is to make the distinction, and this is not without relevance in so far as the demon can also have a very positive aspect as the “wise old man” Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 154 She has too little hold upon life to risk all at once a complete reversal of standpoint. The collective unconscious has fallen upon her and threatens to bear her away from a reality whose demands have not been adequately met. Accordingly, as the dream indicates, the collective unconscious had to be presented to her as something dangerous, otherwise she would have been only too ready to make it a refuge from the demands of life Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 161 He [the patient] had a particularly close tie with his mother. By this we are not to understand a particularly good or intense conscious relationship, but something in the nature of a secret, subterranean tie which expresses itself consciously, perhaps, only in the retarded development of character, i.e., in a relative infantilism Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 171 In the case of this young man the images of the collective unconscious play an entirely positive role, which comes from the fact that he has no really dangerous tendency to fall back on a fantasy-substitute for reality and to entrench himself behind it against life. The effect of these unconscious images has something fateful about it. Perhaps who knows? These eternal images are what men mean by fate Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 183 Viewed in this light, the homosexuality of adolescence is only a misunderstanding of the otherwise very appropriate need for masculine guidance. One mght also say that the fear of incest which is based on the mother-complex extends to women in general; but in my opinion an immature man is quite right to be afraid of women, because his relations with women are generally disastrous Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 173 This natural process of individuation served me both as a model and guiding principle for my method of treatment. The unconscious compensation of a neurotic conscious attitude contains all the elements that could effectively and healthily correct the one-sidedness of the conscious mind, if these elements were made conscious, i.e., understood and integrated into it as realities Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 187 It is only very seldom that a dream achieves such intensity that the shock is enough to throw the conscious mind out of the saddle. As a rule dreams are too feeble and too unintelligible to exercise a radical influence on consciousness. In consequence, the compensation runs underground in the unconscious and has no immediate effect. But it has some effect all the same; only, it is indirect in so far as the unconscious opposition will, if consistently ignored, arrange symptoms and situations which irresistibly thwart our conscious intentions Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 187 The aim of the treatment is therefore to understand and to appreciate, so far as practicable, dreams and all other manifestations of the unconscious, firstly in order to prevent the formation of an unconscious opposition which becomes more dangerous as time goes on, and secondly in order to make the fullest possible use of the healing factor of compensation Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 187 When a case is treated in the manner indicated, the initiative lies with the unconscious, but all criticism, choice, and decision lie with the conscious mind. If the decision is right, it will be confirmed by dreams indicative of progress; in the other event correction will follow from the side of the unconscious Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 189 The course of treatment is thus rather like a running conversation with the unconscious. That the correct interpretation of dreams is of paramount importance should be sufficiently clear from what has been said. But when, you may rightly ask, is one sure of the interpretation? Is there anything approaching a reliable criterion for the correctness of an interpretation? This question, happily, can be answered in the affirmative. If we have made a wrong interpretation, or if it is somehow incomplete, we may be able to see it from the next dream Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 189 Thus, for example, the earlier motif will be repeated in clearer form, or our interpretation may be deflated by some ironic paraphrase, or it may meet with straightforward violent opposition Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 189 Now supposing that these interpretations also go astray, the general inconclusiveness and futility of our procedure will make itself felt soon enough in the bleakness, sterility, and pointlessness of the undertaking, so that doctor and patient alike will be suffocated either by boredom or by doubt. Just as the reward of a correct interpretation is an uprush of life, so an incorrect one dooms them to deadlock, resistance, doubt, and mutual desiccation Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 189 A very large number of accidents of every description, more than people would ever guess, are of psychic causation, ranging from trivial mishaps like stumbling, banging oneself, burning one's fingers, etc., to car smashes and catastrophes in the mountains: all these may be psychically caused and may sometimes have been preparing for weeks or even months Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 194 I have examined many cases of this kind, and often I could point to dreams which showed signs of a tendency to self-injury weeks beforehand. All those accidents that happen from so-called carelessness should be examined for such determinants Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 194 We know of course that when for one reason or another we feel out of sorts, we are liable to commit not only the minor follies, but something really dangerous which, given the right psychological moment, may well put an end to our lives Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 194 This activity should be thought of as completely autonomous only in pathological cases; normally it is co-ordinated with the conscious mind in a compensatory relationship Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 204 The progress of her life was thus held up, and that inner disunity so characteristic of a neurosis promptly made its appearance. The so-called normal person would probably be able to break the emotional bond in one or the other direction by a powerful act of will, or else and this is perhaps the more usual thing he would come through the difficulty unconsciously, on the smooth path of instinct, without ever being aware of the sort of conflict that lay behind his headaches or other physical discomforts Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 206 But any weakness of instinct (which may have many causes) is enough to hinder a smooth unconscious transition. Then all progress is delayed by conflict, and the resulting stasis of life is equivalent to a neurosis Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 206 In consequence of the standstill, psychic energy flows off in every conceivable direction, apparently quite uselessly. For instance, there are excessive innervations of the sympathetic system, which lead to nervous disorders of the stomach and intestines; or the vagus (and consequently the heart) is stimulated; or fantasies and memories, uninteresting enough in themselves, become overvalued and prey on the conscious mind (mountains out of molehills) Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 206 In this state a new motive is needed to put an end to the morbid suspension. Nature herself paves the way for this, unconsciously and indirectly, through the phenomenon of the transference (Freud). In the course of treatment the patient transfers the father-imago to the doctor, thus making him, in a sense, the father, and in the sense that he is not the father, also making him a substitute for the man she cannot reach. The doctor therefore becomes both a father and a kind of lover in other words, an object of conflict Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 206 In him the opposites are united, and for this reason he stands for a quasi-ideal solution of the conflict. Without in the least wishing it, he draws upon himself an over-valuation that is almost incredible to the outsider, for to the patient he seems like a saviour or a god Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 206 This way of speaking is not altogether so laughable as it sounds. It is indeed a bit much to be a father and lover at once. Nobody could possibly stand up to it in the long run, precisely because it is too much of a good thing. One would have to be a demigod at least to sustain such a role without a break, for all the time one would have to be the giver Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 206 To the patient in the state of transference, this provisional solution naturally seems ideal, but only at first; in the end she comes to a standstill that is just as bad as the neurotic conflict was. Fundamentally, nothing has yet happened that might lead to a real solution. The conflict has merely been transferred Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 206 Nevertheless a successful transference cant least temporarily cause the whole neurosis to disappear, and for this reason it has been very rightly recognized by Freud as a healing factor of first-rate importance, but, at the same time, as a provisional state only, for although it holds out the possibility of a cure, it is far from being the cure itself Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 206 But the energy of the transference is so strong that it gives one the impression of a vital instinct. That being so, what is the purpose of such fantasies? A careful examination and analysis of the dreams, revealed a very marked tendency in contrast to conscious criticism, which always seeks to reduce things to human proportions to endow the person of the doctor with superhuman attributes Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 214 He had to be gigantic, primordial, huger than the father, like the wind that sweeps over the earth was he then to be made into a god? Or, I said to myself, was it rather the case that the unconscious was trying to create a god out of the person of the doctor, as it were to free a vision of God from the veils of the personal, so that the transference to the person of the doctor was no more than a misunderstanding on the part of the conscious mind, a stupid trick played by "sound common sense"? Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 214 The analysis and conscious realization of unconscious contents engender a certain superior tolerance, thanks to which even relatively indigestible portions of one's unconscious characterology can be accepted. This tolerance may look very wise and superior, but often it is no more than a grand gesture that brings all sorts of consequences in its train Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 224 Two spheres [the knowledge of good and evil] have been brought together which before were kept anxiously apart. After considerable resistances have been overcome, the union of opposites is successfully achieved, at least to all appearances Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 224 The deeper understanding thus gained, the juxtaposition of what was before separated [good and evil], and hence the apparent overcoming of the moral conflict, give rise to a feeling of superiority that may well be expressed by the term "godlikeness." But this same juxtaposition of good and evil can have a very different effect on a different kind of temperament. Not everyone will feel himself a superman, holding in his hands the scales of good and evil. It may also seem as though he were a helpless object caught between hammer and anvil; not in the least a Hercules at the parting of the ways, but rather a rudderless ship buffeted between Scylla and Charybdis Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 224 For without knowing it, he is caught up in perhaps the greatest and most ancient of human conflicts, experiencing the throes of eternal principles in collision. Well might he feel himself like a Prometheus chained to the Caucasus, or as one crucified. This would be a "godlikeness" in suffering Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 224 Godlikeness is certainly not a scientific concept, although it aptly characterizes the psychological state in question. Nor do I imagine that every reader will immediately grasp the peculiar state of mind implied by "godlikeness." The term belongs too exclusively to the sphere of belles-lettres. So I should probably be better advised to give a more circumspect description of this state Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 224 The insight and understanding, then, gained by the analysand usually reveal much to him that was before unconscious. He naturally applies this knowledge to his environment: in consequence he sees, or thinks he sees, many things that before were invisible. Since his knowledge was helpful to him, he readily assumes that it would be useful also to others Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 224 In this way he is liable to become arrogant; it may be well meant, but it is nonetheless annoying to other people. He feels as though he possesses a key that opens many, perhaps even all, doors Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 224 Psychoanalysis itself has this same bland unconsciousness of its limitations, as can clearly be seen from the way it meddles with works of art Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 224 Since human nature is not compounded wholly of light, but also abounds in shadows, the insight gained in practical analysis is often somewhat painful, the more so if, as is generally the case, one has previously neglected the other side. Hence there are people who take their newly won insight very much to heart, far too much in fact, quite forgetting that they are not unique in having a shadow-side. They allow themselves to get unduly depressed and are then inclined to doubt everything, finding nothing right anywhere Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 225 One man's optimism makes him overweening, while another's pessimism makes him over-anxious and despondent. Such are the forms which the great conflict takes when reduced to a smaller scale Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 225 But even in these lesser proportions the essence of the conflict is easily recognized: the arrogance of the one and the despondency of the other share a common uncertainty as to their boundaries. The one is excessively expanded, the other excessively contracted. Their individual boundaries are in some way obliterated Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 225 If we now consider the fact that, as a result of psychic compensation, great humility stands very close to pride, and that "pride goeth before a fall," we can easily discover behind the haughtiness certain traits of an anxious sense of inferiority Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 225 In fact we shall see clearly how his uncertainty forces the enthusiast to puff up his truths, of which he feels none too sure, and to win proselytes to his side in order that his followers may prove to himself the value and trustworthiness of his own convictions Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 225 Nor is he altogether so happy in his fund of knowledge as to be able to hold out alone; at bottom he feels isolated by it, and the secret fear of being left alone with it induces him to trot out his opinions and interpretations in and out of season, because only when convincing someone else does he feel safe from gnawing doubts Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 225 It is just the reverse with our despondent friend. The more he withdraws and hides himself, the greater becomes his secret need to be understood and recognized. Although he speaks of his inferiority he does not really believe it. There arises within him a defiant conviction of his unrecognized merits, and in consequence he is sensitive to the slightest disapprobation, always wearing the stricken air of one who is misunderstood and deprived of his rightful due. In this way he nurses a morbid pride and an insolent discontent which is the very last thing he wants and for which his environment has to pay all the more dearly Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 226 Both [states] are at once too small and too big; their individual mean, never very secure, now becomes shakier than ever. It sounds almost grotesque to describe such a state as "godlike." But since each in his way steps beyond his human proportions, both of them are a little "superhuman" and therefore, figuratively speaking, godlike Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 227 If we wish to avoid the use of this metaphor [godlike], I would suggest that we speak instead of "psychic inflation." The term seems to me appropriate in so far as the state we are discussing involves an extension of the personality beyond individual limits, in other words, a state of being puffed up. In such a state a man fills a space which normally he cannot fill. He can only fill it by appropriating to himself contents and qualities which properly exist for themselves alone and should therefore remain outside our bounds. What lies outside ourselves belongs either to someone else, or to everyone, or to no one Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 227 Since psychic inflation is by no means a phenomenon induced exclusively by analysis, but occurs just as often in ordinary life, we can investigate it equally well in other cases. A very common instance is the humourless way in which many men identify themselves with their business or their titles. The office I hold is certainly my special activity; but it is also a collective factor that has come into existence historically through the cooperation of many people and whose dignity rests solely on collective approval. When, therefore, I identify myself with my office or title, I behave as though I myself were the whole complex of social factors of which that office consists, or as though I were not only the bearer of the office, but also and at the same time the approval of society. I have made an extraordinary extension of myself and have usurped qualities which are not in me but outside me. L'état c'est moi [I am the state!] is the motto for such people Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 227 Consequently, the individual who annexes the unconscious heritage of the collective psyche to what has accrued to him in the course of his ontogenetic development, as though it were part of the latter, enlarges the scope of his personality in an illegitimate way and suffers the consequences Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 235 In so far as the collective psyche comprises the parties inférieures of the psychic functions and thus forms the basis of every personality, it has the effect of crushing and devaluing the personality. This shows itself either in the aforementioned stifling of self-confidence or else in an unconscious heightening of the ego's importance to the point of a pathological will to power Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 235 This discovery makes him therefore less individually unique, and more collective. His collectivization is not always a step to the bad; it may sometimes be a step to the good. There are people who repress their good qualities and consciously give free rein to their infantile desires Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 236 The lifting of personal repression at first brings purely personal contents into consciousness; but attached to them are the collective elements of the unconscious, the ever-present instincts, qualities, and ideas

(images) as well as all those “statistical” quotas of average virtue and average vice which we recognize when we say, “Everyone has in him something of the criminal, the genius, and the saint” Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 236 If I were more of a therapist than an investigator, I would naturally be unable to check a certain optimism of judgment, because my eyes would then be glued to the number of cures. But my conscience as an investigator is concerned not with quantity but with quality Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 236 Nature is aristocratic, and one person of value outweighs ten lesser ones. My eye followed the valuable people, and from them I learned the dubiousness of the results of a purely personal analysis, and also to understand the reasons for this dubiousness Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 236 In primitives, development of personality, or more accurately, development of the person, is a question of magical prestige. The figure of the medicine-man or chief leads the way: both make themselves conspicuous by the singularity of their ornaments and their mode of life, expressive of their social roles Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 237 The singularity of his [the chief’s] outward tokens marks the individual off from the rest, and the segregation is still further enhanced by the possession of special ritual secrets. By these and similar means the primitive creates around him a shell, which might be called a persona (mask). Masks, as we know, are actually used among primitives in totem ceremoniesfor instance, as a means of enhancing or changing the personality. In this way the outstanding individual is apparently removed from the sphere of the collective psyche, and to the degree that he succeeds in identifying himself with his persona, he actually is removed. This removal means magical prestige Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 237 One could easily assert that the impelling motive in this development is the will to power. But that would be to forget that the building up of prestige is always a product of collective compromise: not only must there be one who wants prestige, there must also be a public seeking somebody on whom to confer prestige Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 237 That being so, it would be incorrect to say that a man creates prestige for himself out of his individual will to power; it is on the contrary an entirely collective affair. Since society as a whole needs the magically effective figure, it uses this need of the will to power in the individual, and the will to submit in the mass, as a vehicle, and thus brings about the creation of personal prestige. The latter is a phenomenon which, as the history of political institutions shows, is of the utmost importance for the comity of nations Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 237 The importance of personal prestige can hardly be overestimated, because the possibility of regressive dissolution in the collective psyche is a very real danger, not only for the outstanding individual but also for his followers. This possibility is most likely to occur when the goal of prestige universal recognition has been reached. The person then becomes a collective truth, and that is always the beginning of the end Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 238 To gain prestige is a positive achievement not only for the outstanding individual but also for the clan. The individual distinguishes himself by his deeds, the many by their renunciation of power. So long as this attitude needs to be fought for and defended against hostile influences, the achievement remains positive; but as soon as there are no more obstacles and universal recognition has been attained, prestige loses its positive value and usually becomes a dead letter. A schismatic movement then sets in, and the whole process begins again from the beginning Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 238 Because personality is of such paramount importance for the life of the community, everything likely to disturb its development is sensed as a danger. But the greatest danger of all is the premature dissolution of prestige by an invasion of the collective psyche. Absolute secrecy is one of the best-known primitive means of exorcising this danger Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 239 Collective thinking and feeling and collective effort are far less of a strain than individual functioning and effort; hence there is always a great temptation to allow collective functioning to take the place of individual differentiation of the personality Carl Jung, CW 7, Para 239 t is a notorious fact that the morality of a society as a whole is in inverse ratio to its size; for the greater the aggregation of individuals, the more the individual factors are blotted out, and with them
